No plea could well be more unsatisfactory than this. From the point of view of a true biographer, the great event in a man's life is the event which is either the most important in its results, or is in itself the most characteristic and illuminating; but the Calvinian controversy, as Mr. Tyerman calls it, produced no apparent result at all, save in the form of embittered feeling in many of the controversialists; and the polemical attitude, far from being characteristic of Fletcher, was quite alien to the genius of his nature, so that instead of aiding our realisation of his character, it only confuses it, just in the same way as a youthful student would be confused by an estimate of Mr. Ruskin which devoted more space to his politico-economical speculations than to his artistic criticism. In the face of the fact that Fletcher died of a virulent epidemic fever, caught in the course of his fearless pastoral ministrations, the statement that the controversy hastened his death is simply unintelligible; and, as regards the last sentence in our quotation, the only doctrine which can with any show of truth be said to have "created Methodism" was the doctrine concerning the action of the Holy Spirit in the work of regeneration, which was admitted by controversialists on both sides. Mr. Tyerman says truly that he has "refrained from discussing" the points at issue, but discussion conducted with any measure of judicial impartiality would have been more edifying, more instructive, and certainly more "artistic," than repeated statements that Fletcher's arguments were "unanswerable" and "irrefutable," and that this or that "virulent," or "frothy," or "calumnious" antagonist deviated into vituperation, or lapsed into silence, because he felt himself utterly vanquished by the logic of Wesley's champion. Even in an avowedly polemical work, which a biography surely ought not to be, such epithets as those just quoted would be in thoroughly bad taste; but there is something worse than bad taste in the remark that an eminently Christian letter, in which Mr. Richard Hill expresses his desire that the controversy should cease, was prompted by "cowardice rather than courtesy," and was merely the utterance of a man who, having been "vanquished more than once, . . . now wished to retire from the arena." Mr. Tyerman has so much of the spirit of the theological gladiator that, when he finds it necessary to the preservation of chronological order to break his interminable narrative of these wretched squabbles by a chapter which has some real biographical interest, he laments the "long and awkward interruption," and returns with almost ludicrous gusto to the details of renewed conflicts in the theological arena. No mistake could well be greater than this; for of Fletcher's polemical achievements it must be said, not merely that they throw little light upon his personality, but that they are in themselves quite unremarkable. Isaac Taylor, in a passage quoted, but disparaged, by Mr. Tyerman, says very justly that while Fletcher was no such reasoner, no such master of Biblical criticism, as might have made it possible for him as a theological writer to survive his day, his claim to remembrance lies in the fact that he was a true saint, whose saintliness was "as little lowered by admixture of human infirmity as we may hope to find it anywhere on earth."

It is this peculiar quality of Fletcher's nature and character which makes us regret so much the inadequacy and one-sidedness of Mr. Tyerman's method of portraiture. The ideal saintly life is one not only of high contemplation, but of wide activities; it is a life both of elevated divine communion, and of far-reaching human sympathy and helpfulness. In this biography we witness the contemplative, but not the active, side of Fletcher's life; we see his face shining as he comes down from the mount, but hardly catch a glimpse of the reflection of the glory in the countenances of the human brothers among whom he moved. The nature and extent of his pastoral work at Madeley, which was undoubtedly the work of his life, will be to readers who make his acquaintance in this biography matters of inference rather than of knowledge. Of what he was to the Wesleys, and his other Methodist friends, we learn much; but of what he was to the rough miners of his obscure parish we learn next to nothing, and yet the latter is surely of greater importance than the former. We do not think that there is throughout the volume more than one quotable anecdote of his pastoral labours, but this one is sufficiently characteristic to be interesting:—

"Fifteen years ago [sic], soon after he came to Madeley, at Christmas time, in a dark night, Fletcher, on the top of Lincoln Hill Woods, was at a loss which way to take to reach his vicarage at Madeley. Providentially, he met a working-man of Coalbrookdale, Michael

* Wesley's Designated Successor: the Life, Letters, and Literary Labours of the Rev. John William Fletcher, Vicar of Madeley. By the Rev. L. Tyerman. London: Hodder and Stoughton.

Onions by name, who was on his way to Broseley, to fetch a fiddler for a dancing-party in Michael's house. Fletcher told him he had lost his way to Madeley, and asked him to put him right. Good-tempered Michael went half a mile out of his way to render the muffled stranger the necessary guidance. Conversation ensued; Michael explained the object of his journey to Broseley; Fletcher warned him of his sin and danger; Michael became alarmed, and instead of proceeding to Broseley to secure the services of the fiddler, returned to his dwelling at Coalbrookdale. On his entering, the assembled dancers asked, 'Have you brought the fiddler?'—'No,' said Michael.—'Is he not at home?'—'I don't know.'—'Have you not been to Broseley?'—'No.'—'Why! what's the matter? you look ill, and are all of a tremble.' Michael then stated that he had met some one on the top of Lincoln Hill Woods, but whether man or angel he knew not; and, after relating the conversation between them, added, 'I dare not go to Broseley—I would not go for the world.' Next Sunday morning Michael and some of his dancing friends went to Madeley church, and there, in the voice of Fletcher, he recognised the mysterious traveller he had met with on Lincoln Hill. Michael was converted, and became one of the first Methodists in Coalbrookdale."

It will be seen that Mr. Tyerman's style, of which this is a fair sample, is a very bad one; but even people whose literary palates are not specially sensitive may possibly find something in the matter of this anecdote to repel them. Few of us, now-a-days, will believe that the giver of a humble dancing-party on his way for a fiddler is necessarily in a condition of "sin and danger;" and those who are really repelled by the Puritan type of sanctity had better leave Fletcher alone. It is certainly not so charming, because not so human and lovable, as the best Catholic type, of which St. Francis of Assisi may be taken as an example; but those whose wide sympathies enable them to delight in any embodiment of high spiritual vitality, will find in such a nature as Fletcher's a fascination similar to that which belongs to a lofty and solitary mountain peak holding communion only with the stars. There are, undoubtedly, obstacles in the way of full appreciation; his phraseology is often artificial, sometimes almost ludicrously so, as when he says that God has shown him he must "begin to hang upon frames no more;" and we occasionally feel somewhat tired of his self-analysis and elaborate self-disparagement; but these obstacles are all surmounted when the true spiritual features of the man become plainly visible to us. It is doubtful whether Fletcher can be described as a genuine mystic, but that he had in him the material for the making of one is abundantly manifest. The following extract is somewhat long, but is, particularly when we consider the writer's theological surroundings, too remarkable not to be quoted. Fletcher writes:—

"If, because we have the letter of Scripture, we must be deprived of all immediate manifestations of Christ and his Spirit, we are great losers by that blessed book, and we might reasonably say, 'Lord, bring us back to the dispensation of Moses! Thy Jewish servants could formerly converse with thee face to face, but now we can know nothing of thee but by their writings. They viewed thy glory in various wonderful appearances, but we are indulged only with black lines telling us of thy glory. They had their bright Shekinah, and we have only obscure descriptions of it. . . . They conversed familiarly with Moses their mediator, with Aaron their high priest, and with Samuel their prophet; these holy men gave them unerring direction in doubtful cases; but, alas! the Apostles and inspired men are all dead; and thou, Jesus, our Mediator, Priest, and Prophet, canst not be consulted to any purpose, for thou manifestest thyself no more. As for thy sacred book, thou knowest that sometimes the want of money to purchase it, the want of learning to consult the original, the want of wisdom to understand the translation, the want of skill or sight to read it, prevent our improving it to the best advantage, and keep some from reaping any benefit from it at all. O Lord! if, because we have this blessed picture of thee, we must have no discovery of the glorious original, have compassion on us, take back thy precious book, and impart thy more precious self to us, as thou didst to thine ancient people!"

The series of letters from which this passage is taken was not published until after Fletcher's death, when his words had the authority conferred by the popular canonisation of their writer. Had they become known at an earlier date, he would hardly have escaped a suspicion of heresy, for they anticipate with singular distinctness the protest, made by Coleridge, and after him by Mr. Maurice, against the unspiritual bibliolatry which exalts the dead letter at the expense of the living spirit, and attaches more importance to the Bible than to the great facts of which the Bible testifies. Here, again, are some sentences which have a still clearer mystical ring. They occur in a letter of condolence written to a friend:—

"We are all shadows. Your mortal parent has passed away; and we must pass away after him. A lesson I learn daily is to see things and persons in their invisible root, and in their eternal principle, where they are not subject to change, decay, or death; but where they blossom and shine in the primeval excellence allotted them by their gracious Creator. By this means I learn to walk by faith, and not by sight. Tracing his image in all the footsteps of Nature, and finding out that which is of God in ourselves, is the true wisdom, genuine godliness. I see no danger in these studies and meditations, provided we still keep the end in view,—the all of God, and the shadowy nothingness of all that is visible. . . . The Lord crucifies my wisdom and my will every way; but I must be crucified as the thieves. All my bones must be broken; for there is still in me that impatience of wisdom which would stir when the tempter says, 'Come down from the cross.' It is not for us to know the times and the seasons, the manner and mystical means of God's working; but only to hunger and thirst, and lie passive before the great Potter. I begin to be content to be a vessel of clay or of wood, so that I may be emptied of self and filled with my God, my all."

This really recalls the large utterances of the great mystics, of such men as the author of the Imitation, John Tauler, and Jacob Behmen; and it is a curious indication of Mr. Tyerman's utter inability to discern Fletcher's real power, that he always introduces or dismisses such outpourings with something like an apology. Had we a volume of them, we could cheerfully lose the Checks to Antinomianism, upon which so much precious space is wasted. The Fletcher of this biography is a truncated Fletcher, but ex pede Herculem, and from the arc we can complete the circle. So long as sanctity is venerable among us, the Vicar of Madeley will be venerated as a saint indeed, and even Mr. Tyerman will receive his meed of gratitude for having done what in him lay to keep green the memory of a life sweet with the perfume of holiness.

THE FREE-TRADE SPEECHES OF MR. VILLIERS.*

ALTHOUGH, as a rule, old speeches, even on burning questions—perhaps we should say when they are on burning questions, on the Laureate's theory that passion leaves dry what it sweeps through—are dreary reading, the publication of the chief addresses which, between 1838 and 1852, the now venerable Member for Wolverhampton delivered on the subject of Free-trade, is a step both the propriety and the wisdom of which will be at once seen. Of all Members of Parliament whose careers come within one's vision, Mr. Villiers approaches, perhaps, nearest the realisation of what Mr. Spencer calls "the straight man." In a lucid political memoir, which precedes the republished speeches in these volumes, and which errs, if at all, in being too modest, we find that Mr. Villiers, while studying at Haylebury—but for weak health in youth, he would have gone to India, and probably would not have been heard of again—read Malthus, Mackintosh, and McCulloch. His studies in political economy made him a Free-trader, a supporter of the principles of Huskisson and Canning, a devotee to what he himself, in one of the best of his speeches, has called "commercial liberty." In 1832, he acted as Assistant-Commissioner under the Royal Commission for inquiry into the administration and practical operation of the Poor-law. This inquiry, says his biographer, "brought him into direct contact with the labouring classes, and introduced him to one of the most instructive branches of political science. He 'actually touched the political facts that surrounded him,' and it was the real apprehension of the condition and needs of the people he then gained that constituted one of the sources of his strength during the prolonged opposition he afterwards met with, when he came to deal with some of the gravest economical questions of our times." When he came forward for Wolverhampton at the General Election of 1835, his programme was ready and his course was clear. The one he never abandoned, from the other he never swerved. Social and political pressure was brought to bear upon him with a view to detaching him from a course which was considered "vulgar," and his championship of which undoubtedly stood in the way of his political promotion. But neither seems to have had any effect upon him whatever; his hereditary and aristocratic "grit," perhaps that "cheery stoicism" which Carlyle so admired—unhappily, from a distance—seem to have rendered him proof against all seductions. He was ridiculed in Parliament. He was told that he was a Robinson Crusoe standing alone on the island of opposition to the Corn-laws. He was informed—and not always so respectfully as by Mr. Disraeli, who had a curious respect for him—that he had only one speech. Yet there is no evidence in these speeches, even in such of them as were addressed to popular and excited audiences in Drury Lane Theatre and elsewhere, that remarks of this kind affected him in any way whatever. He was content to speak of his exertions thus coolly and unpretentiously at Manchester:—

* The Free-trade Speeches of the Right Hon. Charles Pelham Villiers, M.P. With a Political Memoir. Edited by a Member of the Cobden Club. 2 vols. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co. 1883.

"By constantly nibbling away at the net, the little mouse at last made a hole big enough for the lion to get out. And it is on this principle that year after year I go on nibbling away—though the task is no pleasant one, I can assure you—hoping each time to make the hole in the horrid net of monopoly a little bigger, until at last the British Lion shall be free."

It may be doubted if Mr. Villiers, after the Free-trade cause was practically won, was very generously treated by many of those for whom, and in advance of whom, he fought; though he was thoroughly appreciated by Mr. Bright and Cobden, and also by the general mass of the Free-traders outside the Anti-Corn-law League. On this subject, Cobden wrote, in his warm-hearted way, in a letter which was alluded to by Lord Granville, when unveiling the Villiers statue at Wolverhampton in 1879:—"I have trod upon his heels, nay, almost trampled him down in a race, where he was once the sole man on the course. When I came into the House, I got the public ear and the Press (which he never had as he deserved). I took the position of the Free-trader. I watched him then; there was no rivalry, no jealousy, no repining; his sole object was to see his principles triumph. He was willing to stand aside and cheer me on to the winning goal; his conduct was not merely noble, but god-like." When the Leaguers resolved to "testimonialise" Cobden alone as the incarnation of their principles, Cobden wrote to Mr. Villiers, in case he should be annoyed, and thus speaks of the result:—"He has returned me a noble answer, just like himself. I could cry over it, and kiss the hand that penned it." But if there is any doubt as to one section of the Free-traders not fully appreciating their Parliamentary leader, there is no doubt at all that Mr. Villiers's Whig friends, in spite of the characteristic exertions made by Cobden on his behalf, behaved somewhat shabbily to him. He was first offered the Vice-Presidency of the Board of Trade, at the time when his brother, Lord Clarendon, was President! Afterwards he was asked to accept the Governorship of Bombay, but the East India Company, then (1846) supreme, refused to confirm the appointment, on account of his connection with the Anti-Corn-law agitation. It was not till 1859 that his services to the country were recognised, by his appointment to the office of President of the Poor-law Board, with a seat in the Palmerston-Russell Cabinet. For seven years he discharged the duties of this office, and did good work which is not yet forgotten. But the fall of the Ministry of which he was a member meant, at his age (sixty-four), retirement from official life. There is no proof that he resented or even felt what to other men would have seemed neglect. Mr. Villiers belongs, indeed, less to the class of official politicians than to that of what Lord Beaconsfield, when speaking of Cobden, called "great Members of Parliament"—it would, of course, be impertinent at present to seek to assign him his position in the class—who are powerful by reason of their principles, and the persistency and purity of motive that distinguish their advocacy of them.

The author of the Life of Lord George Bentinck bore testimony to "the terse eloquence and vivid perception of Charles Villiers." All things considered, this criticism will be found to be justified by the speeches republished in these two volumes. They are not eloquent, in the Gladstonian sense. They are not fired by such a "social imagination" as that of Cobden, nor can the admirers of Mr. Villiers claim for him very much of the skill in intellectual fence which made his leading coadjutor in the cause of Free-trade so much feared and respected, both in Parliament and on the platform. There is in them nothing of Mr. Bright's fire or humour; one can never conceive Mr. Villiers comparing Constitutional progress by "vehement jerks" to Captain Cuttle's watch, which went tolerably well if it was put on a quarter of an hour every morning at breakfast, and half an hour every day at dinner. Yet there is in these volumes a great deal of dry light, and even of dry, if unconscious humour. Take this, by way of example:—

"The other day I heard a Cabinet Minister lamenting the injustice and folly of making a free people pay 40 per cent. more for their food than they need do, in order to support a monopoly. Nothing could be more just than what he said; only, unfortunately, when he said it, he was talking of Jamaica and the negroes, and not of England and her people. But as I cannot of course suppose that this Minister cares more for an African than for an Englishman, I expect that when I bring on my motion for the repeal of the Corn-laws he will express the same indignation at Englishmen paying 40 per cent. more than they ought for their food, as he did at the injustice imposed on the negroes of Jamaica."

Like Cobden, and ultimately Peel, Mr. Villiers was much affected by the actual sufferings the poor endured during and in consequence of the Protectionist régime. Like Mr. Bright, too, he appealed to the religious sense of his hearers. Thus there is neatness, and something more, in such a sentence as this:—"I cannot conceive anything more immediately within the province of the servants of Him who said, 'Feed my people,' and 'The labourer is worthy of his hire,' than to inculcate their Master's great lessons of charity, by enabling the poor, through honest industry, to feed themselves."

But the best quality of Mr. Villiers's Free-trade speeches, especially in Parliament, is their clearness,—clearness of statement, clear perception, and calm exposure of Protectionist fallacies. We do not know a better storehouse of the purely statistical arguments against Protection than these volumes; the statement which he read to the House of Commons in 1839, and which appears at p. 91 of the first volume, showing the value of the wages of all the productive classes of the country except the agricultural labourers, under different prices of provisions, is especially well put. As an example of Mr. Villiers's skill in exposing a popular fallacy, the following may be quoted:—

"It is contended that Protection is part of a system, and that the landed interest ought to be protected as well as the interest connected with manufacture. The motto of these logicians is, 'Live and let live,' which is strangely like, 'Take and let us take;' for if examined it will be found to be the defence of one injustice to the community at the cost of another. But, in the first place, it is no defence of the policy arraigned to show that taxing the consumer for the benefit of the producer is done in more cases than one. Again, there is a convenient fallacy in this mode of arguing, for it implies an equal application of the principle of Protection to every interest that is protected; whereas in this case, while the landowner has a protection of from 80 to 100 per cent. and upwards, the manufacturers in no instance are protected to a greater amount than 30 per cent., and in most cases less."

Here, again, is the statement of a distinction so pithy that one wonders why it ever needed to be made at all:—

"It is very important to distinguish clearly between what is called agriculture and the ownership of land. These interests are in many respects distinct; but because they are the same in some respects, the landowners claim for themselves all the arguments usually advanced in support of the laws that have reference solely to agriculture. The fact is, the connection between the cultivation of land and its ownership is not nearer than that between a house and the business carried on in it; or that between the merchant and his banker who may lend him the capital to conduct his business; or that between the manufacturer and the person of whom he purchases the raw material. These respective interests are in some material points distinct, and nobody confounds them; and there is no more reason for confusion between the interests of the cultivator and the owner of the soil than between the other interests. The landowner may hardly know where his property is; he may be unable to distinguish one kind of produce from another; he may live abroad, and know no one connected with his property but the receiver of his rents. The cultivator, on the other hand, may be equally ignorant of any of the circumstances connected with the ownership of the land beyond the price he pays for its use."

Mr. Villiers's speeches are, for the time at which they were delivered, singularly free from passion, or from anything of the character of personality. This is about the strongest thing he said in the course of his Parliamentary crusade, and we quote it less for its strength than for its conciseness, which ought to put to shame the long-winded and strident "land-nationalisation" writings of the day:—

"Nothing ever was more shameless than the manner in which the State has been deprived of its due amount of the Land-tax by a gross violation of the bargain the landowners made with the Crown when it was imposed. It was strictly in lieu of the feudal services by which alone their lands were held, and for which 4s. in the pound on the rental were required—clearly an inadequate commutation for the inconvenience to which such services would have exposed them; but which, did it yield what it ought, would now cover the whole amount of the Excise, and thereby dispense with it. If the Land-tax now paid its proper quota, it would yield thirteen millions a year, instead of little more than one million; and by causing the assessment to be fixed upon the valuation of the land made 150 years since, the public have been defrauded of the difference. But the plea of a special burden borne by the landlords of England is unquestionably the most barefaced pretext for the Corn-laws that was ever put forward: it is matter of history that there is no country in Europe where the feudal system has prevailed, in which the landowners and the aristocracy have made such favourable terms with the Crown as in England. In every other, whether Austria, Italy, Prussia, Belgium, France, they have submitted in lieu of services to a considerable direct tax on their land, bearing a large proportion to the whole taxation of the country."

It is odd that the only thing in these volumes which can be considered to be at all ill-natured was said of Mr. Gladstone, when (in 1844) President of the Board of Trade. "As far as my experience goes," said Mr. Villiers, at a rather heated meeting in Covent Garden Theatre, "this young statesman is not of the stuff of which martyrs are made." This, however, simply proves Mr. Villiers's perception of character not to have been so "vivid" as his perception of facts and of principles.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Dublin Review, for April, 1883. (Burns and Oates.)—This is a number of unusual interest, in the first place, for the article on the accomplished and much more than accomplished, the very original, translator of Calderon, Mr. Denis Florence MacCarthy. Miss E. M. Clerke gives a very good account of that poet's work, which is none the less to be admired that he devoted his genius chiefly to interpreting to Englishmen the works of a much greater genius than his own, the poet Calderon. Next, the paper on the novels of Anthony Trollope is a clever one, though we do not agree with its eulogy on Mr. Trollope's painting of English girls. We hardly know one of his heroines,—certainly not Lily Dale,—whom we should think of placing amongst Mr. Trollope's greater efforts. His pictures of the social converse of women of the world,—as, for example, in the conversations between Mrs. Grantly and Lady Lafton,—are beyond all praise; but his heroines are apt to be tainted with vulgarity, and even if you admit the novelist's intention that they are so tainted, do not strike us as conceived at all to the core of the inner life. The very interesting paper on "Fifty Versions of the 'Dies Irae'" is completed in this number, and is one which will afford great pleasure to all careful students of that noble poem. And again, Mr. John George Cox's paper on "The Changed Position of Married Women," is one of the ablest and most accurate comments on the state of the law on that subject, and of the probable consequences of the new law, which we have ever met with. It is a strong number of the Dublin.

The Life and Letters of Francis Lieber. Edited by Thomas Sergeant Perry. (Trübner and Co.)—This is a somewhat overgrown biography, of little interest, in proportion to its size, to the average reader, although doubtless attractive enough to the personal friends of its subject. Yet Lieber was undoubtedly a remarkable man, and there are materials for a really interesting memoir—one-third of the size of the one before us—to be found in its pages. Here is one of his sayings, which dwells in the mind of the present reviewer:—"Aristotle said, 'The fellest of all things is armed injustice.' I know a feller thing,—impassioned reasoning without purity of heart in him that has power in a free country." Some of our neighbours in Ireland would do well to attend to this warning.

With a Show through South Africa, and Personal Reminiscences of the Transvaal War. By C. Duval. Numerous Illustrations. 2 vols. (Tinsley.)—In this jaunty record of South-African experiences, the reader will find an amusing and not uninteresting picture of society at the Cape, in Natal, among the diamond diggers of Kimberley, the Dutch farmers of the colony, and the Boers of the Transvaal. The description of the Diamond Fields is particularly graphic and interesting. It was in 1867 that the chance discovery of the precious stone by a wandering trader, who came across a little child playing with what seemed an ordinary pebble, but turned out to be a 22½ carat diamond, worth £500, "changed, as with a magician's wand, a general monetary depression and imminent bankruptcy into a still more general affluence and financial recovery." Since that day some twelve millions' worth of diamonds have been extracted from the dirty "blue ground" of the district, where a geological expert declared not a single diamond would be found. But the main interest of Mr. Duval's book lies in the picturesque, truthful, and fair-minded account he gives of what he saw of the Transvaal war, to which almost the whole of the second volume is devoted. He was in Pretoria during the entire period of its investment, serving as a volunteer, and contrived amid his military duties to find time and energy for editing the News of the Camp under difficulties that would have daunted or disheartened most men. Of the Boers he has, on the whole, a good opinion; save in their relations to the natives, towards whose condition they approximate the more closely the further north their "trekking" propensities carry them, but whom, nevertheless, they treat as cattle or as vermin, to be made use of or got out of the way. Their "earth-hunger" is of a tolerably pronounced character; a Boer is hardly satisfied with a farm of less than 6,000 acres. In fact, the Boers constitute a sort of rough aristocracy, with many of the virtues, if few of the graces of that form of society. How the terrible mistake of undervaluing their courage could have been perpetrated, Mr. Duval's record makes it harder than ever to understand. At Maritzburg, he became acquainted with Mr. Aylward, whom he describes as a stout, full-bearded man, "with dark eyes of a not agreeable kind," rudely brusque, and animated by a fervent dislike of the Saxon, death to whom was his favourite toast. He heard also a sermon from Bishop Colenso, a short-sighted, gentle-mannered, diffident personage, thin-lipped, lantern-jawed, with white hair and heavy, black brows, but an uncompromising and tireless champion of the native races. We can cordially recommend the book; if a little over-jaunty at times, this is due to an excess of high spirits, and is more than made up for by the good-sense and good-feeling that are prominent in its pages. Many of the illustrations are excellent, and the portraits of Kruger and Joubert, at an interview with the latter of whom the author was present, give the impression of being lifelike.

Poems: the Sorrow of Simona, and Lyrical Verses. By E. J. Newell. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—This is a harmless little volume of feeble verse. There is no urgent reason why it should have been written, but, on the other hand, there is no particular reason why it should not, if the writer found a pleasant pastime in stringing together such lines as the following:—

"But that face, what art can tell?
For painter never thought it,
Nor 'neath slumber's witching spell
Hath e'er the fancy sought it.
Ah, my heart! I love it well!"

All observations on productions of this kind are wasted; nevertheless, we do just draw the writer's attention to the fact that painters are generally supposed to paint, not to 'think' faces.

Sandracottus: a Drama in Five Acts. By W. Theodore Smith. (George Bedway, London and New York.)—Mr. W. Theodore Smith has chosen an ambitious mode by which to illustrate the truth that there is nothing new under the sun, for his Indian drama, 340 B.C., is full of familiar allusions, and winds up with a "silver wedding," for all the world as though Berlin or Broadway were in question. Unintentionally, Mr. W. Theodore Smith is a funny person. A passage in his preface sets forth with all the gravity due to the subject and its antiquity, how Chandra Gupta, named by the Greeks "Sandracottus," reigned in India in the year 340 B.C.; how Seleucus, a successor of Alexander, invaded the country, and how Damaichus wrote an account of his embassy at that time, and peace was concluded by a treaty, by virtue of which Seleucus gave his daughter in marriage to Chandra Gupta. The joke begins with the list of dramatis personæ, in which we find Marian, the wife of Seleucus, Princilla, his daughter, "Dowce, Maid of the Wife," and "Jaunty, Maid of the Daughter"—just like Goldsmith's "Garnet" and Sheridan's "Trip"—and also "Spearquick," an officer of the Macedonian Army, whose appropriate name is, it is to be presumed, "all the same in the Greek." This is a faint surprise, however, in comparison with the blank verse in which the drama is written, and which is, apparently, an exercise in the art of verbal distortion by the separation of nouns from their articles and verbs from their particles. Examples of this peculiarity may be taken from any page at random. Here is one. The speakers are "Goodalla, Priest of the Pagoda of Buddha," and "Seleucus, King of Macedonia." The latter has dropped in, it would seem, in the friendliest fashion, to besiege Seringham. Says Goodalla:—

"I am glad you make a happy future
For India, for she is now troubled with Warlike neighbours. When peace is proclaimed, she Will rise in commerce and art. As a priest
Of the pagoda, I have permission
To read the books of Vedas; they are long
And interesting, and were written nine Hundred and sixty years ago; but I regret not being able to obtain Permission for you to read them.
Seleucus. You are very kind; it is not in your Power to do so. However, after
I am introduced to the high priest, he Will give me the books to read.
Goodalla. No, sir, you are wrong; no stranger can do So; our laws are strict, and the high priest would Suffer death. The books cannot be dedied
In any way; so precious are they, that Watchers are over them every hour, day
And night."

Things in general are almost as much mixed in this queer drama, wherein Buddha and Brahma stagger about indifferently, as the author's notions of the distinction between prose and verse, so that there is nothing surprising in finding Sandracottus accusing himself in a love-trouble of having "sinned against Providence," and Princilla, the cause of his anguish, bidding him "cheer up, and have a care." Only the lady's advice is very like Captain Cuttle's to Florence Dombey, "Cheer up, and eat a deal!" so that one closes this foolish production with an association that makes one forgive it.

Early Poems. By Joseph Smith Fletcher. (William Poole.)—There are some pleasing verses in this little volume, and one poetic story, absurdly called "An Idyll," of a blind man and his dog is really worth the honours of print.

Frithjof and Ingebjorg, and Other Poems. By Douglas B. W. Sladen. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—There is more merit in this collection of poetic efforts than is to be found in most books of this kind, though there is nothing to entitle the author to more than a succès d'estime. The most important of the poems, "Frithjof and Ingebjorg," is the best; the structure of the verse is good, and the strong and simple spirit of the old Scandinavian story is well conveyed. The same may be said for "The Last of the Vikings." The social, sentimental, and accidental pieces are not above the commonplace order of such things.

Ten Years: an Old-World Story. By Henry Rose. (Nisbet and Co.)—The revival of an old fashion is indicated by the lengthy and elaborate, unhappily also dull, story, told in more or less correct rhymes, under the title of Ten Years. It is long since this particular form of "poetry book" found favour, for there is not a touch of the fleshly school about the forcedly-fanciful narrative, and it is chiefly that school which has told long stories in redundant verse of late. The merits of the poem are less than its bulk, but it has some merit, and there is a pretty song to be met with occasionally, breaking into its too deadly-lively pages.

The Annexation of the Punjab and the Maharajah Duleep Singh. By Major Evans Bell. (Trübner and Co.)—The Maharajah has not found a judicious advocate in Major Bell. It is really idle to go back upon the question of annexation. The thing is done, and its undoing does not come within the range of practical politics. The dilemma, —restore the de jure Sovereign, or treat him more liberally, is futile, because every one knows, no one better than the Maharajah himself, that to set up again the throne of the Punjab is as impossible as to restore the Heptarchy. A statement, kept strictly clear of all this useless matter, and setting forth the Maharajah's claims, in respect, for instance, of the private property which is said to have been confiscated without due compensation, might do the Prince some good; to mix up his claims with the anti-annexation policy (Scinde, Nagpore, Oude, and we know not what else, must go the way of the Punjab), must do him harm.

Episodes in the Life of an Indian Chaplain. By a Retired Chaplain. (Sampson Low and Co.)—A scrappy book, gossip in kind, not very grammatical in style, and hardly deserving publication at all, though it contains passages of some interest as to the characters, capabilities, and deep affectionateness of many of the natives.

NOVELS.—Ebb and Flow. By G. Lloyd. 2 vols. (Smith and Elder.)—We feel disposed to give this story a brief but emphatic commendation to our readers, rather than to criticise it. It offers, in fact, very few points for criticism. The story is slight, without surprises or complexity of plot, and with but few incidents. There is nothing ambitious in the drawing of character, or in the style. But there are proofs of true and earnest feeling, of a knowledge of men and things, and of genuine culture, on every page. There is humour, especially in the description of Gervase Attiwell, the aesthete, and pathos, which is very powerfully developed in the history of the so-called Lewis, once an Italian monk, and afterwards a struggling painter in London; while the central figure of the tale, the bright and genial artist, Frank Ellerton, is one which the reader always sees with pleasure, and will not easily forget. We must not forget to give a word of praise to the female characters,—good, all of them, in their way, and showing in their variety, as well as in their truth to nature, much real power in the author. There is, in short, some admirable material here. A little dramatic force in making it up would have raised Ebb and Flow into a high class of fiction.—Portia; or, "By Passions Rocked." By the Author of "Phyllis," &c. 3 vols. (Smith and Elder.)—This book is a strange mixture of melodrama and low comedy. The hero is suspected of forgery; the heroine loves him, yet believes him to be guilty. The scene in which they discover their love is very strange. She finds him asleep on the grass, after a ball; the time, about "the dawning day;" the month, as far as we can make out, September. Still prudent, though "by passions rocked," she satisfies herself that there is no dew upon the grass, and then sits down beside him, "taking her knees into her embrace,"—a phrase as happy as it is graphic. He wakes; "he draws her hand nearer to him—still nearer—until her bare, soft arm (chilled by the early day) is lying upon his lips. There he lets it rest, as though he would fain drink into his thirsty heart all the tender sweetness of it." And so it goes on, till she remembers the forgery. At last the mystery is cleared. An old man, happily named Slyme, confesses his guilt. "But," says the hero, "deliverance has come too late." Then comes in the use of the ocean, which has been mysteriously roaring, in calm and storm, throughout the three volumes. There is a wreck; the lifeboat goes out; he is killed; the heroine dies of a broken heart. Then there is an under-plot. Two lovers, betrothed by a family arrangement, quarrel furiously, part, and are reconciled. Then, by way of chorus, there is a low-comedy man, who talks more nonsense than we have ever seen in print before, stumbling once in a way, as such people will, on something funny. And there are some supernumeraries, who serve no purpose whatever. There are traces of literary skill here and there, making us think, together with what we remember of an earlier venture, that the author is capable of better things; but in Portia we find nothing to commend.—Miss Cheyne, of Essilmont. By James Grant. 3 vols. (Hurst and Blackett.)—Mr. Grant mixes again, for the delectation of his readers, the familiar ingredients of love and war. The war is the Ashantee Expedition, which has certainly the merit of not having yet been used up by writers of fiction. This does not occupy much of the three volumes, but the narrative is as well done as we may expect work of this kind by Mr. Grant's pen to be. There are three love-stories; three gallant officers are made happy, Providence interfering, when it is necessary to smooth away pecuniary difficulties. Nothing is more natural than that an impecunious captain should have a wealthy uncle in India, and nothing easier than to kill him. It is less according to the nature of things that the heir of an embarrassed property should fall in love with the daughter of the family lawyer, who happens to hold all the mortgages. The third love-story, in which a man proposes to his own wife, offers a pleasing variety. Mr. Grant never loses the opportunity of holding up to execration low-born vice, and it is to be hoped that unhappy people who have the misfortune to be without a grandfather will at least learn to be moral, from the terrible picture which he draws of Lord Cadbury. It may be doubted, perhaps, whether the long-descended Sir Ronald Okeyne, of Essilmont, is one whit better than the vulgarian peer. The story is diffuse in style and conventional in tone, but still fairly readable.—A Lincolnshire Heroine. By Edwin Whelpton. 3 vols. (Chapman and Hall.)—Mr. Whelpton does not seem to possess the gifts that are necessary for success in writing a novel of this kind. It is meant, in the first place, we suppose, for a study of rural life, and we have accordingly much talk of rustic folk, given, for all that we know, in irreproachable "Lincolnshire." But then there is no humour in the talk, except when we come across an occasional proverb, and that is a capital defect. Then, again, the novel is a study of character, yet there is not a character that interests us. The heroine herself is a colourless creature, beyond a vague impression of sweetness and goodness, commendable enough, as far as it goes. Far on in the three volumes the author seems to think it time to introduce some incident, but the book is not improved by it; the story fails to arrest the attention, and it wants clearness of development. Neither Mr Whelpton's English nor his Latin are as good as his Lincolnshire. "Metropolises" and "consolidateds" are queer-looking plurals, and "solitariness" is not a pleasing word; while "cor humana," plunging "in media res," and "an uncultured strata of society," are expressions not countenanced by the grammars.—An April Day. By Philippa Prittie Jephson. 2 vols. (F. V. White and Co.)—This is a harmless little love-story, which fills, though not with very good measure, two volumes of the ordinary size, but might have been compressed, both with ease and advantage, into considerably less than the space of one. Obstacles, not too difficult or obstinate, are put in the course of true love. The stern father proves admirably amenable to reason, and the Irish gentlemen who appear upon the scene do not shoot with their accustomed accuracy at the hero. There is something pleasing, however, about the book. It is correctly written, and wholly free from offence of any kind.

We have received a Synopsis of the Classification of the Animal Kingdom. By Henry Alleyne Nicholson. (Blackwood and Sons.)—Professor Nicholson enumerates in these tables the sub-kingdoms, classes, orders, and sub-orders, and, for the most part, the families of the Animal Kingdom. Sub-Kingdom 1, the Protozoa, for instance, is briefly described; then comes Class 1, with its four orders; Class 2, with four orders; also, the third of these (Foraminifera) have two sub-orders, containing five and seven families respectively, &c. Illustrations of the more important objects mentioned accompany the text, and references are given to the most recent zoological authorities.—Of mathematical books, we have to acknowledge A Treatise on Elementary Trigonometry, by the Rev. J. B. Lock, M.A. (Macmillan and Co.), dealing with "that part of the subject which can be conveniently explained without the use of infinite series;" Geometrical Exercises for Beginners, by Samuel Constable (Macmillan); and Conic Sections Treated Geometrically, by S. Holker Haslam, B.A., and Joseph Edwards, B.A. (Longmans.)

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE debate on the Affirmation Bill began on Monday, with a very thoughtful and dispassionate speech by Sir Henry James, in which he showed how absolutely destitute of any trace of a theological test the original Oath of Allegiance was; that it was imposed for political purposes, and for political purposes only, the Peers, as a loyal body, being then wholly exempted from it; and that it was not till the feud between the Roman Catholic and Protestant succession broke out that any religious test was engrafted on the oath, a religious test which was gradually removed, as inconsistent with true civil and religious liberty. Sir Richard Cross, who moved the rejection of the Bill, fretted himself into a state of considerable excitement on the various sins of the Government, accusing it of despicable trickery for proposing to abandon the retrospective clause. Mr. Torrens, who seconded Sir R. Cross,—the only Liberal, as we hope, who is likely to vote against the Bill,—offered a good deal of sympathy, as is usual with Liberals who take this side, to the proposal to get rid of oaths altogether, both in the House and out of it, but no sympathy at all to the advocates of relief for the particular grievance involved in this case.

In the desultory debate which ensued, Baron H. de Worms, who appeared to triumph in the success won by the Liberals for his own faith, the Jewish, insolently suggested to Mr. Gladstone to start a new Midlothian campaign, of which the war-cry should be "Bradlaugh and blasphemy." Sir Walter Barttelot warned the Prime Minister that he had misled the country, and that the country would not forgive him; while Mr. Baxter and Mr. Illingworth made very vigorous speeches in favour of the Bill, Mr. Baxter declaring that the ecclesiastical bodies in Scotland were favourable to it; while on Thursday, Sir H. Drummond-Wolff resumed the debate, with a very dry and rather personal attack on Lord Selborne for sitting in judgment on the recent appeal case, though he was responsible for the Oaths Act of 1866, and had at least some share of responsibility for the opinion given by the present Solicitor-General that the common informer could proceed against Mr. Bradlaugh for the fines imposed on any one who had sat and voted in the House of Commons in contravention of the Oaths Act.

Then Mr. Gladstone rose, and it was at once evident that he was at his highest point of power, and that his mastery of the House had never been more complete. The central point of his speech was the mischief, nay, the danger, of associating the religious feeling of the country with a kind of injustice which is not only inconsistent with the principle of civil and religious liberty, as Lord Lyndhurst defined it, but wholly insufficient for its purpose of securing any true religious sanction for the allegiance which the oath imposes. Not only may it avowedly be taken by an atheist who has openly professed his atheism everywhere except within the walls of the House, but it may be taken without scruple by a Deist, who believes in the Lucretian God who sits apart from mankind; or by the Agnostic, who regards an intelligence as the origin of Creation, but regards that intelligence as quite inaccessible to our griefs, and cries, and prayers. If it secures any belief at all, it secures belief in a bare, abstract Deity,—a Deity who need not be regarded in any sense as the living Judge of human acts and thoughts. For such a caput mortuum of belief,—a caput mortuum from which Christianity is excluded as a mere excrescence and superfluity, which Voltaire could have accepted with all his blasphemy against Christ,—Mr. Gladstone held that it is most prejudicial to religion to sacrifice the broad principle that civil equality is to be granted before the law, independently of all religious conviction. There ought to be a total divorce between the question of religious differences and the question of civil privilege and power. There ought to be "no test whatever applied to a man with respect to any exercise of civil functions, except a test of civil capacity and a fulfilment of civil conditions." Mr. Gladstone recognised in the strongest way the immediate unpopularity of this measure. At every contested election, he said, the Government well know that they lost votes, and that the Conservatives gained votes, by the supposed alliance of the Government with the party of unbelief. It had always been so. It was so when the Jews were naturalised 130 years ago; it was so when the Roman Catholics were emancipated; it was so when the Jews were admitted to Parliament. The Liberal party had almost always suffered in fighting the battle of religious freedom; but they continued to fight it, not only because it was the battle of liberty, but because it was the battle of religion, because religion suffered frightfully by its alliance with these exclusions believed by the sufferers to be both cruel and unjust.

After this speech, the debate sank into insignificance. Mr. Stanley Leighton deprecated the pulpit eloquence of Mr. Gladstone,—unfortunately, eloquence like his is extremely rare in the pulpit or out of it, and Mr. Stanley Leighton is no judge of either,—Lord Algernon Percy was struck by the want of argument in the debate, and proceeded to illustrate that deficiency; Mr. Gibson said the oath at present embodied the apostolic precept, "Fear God, and honour the King;" but if you got rid of the fear of God, the honour of the King would not long remain. The name of God was to be shut out of the House of Commons, in order to get Mr. Bradlaugh into it. Mr. Osborne Morgan replied to Mr. Gibson, and the debate, which had little or no life in it after Mr. Gladstone sat down, was at length adjourned, on the motion of Lord R. Churchill.

The Government has completed its arrangements for the creation of a Ministry of Agriculture. An Agricultural Committee of Privy Council will be formed, with a Vice-President in charge, who, it is intended, shall always be the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. This officer has no departmental duties, and is to preside over Agriculture, instead of being, as Lord Dufferin said, "maid-of-all-work to the Ministry." The effect of this arrangement will be that the Department will have a Minister to itself, as that of Education has; but he will usually, though not necessarily always, have a seat in the Cabinet. We do not see that the farmers could wish for a better arrangement. There is a responsible Minister, with clerks and offices and the like, whom they can worry to death, with whom Agricultural Chambers can correspond, and upon whom statistics can be poured in a deluge. We do not envy Mr. Dodson his correspondence, but the only defect of the scheme that we see is that it relieves the President in Council too much. Is Lord Carlingford only to "superintend"?

Sir E. Watkin was the first witness examined before the Channel Tunnel Commission, and certainly showed that he had the courage, not to say the audacity, of his opinions. He declared that 250 trains each way would be run daily through the tunnel, being one each way every six minutes, although the trains are to travel at 45 miles an hour, and they would carry 14,000,000 passengers and a corresponding amount of goods every year. "We had £700,000,000 of import and export trade, and if we had no way out of England except by sea, our position was a most dangerous one." If England were blockaded, what would be the effect? The fort for the defence of the tunnel should be built of half a million tons of concrete, and could be built for a quarter of a million sterling, which the Railway Company would pay! He did not think the two Governments would quarrel over the management of the tunnel; but if there were any friction, the dispute could be settled in the way adopted for the 'Alabama' claims. It is difficult to believe that Sir E. Watkin expected his evidence to be treated seriously, and a gentle reminder from the Committee that it was composed of persons of ordinary intelligence would not have been out of place. Sir Edward finished off by asking the Committee to inspect the works on the French side. He has evidently missed his vocation. What a horse chaunter he would have made, how he would have praised any spavined beast, talked away all evidence of faults, and have wound up with an invitation to finish the deal over a social glass!

The proposal of the French Government to convert the £220,000,000 of Fives into a 4½ per Cent. Debt has succeeded. The holders were hopeless of resistance, and although heavy orders to sell were sent to Paris, the fall was not serious. The Government, to soothe the market, pledged themselves against further conversion for ten years, and on Tuesday, at midnight, the Chamber swept the Bill through by a vote of 472 to 94. The Senate followed suit by a still heavier majority. The truth is, no project of conversion now-a-days fails. The mass of Securities offered does not increase in any proportion to the savings of the nations, and the demand for "safe" bonds outruns the supply. The consequence, bonds being only goods, is an increase of price so great that conversion is always safe, and even Hungarian Rentes can be converted. There is now scarcely a first-class security in the European markets which pays a clear four per cent., and the soundest States can borrow at less than three. Modest investors may, however, take comfort. If there are no great wars to make loans cheap, the Governments are entering upon a course of "social reforms" which will cost them at the outset nearly as much. There will be loans yet for social purposes on the De Freycinet scale—he is quite equal to borrowing a National Debt in a year—to be expended, let us hope, with a little more judgment.

The trial of Kelly, the third man accused of the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke, has so far broken down. The first jury called was unable to agree, the jurors for conviction being, it is said, eleven, while one stood out for acquittal. A second jury was empanelled, but again no agreement was obtained, two resisting the verdict desired by ten. The case will be heard a third time, but it is more than possible that the result will once more be disagreement. The evidence is not quite so complete as in the cases of Brady and Curley, the prisoner looks a mere lad, and the evidence for an alibi, though untrustworthy, was less completely disproved. Add to these causes the fury of detestation with which Carey is regarded, and which his hard cynicism continually rouses afresh, and the disagreements are accounted for. They are, however, like all Irish incidents, most unfortunate. They encourage the belief of "Invincibles" that murder is safe, and they deepen the English suspicion that the Jury system and government of any kind are, in Ireland, incompatible. The Government cannot let guilty men go free, yet repeated trials enable the Irish Americans to dilate on English vindictiveness and cruelty.

The Irish-American Land League resolved on Wednesday to merge itself in the Irish National League, which met on Thursday, in Philadelphia, for the first time. The Convention, which includes eight hundred delegates, elected a Catholic priest, Father Maurice Dorney, as Chairman, a selection which is held to make it certain that the Convention will not openly sanction dynamite. It is believed, however, that although, in view of the opinion of the American Government, dynamite will not be mentioned, the Extremists will master the Convention, and that something like a "declaration of war" will be the result. We shall know in a day or two, but this is most improbable, the majority of the Convention being old members of the Land League, who, as their President, Mr. Mooney, said, "hate England with an intensity of detestation unequalled by any class of Irishmen in Ireland," but are of opinion that it is wise, in preparation for Irish independence, to win local self-government and the abolition of landlordism. They are devoted to Mr. Parnell, and even according to the Irish Nation, which expressly declares that morals have no place in the struggle, they, though willing to employ dynamite, think it will injure Ireland. There is a large section of Moderates in the Convention, and the leaders are evidently alarmed at the attitude of American opinion. "There is a flavour of Knownothingism" about it, says the Irish Nation, referring to the old explosion of American feeling under which the Irish immigrants were so nearly deprived of the suffrage. The result should be known by Sunday, as the five-minutes rule was adopted, though after some fierce protests from orators who felt their eloquence suppressed.

The agitation against the Contagious Diseases Acts, which has lasted since they were brought into operation, ended on Friday week in their virtual abolition. Mr. Stansfeld, who has made the question his own, in a speech which made a deep impression on the House, and drew from so cool a man of the world as Mr. Whitbread a warm encomium, moved a resolution condemning compulsory examination, which was opposed by Mr. O. Morgan, as Advocate-General, and Lord Hartington, as War Minister, who stated that the Members of the Cabinet had been pledged to different sides on the question before the Government was formed, and that the Ministry, therefore, could give the House no guidance. Finally, the resolution was carried by 182 to 110, and is, of course, fatal to the Acts, which will either be repealed or rendered inoperative by the withdrawal of the grant for carrying it out. Upon the whole, though we supported the Acts originally, we are neither surprised at the vote, nor sorry for it. It is not a victory of sentimentalism, though a great many sentimental people are on its side. The coolest heads in the country are divided as to the utility of the Acts; the workmen keenly dislike them, under the impression that they punish the women, while letting the men go free; and they raise in certain classes the erroneous impression that the State protects vice. The argument against them is at least as strong as the argument for them, and when that is the case, Acts so keenly disliked by the majority are better away. To be rid of the discussion is in itself a social good.

The Standing Committee on Law on Thursday carried a vote against restricting the right of criminal appeal to capital cases. Mr. Gorst moved an amendment the effect of which will be that any prisoner convicted of felony will be allowed to appeal, if the Court of Appeal think there is reason for it. The result of this amendment will be that appeals will be numerous—Sir H. James says 4,000 a year—and that a separate Court must be constituted to sanction and to hear them. The Attorney-General fought hard for his experiment, and was supported by Mr. Bright; but he was defeated by 28 to 19, and even of this minority one man openly allowed that he voted for the Government, but his opinion was the other way. Sir H. James accepted the vote, and told the Committee that before Tuesday he would tell them what he could do in the way of recasting the machinery. There can be little doubt the Committee is right. If an appeal is wanted at all, and we think it is, it is wanted least for capital cases, which are so patiently tried. We hardly know what makes the Government so fractious about the cost of legal machinery. Suppose a new Court is necessary, what does its cost matter?

The Metropolitan District Railway Company have discovered that quarrelling with the House of Commons does not pay. They have a Bill in Parliament, and on Tuesday Mr. Marriott moved an instruction to the Committee to which the Bill is referred to insert a clause compelling the Company to pull down the ventilating shafts, which poison the Embankment. The Committee are to settle any reasonable terms. The motion was hardly opposed, except by the Railway interest, and was carried by 200 to 110. It is understood that the Company will give way; and it is as well they should, as Parliament might, if resisted, give them sharper treatment. It is quite evident from several recent votes that the constituencies will not endure the claim of corporations to maltreat the public for their own advantage any longer, and that the Railway interest in particular must dismount. We do not despair of seeing a railway chairman hanged, or of recording a Bill compelling the railways to run workmen's trains at a halfpenny a mile.

The Bishop of Gibraltar has odd ideas about the functions of a Church. He will not licence an English church in Monaco, because he thinks Monaco a sink of iniquity, into which it is wrong to attract English families. "The Church," he writes in the Times, "will give an appearance of respectability" to Monte Carlo, and so "draw English families into that nest of temptation and vice." How wrong Christ must have been to dine with those "sinners!" We really had thought that there was no party in the Church of England, many as her parties are, which doubted that her mission was to the erring, or which believed that the end of her being was to keep up an unreal appearance of respectability. One Bishop, however, at all events, thinks that the frequenters of Monaco had better go to the Devil, than that more frequenters should be attracted there. Does the Bishop really believe that the people who will go to Monaco if it has a church, and stay away if it has not, are the people who will be ruined by roulette and lorettes?

One of the most unfortunate results of the recent foolish prosecutions for blasphemy, of which we have had the third this week, is that it gives audacious and able men who desire nothing more earnestly than a chance of showing their ability, the opportunity of winning a certain amount of intellectual admiration for the defence they make for themselves, and that that admiration is very apt to be placed to the credit of their opinions. In the extremely injudicious, as well as somewhat vindictive, second prosecution of Mr. Foote and Mr. Ramsay for blasphemies published earlier than those for which they have already been sentenced, tried before Lord Coleridge this week, Mr. Foote pleaded his own cause, and made an extremely able defence. He did not in any way deny his responsibility for what had been published, but took the ground that it was nothing but the popular equivalent of what men as distinguished as Arnold, and Grote, and Mill, and Shelley, and Lord Amberley, and John Morley, and Swinburne had published with impunity, and some of it not at all more coarse. He denied that it was possible to take an effectual distinction on the ground of the style of such attacks on Christianity, when it was admitted that the substance might legally be expressed in graver language, and he endeavoured to treat the whole law of blasphemy as simply obsolete.

The Lord Chief Justice, who summed up on Tuesday in a very remarkable judgment, gave his reasons for believing that Christianity could not be considered part of the law of the land in a day when Jews had been expressly admitted to Parliament, and when, on that theory, a Jewish Master of the Rolls might have been asked to condemn as blasphemy a calm statement of the conviction of the Jews that Jesus Christ is not the Messiah. Moreover, he showed, by citing cases at intervals of seventy or eighty years from each other, in all of which he showed that great stress was laid on the indecent character of the attack on Christianity, the Judges being most anxious to emphasize the difference between grave argument and gross or insulting scoffs, and that the insulting character of the language used was of the essence of the matter; and he pointed out that individual obiter dicta as to Christianity being part and parcel of the law of the land, could not count for so much as the positive condemnation of an author for a seditious libel who had only quietly discussed whether a Monarchy or a Commonwealth were the best form of government,—a condemnation which actually took place in the early part of the last century, in the case of "The King versus Bedford," though no Judge of the present day would for a moment dream of ruling his judgment by such a decision. The Lord Chief Justice intimated his belief that some of the distinguished authors quoted by Mr. Foote had been quite as insulting in their language as the authors of some of the libels now complained of, and declared that if he ever had to try them for it, he would deal out to them the same justice. The question for the jury was whether these attacks on Christianity were or were not blasphemous libels in the sense of coarse and insulting attacks, not appealing to the graver reason, but irreverent in spirit and intention. The jury disagreed, and were discharged.

Mr. Bradlaugh, too, has secured another legal triumph. On Monday, Lord Coleridge delivered judgment in his favour in the suit which he has instituted against Mr. Newdegate for "maintaining" Mr. Clarke in suing for the £500 penalty which Mr. Bradlaugh had incurred by voting in the House of Commons without taking the Oath. It was not denied that Mr. Newdegate did give Mr. Clarke a bond to pay all his costs in this action; and the Lord Chief Justice held that Mr. Newdegate, in doing so, had illegally promoted a litigation in which he himself was not interested, his interests as a Member of the House of Commons extending at most to the invalidation of Mr. Bradlaugh's seat, and not to the recovery of the fines for every vote given. Mr. Bradlaugh was awarded costs against Mr. Newdegate for all he had lost through this suit of Mr. Clarke's. It is understood that the decision is to be appealed against.

It is some comfort to know that some of the most eminent divines of our day,—eminent for their orthodoxy, no less than for their deep religious feeling,—approve the substitution of the Affirmation for the Oath of Allegiance, under present circumstances, and approve it as religious men. Mr. MacColl, in his able letter to the Guardian of last Wednesday, quotes Canon Bright's words as follows:—"What weighs strongly with me is that, although oaths may be a help to many consciences, yet, where they can be dispensed with, the Sermon on the Mount implicitly commands us to dispense with them. And they can, I consider, be dispensed with in such an assembly as that of the Legislature, even if they cannot, as yet, in regard to the average witness in a criminal trial. Moreover, I cannot think that those who call the present Parliamentary Oath a safeguard of national Christianity have weighed the facts of its history, as you have stated them. If objection be made to your term 'anti-Christian,' the oath is at least non-Christian; it cannot, I conceive, be claimed as having any relation to any definite revealed religion, to Biblical theism in particular." These are the words of the Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History at Oxford, and if the statement publicly made in the newspapers be true, the Dean of St. Paul's and Canon Liddon also support the Affirmation Bill. The Daily News, too, has learned that Cardinal Newman declined to sign a memorial against the Bill. With such support, the cause of the Affirmation Bill may well scorn the imputation of being irreligious.

Lord Carlingford made an interesting speech in the House of Lords on Monday, in answer to one of Lord Dunraven's, on the condition of Ireland. Lord Carlingford stated that while the Government could not see their way to any great land reclamation scheme in Ireland such as Mr. O'Connor Power had advocated, they were not only willing but anxious to lend money for the purposes of reclamation to tenant-farmers who could give good security, and that a beginning had been made by the sanction of small loans amounting in all to £96,000,—while the lending of £108,000 more was still under consideration,—to tenants anxious to reclaim and improve upland wild land in connection with their existing farms. Of this £96,000 already sanctioned, £22,000 had been actually lent. If any public body or company proposed a migration, as distinguished from an emigration scheme that was at all hopeful, it would be most carefully considered by the Government, said Lord Carlingford. And we are not entirely without hope that some such scheme may be proposed before long, by one of the great London Companies possessed of Irish estates.

On the relief to be afforded by emigration, Lord Carlingford was much more hopeful, but he insisted that it must not be such voluntary emigration as Ireland had had going on ever since the famine, for that was a kind of emigration which affected most the most prosperous parts of Ireland, and relieved the poverty-stricken land of Connaught least. Between 1851 and 1882, while 63 per cent. of the population had gone from the Province of Munster and 44 per cent. from Ulster, Donegal had sent away only 37 per cent., Mayo 35 per cent., and Sligo only 34 per cent. of the population. In other words, the unassisted and unguided emigration helped least those who wanted it most. Lord Carlingford intimated that large offers of a very hopeful kind had lately been made for assisted emigration, and we believe that he alluded to the plan of Mr. Stephen, President of the Canadian Pacific Railway,—concerning which Mr. Stephen wrote to this journal on March 31st last,—for settling 50,000 persons on the free lots of 160 acres each, offered by the Canadian Government to each able-bodied emigrant. The Times must, however, we think, be taking a great leap in the dark, when it assumes that our Government is at all likely to resolve on lending a sum of one or two millions sterling for ten years to any Canadian Association for building homesteads and settling these emigrants in their new homes.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

MR. GLADSTONE'S SPEECH.

IF the country be as sensitive to the grandeur of Mr. Gladstone's mind as we believe it to be, the speech of Thursday night will decide the question whether, in the opinion of the nation, Religion or Irreligion is to profit the most by the passing of the Affirmation Bill. The Liberals have been often supposed to favour the irreligious side of the issue, and to take that side strongly. Indeed, so far as we can judge from the significant silence of Mr. Gladstone on the result of the defeat of the Bill, the Liberal Ministry does not intend to accept a defeat from the House of Commons, if this painful controversy should end in a majority of the House denying the civil right of every man to take his seat in that House, whatever his opinions on religious subjects may happen to be. We believe that this is as it should be. It would be impossible for a Government defeated on this subject in the House of Commons to carry on the Administration with any credit. For this is in every sense a question of popular confidence in the Liberal instincts of the Administration; and it is certain that no House which had once avowed its belief that it is for its sympathy with Atheism, and not for its sympathy with civil and religious liberty, that the Affirmation Bill has been introduced by the present Government, could ever give that Government effectual support through the maze of delicate issues which are still in the future. The issue should be put boldly to the House and to the country,—Do they, or do they not, think that it is from active sympathy with the Irreligious party that the Government have introduced the Affirmation Bill? If they do think this, the Government, it is certain, can receive no support from them adequate to carry the Administration through the vast difficulties of the present and the future. If they do not think so, but hold, with Mr. Gladstone, that the whole religion of the country suffers grievously by its apparent alliance with a miserable remnant of religious exclusiveness, then they will take pains to declare that, in the thoroughgoing Liberalism of the Government, they not only see no threat to religion, but the highest possible guarantee for the growth and influence of all true faith.

Mr. Gladstone could not have put the question on higher ground than he did on Thursday night. It is of no use to give civil and religious liberty with the reserve of halves or quarters, or rather minute decimal fractions of that liberty; it spoils the effectiveness, the grace, the significance, in one word, the justice of the concession, and it does not reserve what could in any conceivable case be of the least use to the friends of religion. What, said Mr. Gladstone, are the Conservatives confessedly prepared to sacrifice? They are prepared to grant at once that the Member who takes the Oath need not be a Christian,—and this without any relation to the special admission of the Jews; they are prepared to admit that he may be an Atheist, even an avowed Atheist, so long as he has not confided his Atheism to the House before taking the oath; they maintain, no doubt, that in that case he has used language in a very non-natural sense, but they do not quarrel with Members who have never concealed that they did take the oath in that non-natural sense. They admit, like Sir H. Wolff, that even without straining the conscience, a bare Deist may take the oath, though he may believe that he neither knows nor can know anything at all about God, not even whether God does or does not punish us for our evil deeds, and reward us for our good deeds. All this they admit, and yet they regard this irreducible minimum of appeal to something above man, as an important guarantee of the Parliamentary standard of decency,—indeed, as one worth the enormous sacrifice in the principle of civil and religious liberty which it involves; and this though the very man whom in this instance it happens to exclude has repeatedly demanded the right to take the oath, and though no one, so far as we know, contends that, after the dissolution of this Parliament, he could be refused the right to take it, unless he were foolish enough to repeat to the next Parliament the unwary communication which has cost him so long an exclusion from this. Mr. Gladstone regards such a policy as this as in the highest degree mischievous to religion. It keeps up the tradition that religion claims the right to exclude from political influence men who declare that they have examined into the evidence of religion, and have found it wanting,—that it opens to all citizens a great civil career, on condition that they shall not find against its claims, but forbids them all entrance to that career if they do,—and it keeps up this injurious tradition for the most ingloriously ineffectual result, a result which irritates many, and really excludes nobody, if you except, at least, the accidental exclusion of a single man for a single Parliament. The Tories might contend, perhaps, that the oath does exclude some conscientious Atheists or Agnostics, who, in spite of their Atheism and Agnosticism, have too much honour to use solemn words in an unreal sense. But then, the persons who are kept out in that case, would be the scrupulous persons,—the very persons whom, if you are not to keep out the unscrupulous, you would certainly least object to admit. The oath in that case is a bar to the tender conscience, while it is no bar to the loose conscience. Look at it which way you will, this lopped and truncated oath, so far as it is imposed on reluctant Members, becomes of no conceivable use for any purpose in the world except that of making Mr. Bradlaugh into the hero of a three years' political struggle, from which he has emerged with more followers and more readers than he could ever have hoped to obtain for himself. And luckily, even that triumph is not likely to be repeated after a dissolution of Parliament. But is it wise, is it anything but ignoble, to derogate from the great principle of civil and religious liberty, for the sake of so meagre and wretched a result as this?

On the other hand, Mr. Gladstone showed from what ignoble views of the Oath as it is, the frank substitution of an Affirmation, for those who cannot assign to the more solemn elements of the oath their full significance, will relieve us. As it is, Members are compelled to admit that the oath must mean very little, that it can only represent a bare minimum of belief in the supernatural, that a man's Christianity is one of the superfluities no longer appealed to by the oath, that his belief even in an Almighty Discerner and Judge of human actions, is an excrescence no longer necessarily implied in the oath; that the oath can, strictly speaking in its Parliamentary sense, cover no more than a bare, abstract admission of an external Power above man. Now, they are compelled to admit this just because it is well known that so many take the oath who do not and cannot include in it any larger significance than this, while some probably would not even construe it as meaning so much. But, said Mr. Gladstone, if you give the alternative of an affirmation to all who prefer it, for all others the oath may recover its fuller meaning. The Christian who will then elect to take the oath rather than the affirmation, will give to the oath, as he kisses the New Testament, its full Christian meaning, since he will no longer be compelled to minimize its significance for the sake of those reluctant persons on whom the House forces it, and who cannot possibly assign it that larger meaning which a deep belief in Christ's revelation lends it. That, at least, is how we understand the latter part of Mr. Gladstone's speech, in which he explained the private significance which he himself should put upon the oath, were it not that Parliament, by forcing it on every Member, has compelled society to clip and wear away its real significance, very much as society clip and wear away the image and superscription impressed on the coinage of the country. It is the necessity of paring the oath down to the significance attached to it by the minimizers, which has necessarily robbed it of its fullest meaning for those who are not minimizers. It has been the wish not to exclude decent Deists, which has spoiled the impressiveness of the Oath for hearty Christians.

What will impress the country in Mr. Gladstone's speech is the depth of his belief in the value of the principle of civil and religious liberty in all its breadth and fullness, on the one hand, and his unspeakably deep conviction on the other, that the acknowledgment of that principle, instead of playing into the hands of unbelief, will tell more and more every year in favour of that faith which has suffered more from the alliance with unjust civil privilege, than from any other source whatever. It was in a world in which no such scoff could be levelled at it, that Christianity won its greatest and most signal triumphs. It will be, if we may believe Mr. Gladstone, in a world in which no such scoff can be levelled at it, that it will win its greatest triumphs again.

THE IRISH-AMERICAN CONVENTION.

THE cause of Ireland, as her English friends understand it, will not be benefited by the proceedings of the Irish-American Convention. The number of Delegates was considerable, 800; there were able men among them, and the passion displayed was hot; but if the object was to impress Great Britain with a sort of terror, it will hardly be attained. The Union itself, great as it is, is not so formidable to England as France was when she had not only "taken up" Ireland, but had sent a fleet and an army to liberate her from her dependence; and the Union is not on the Irish side. The Irish, with their delight in magniloquence, are fond of saying that they are "eleven millions across the Atlantic;" but for their purpose few Protestants can be counted. The religious statistics of the Union are carefully compiled, and there are not five million Catholics in the States, of whom a considerable proportion must be Frenchmen, South Germans, and Spaniards. The threats come, in fact, from a population less than that of Belgium at the outside, and as threats of honest war can hardly be seriously regarded. Nor has the want of force so far been compensated by any display either of wisdom or of energy. The managers are very anxious to raise money; but if they have, as they say, millions behind them, they ought to be able, with American high wages, to collect at least ten times the money placed at their disposal. The Irish in America are a generous people, they remit to their friends with a liberality that extorts admiration, and if they were as excited as their orators say, a dollar a head a year would not be a large subscription. They do not, on their own calculation of their numbers, send five cents a head; or, on our calculation, fifty cents. As to the wisdom displayed, the Convention apparently intends to avoid the whole dynamite subject, thus leaving themselves under the odium of approving murder, while failing to evoke the ferocious energy which a resolution in favour of immorality might have produced. They have, moreover, while asking for certain measures of justice to Ireland—many of which English Radicals would heartily concede—increased the doubt in the English mind whether it is of any use to concede them. Not only did every speaker in the Land League Convention, held the day before the great Convention, frankly declare that the independence of Ireland was his one object—thus finally cutting the link between himself and two-fifths of Irishmen at home—and that he regarded peasant-proprietorship, local self-government, and judicial reform as mere steps towards that great end; but the Convention was even heartier than its orators. The purpose which the majority cheered—and they must from their numbers be the majority in the great Convention—the hope which excited them most, the end for which they were enthusiastic, was the old Nationalist one,—to create an Irish Republic, with its own flag, its own army, its own foreign policy; to become, in fact, a nation, instead of a nationality. That is not, as we have constantly admitted, either an ignoble end, or an irrational end, or an end which places the Irish who seek it beyond the pale of sympathy; but then it is an end only to be attained by hard and fair fighting in the open field. If those who propound it are ready to take the field, well and good, cadit questio, and Great Britain has only to collect soldiers; but if they are not, it is the height of folly to ask Parliament for legislative reforms, and at the same time affirm solemnly and with every appearance of passionate earnestness that all those reforms shall be misused. That fear will not deter us, for we do not believe in one-legged races, or deem it possible that justice, mercy, and freedom can increase hate; but the mass of Englishmen ask a return for their efforts, and will declare that if Ireland is to use all fresh powers to organise rebellion, fresh powers shall not be granted. It is hard enough for genuine Liberals to do battle with that conviction even now, and when the proceedings of this Convention have penetrated through the country, it will be harder still. Mr. Parnell in Parliament and the agitators out of it, will alike be met with the English form of the "Non possumus," which those of them who know history best will be the last to deride.

For the rest, we look upon the Irish-American Convention as we should upon an Irish Convention, if it were possible to hold one which should not be a Parliament, with as little distaste as fear. In politics, as on the field, we look on organised opposition as far less dangerous than anarchical opposition. If the Irish Extremists in such meetings as this can see one another's faces, and hear one another's opinions, and come to some common agreement as to what they actually desire, so much the better for Great Britain. We could deal much more easily with an informal Parliament, in which the able would speedily come to the top, and in which the votes would be intelligible, than with a series of public meetings and their inflated talk. The majority of men are very rarely mad, or fanatic, or desperate, and in an assembly the majority must rule. In this very meeting at Philadelphia, we note that average sense is much more in the ascendant than in smaller meetings; that O'Donovan Rossa and his unscrupulous party are in a small minority, and that the grand effort of all the managers is to maintain the unity of the movement. The method adopted is, no doubt, curiously childish. The Convention wished "Ireland" to decide on the great quarrel, the fusion or federation of the different "leagues;" but instead of choosing representatives from Ireland, they choose one from every State of the American Union. That is to say, they treated the exiles who happen to have chosen America to labour, in as the people of Ireland! We might as well choose the English in America, whom it has never been necessary to count, as the people of England. The blunder was a curious one, and will one day produce consequences, the fissure between the homekeeping Irish and the Irish exiles being already apparent; but the effort at unity is to be heartily commended, for with unity will come caution and common-sense. The Irish in America intend to say through this Convention that they hate us very much—nearly as much, perhaps, as Frenchmen did in 1816—and are determined to wrench Ireland from us; and it is better we should know that, if it is so, in an official and intelligible way. We can then be prepared, and if we are to go down on our knees, shall at least know how little chance we have of pardon. It will be observed that Mr. Mooney, the President of the Land League, who put this hatred in the forefront of his speech recommending the dissolution of his League in the bigger one—very properly, for hatred is one grand cause of the whole difficulty—spoke throughout as the advocate, and, indeed, as the authorised representative of Mr. Parnell, who is himself rather of the American-Irish than of the true Irish people, both in blood and in intellectual nature. At all events, we know the truth, viz., that the American Irish, while supporting this or that reform, are earnestly desirous only of one thing,—that Ireland shall be a completely independent Republic. That declaration clears away fog, and should be a new and a strong incentive to all Englishmen so to act in Ireland that the true Irish shall be induced to declare that their kinsmen, like all exiles, misunderstand and do not represent them. The work seems to be impossible; but when all has been said, the reconciliation of one more fifth of the Irishmen in Ireland would enable us to take a plébiscite for the Union, with the certainty of a majority. That looks to our readers, whose ears are filled with Dublin trials, and dynamite trials, and Irish-American speeches, a hopeless dream; but when Lord Durham landed in Canada, how many French Canadians, separated from us by creed, race, language, and an unsuccessful rebellion, would have voted for Great Britain? How many would vote against us now? There are Englishmen, we verily believe, who doubt whether the influence of time is not suspended in Dublin, whether in Ireland there ever was a yesterday, or will ever be a to-morrow. Perhaps, when they are cooler, they will reflect that they were once frightened by a vote for Maynooth, and denounced the Catholic priesthood as the "autocrats of Ireland" and the "unsleeping enemies of British rule." There is a yesterday in Irish religious affairs, at all events.

THE DILATORY AND DILETTANTE HOUSE.

WHAT the enlarged Constituencies seem to lack is a spontaneous initiative. In 1879 and 1880, none but the very few,—Mr. Adam and a few others,—knew how determined the constituencies were to throw off the yoke of the Beaconsfield Government; and to most Members, even though their own constituencies were in that conspiracy, the strength and clearness of the resolve came with a certain shock of surprise. And the same thing happens in relation to smaller matters. There can be no doubt that, but for the signals given by the leaders in all parts of the country, we should never have known last autumn how determined the constituencies were to carry any Standing Orders that their chiefs thought necessary for the better despatch of business in the House of Commons. Without being convoked in local assemblies, the new constituencies, however strongly they really think, remain mute. There is little or none of that spontaneous letter-writing to their Members which, in the years before 1867, used to betray to the Representatives how popular opinion was going;—the reason for the change being, we suppose, that to the great majority of the new constitu-emancipates the writing of a letter is an effort, to say nothing of the uncertainty that may prevail as to the proper address; while the minority feel too little confidence in the sympathy of the constituency at large, to write letters which might only elicit that their view is not generally shared by the Electorate. At all events, nothing is plainer than this,—that even on subjects on which, when interrogated properly, the new constituencies hold very strong opinions indeed, they appear to be apathetic up to the last moment, only because they have no easy mode of expressing their opinion of their own proper motion. None the less, the result is often mischievous, and we see one of the mischiefs of that result, as we believe, in the present apathy in the House of Commons as to the deliberate waste of precious time which is going on before our eyes.

Here, for instance, is this Affirmation Bill, which is nothing in the world but a Bill for abolishing the last shred of unintended theological test which appears to remain—to the great injury of religion and the great advantage of irreligion,—and for enabling any constituency to seat its duly-elected representative without his affecting to believe what he does not believe. It is a Bill the principle of which has been discussed for three years, with more warmth and more coolness, with more elaboration and more terseness, with more enthusiasm and more sobriety, than any other question of the day. It has been put in all possible lights and sifted with all imaginable ingenuities, in the House and out of it, by lawyers, by divines, by statesmen, by Conservatives, by Tories, by Liberals, by Radicals, by men of no party, and by men of all parties. There is absolutely nothing left to be said of it that has not been said. If ever a question were ripe for simple decision, that question is ripe. The country is eager for a little evidence that the House can carry a few needful English and Scotch reforms, after three weary Sessions in which Ireland has absorbed almost every available moment of legislative time. The Cabinet have been exceedingly moderate, almost humble, in their proposals for the year. Politically speaking, there is nothing but this Affirmation Bill, the Tenants' Compensation Bill, and the London Municipality Reform Bill to pass, for nobody can say that the proposed alterations in the Bankruptcy Law, the Patent Law, and the Criminal Code are in any sense political measures. Yet of one of these three measures statesmen already begin to despair, and the reason they despair is that the House of Commons is threatened with a measureless loss of time on this Affirmation Bill, on which every Member in the House knows all that he can ever know, and on which even the constituencies are probably better informed than they ever were before on any other legislative proposal. We say, quite without reference to the decision to be taken,—whether for the Affirmation Bill and for quick progress to other and wider work, or against it, and for a change of Ministry,—that it is simply monstrous disloyalty to the country to waste night after night upon this over-discussed measure. The second reading ought to have been carried or rejected in a single night's debate; and if the second reading had been carried, the Committee on it should not have occupied another night. It is asserted that apart from discussion, Members wish for an opportunity of publicly declaring themselves on the subject. Well, have they not had that opportunity over and over again in their own constituencies, to say nothing of the endless debates in the House of Commons? The country does not want to have Members declaring themselves again and again, at the cost of all reasonable reform. Every hour spent upon these exhausted questions is an hour lost to the proper work of Parliament. Every hour lost to the proper work of Parliament at the present time is spent in sapping the confidence of the country in our Parliamentary institutions. We believe that whatever view the constituencies take of the Oath question itself, every constituency that does not really wish to see legislative reform at a stand-still,—as some constituencies no doubt do,—is filled with wrath and bitterness at this disgraceful waste of Parliamentary time on a matter ripe for decision two years ago. It is as bad as if the Board of Inland Revenue devoted meeting after meeting to perusing the old ledgers, or as if the masters of all the great schools in London devoted hour after hour to seeing the boys scribble their old lessons on their slates, only that they may be again rubbed out. The business of legislation is to legislate, not to debate questions which have been debated till the country is sick of them. An assembly that talks on after the moment for action has come,—whether it be to prevent other action which would be otherwise taken, or simply from the taste for superfluous talk,—is no more worthy of the confidence of the people than a convention of magpies; and whatever is doubtful, this at least is certain, that such conduct will injure it a great deal more than even wrong decisions taken with the requisite promptitude and resolve. Indeed, in nine cases out of ten, a wrong decision promptly taken is better than none, for it leads more quickly to the right decision. It entails on us the uncomfortable consequences of error, and gives us new data for proving that it is error. But pure dilettanteism, pure talk, such as that in which the House of Commons is now indulging, leads to nothing in the world but popular dissatisfaction with the institutions that exist, and vague, painful gropings after new institutions of which at present we have no living germs. We are very much mistaken if the judgment of the country on all this “much cry and little wool” about Affirmations and Oaths will not be this,—“Let there more work be laid upon the men, that they may labour therein, and let them not regard vain words.” Might not the ministers of all Churches preach a terse and timely sermon upon that text next Sunday, to the great advantage of Parliament, and the great satisfaction of the Constituencies?

THE RUMOUR OF DISARMAMENT.

THE rumour, stated in some quarters as a fact, that Prince Bismarck intends to use the Tripartite Alliance between Germany, Austria, and Italy, in order to propose a European Disarmament, should not be dismissed too hastily. The probabilities are heavily against it, but there are elements in the situation of Europe not unfavourable to such a scheme. The Governments of the Continent are alarmed, not only at the situation of their Treasuries, but at some of its political results. In Russia, Germany, Austria, France, and in a less degree Italy, the ruling men, whether Princes or statesmen, eagerly desire at once to obtain more money for the work they have to do, which is perpetually increasing, and to reduce the taxation on the lowest class. The Russian Government is at its wits' end to pay expenses, desires to spend more on public works, especially railroads to the eastward, and at the same time wishes to remit the demands still pressing on the peasantry in consequence of their enfranchisement. In Germany, Prince Bismarck desires to try his “Socialist” schemes, some of which are plausible, but all of which will be expensive, and at the same time to remove the burdens now pressing upon all below those earning or possessing £50 a year. He has, indeed, in Prussia abolished the two lowest categories of income-tax, and is anxious to proceed in lightening burdens in that direction. In Italy, S. Depretis is striving for a gold currency, for a remission of the grist-tax—the only direct tax on bread now levied in Europe—and for a reduction in the severe “direct taxes” on small properties, all at once. In France, the Cabinet spends on public works in a style which appals men like Léon Say, accustomed to big figures, yet is harassed by constant votes of the Chamber in favour of remissions, and by demands for “exemptions on the ground of poverty,” and only on Tuesday promised a reduction in the tax on transfers. There is not a Government on the Continent which dare put a new tax on necessities, or any tax the incidence of which is exactly perceived; or which would not be delighted to reduce taxation one-fifth, or which is not fully aware that the only reducible expenditure is that on armaments. Moreover, reduction, large reduction, if the Continent were only agreed, is quite possible. All nations have adopted the conscription—that is, universal military service for short periods—as their principle of armament, with comparatively limited, though positively vast, armies actually in barracks. By limiting the number of men on actual duty, they can, therefore, diminish expense, without weakening themselves or destroying any advantage they may gain from their comparative numbers. In fact, they do this in part already, the numbers yielded by the conscription being found insupportable. If, for example, the Five Continental Powers could agree that the Conscription should be worked as at present, but that only 5,000 men per million of population should be retained in barracks beyond one year, they would halve their peace armies and reduce the expenditure on them one-third, while leaving their comparative position unaffected, and their cadres unaffected. It would only be necessary to appoint an International Commission to watch the levies, and to insist, on penalty of a declaration of war from the remaining Powers, that any Power intending war should give six weeks' notice of active hostilities, and nothing in the present system would be injured. The relief to the Treasuries would be immense, while the armies and the people are sure to approve a plan which would send so many hundred thousand unwilling soldiers back to their work.

It is easy to believe that all statesmen have thought of this possibility, and particularly Prince Bismarck, who, though morbidly anxious to make Germany safe, shows no disposition to enlarge her bounds. He does not want Catholic Austrians or Catholic Poles, and has since 1870 steadily refrained from any effort to acquire territory. If he could disarm the Continent, he would feel it a relief, provided always that the military organisation of Germany, upon which he relies, remained unimpaired. Nevertheless, we doubt if any such proposal will be made, or will, if made, succeed. Nothing of the sort could be accomplished without the assent of all the Military Powers, and they are most unlikely to assent. The Russian Government would declare, and with much truth, that they could not get on with, say, to make the argument definite, 200,000 men. The vastness of their territory, their liability to peasant insurrections, their permanent dangers in Asia, require more merely for internal duty. The Hapsburgs would feel that with such a force their composite empire would not be safe from internal risings, while their plans of extension in the Balkan, plans very dear to an Emperor who has lost so much, must come to a sudden halt. The Italian statesmen would dread the Republican propaganda acting from Paris, and would say with truth that the Army was their only instrument for fusing populations still parted by history, by provincial jealousies, by differences of creed, and by degrees of civilisation. Finally, the French Government would declare the scheme a plot to compel them to remain content with the results of 1870, would point to the social danger constantly latent in their great cities, and would urge that French peasants, disliking both military life and effective control, cannot be made good soldiers quickly, but actually need the three years of separate life in barracks, garrisons, and cantonments to become disciplined. Scarcely any of the Powers would be cordial to the plan, if the disarmament were to be effectual; while one or two, certainly France, and probably Russia, would dislike disarmament for itself. All would be so jealous, so watchful, so inclined to panic, that the injury to prosperity would be almost as great as if they continued armed; while one, France, would have to resign dreams which may die out, but which voluntarily she will not abandon. "Ah! but," says M. Andrieux, a grave politician, usually well informed, "we may be compelled to disarm." That, indeed, he intimates in other words is Prince Bismarck's secret intention. Russia is to be drawn into the league, and then France, as the European disturber, is to be called on to disarm, under penalty of war. We cannot believe that theory. The precedent would be too dangerous, the outrage on autonomy too gross, the risk of forcing England and France into a defensive league too serious, to allow of such a menace. France might be destroyed, and no Power save Germany could consent to see France destroyed without feeling that she herself also had become isolated in the world, and that Prince Bismarck, even more than at present, was master of Europe. Disarmament cannot come through war, or the menace of war. There must be some inner agreement on the Continent, some willingness to remain quiescent for a generation, before such a scheme could be adopted, and there is no such basis for the plan.

We wish it were otherwise. It is a pain to any reasonably humane observer to see how near Europe is at this moment to the formation of a Tribunal which could prevent war, yet how impossible it is to use it to diminish armaments. As against all the rest of the world, there is such a Tribunal in effective working order. The system is cumbrous and complicated, but still nobody can fight outside the Ring, if it be only to suppress Arabi, without the consent of "Europe," that is, practically of the Six Powers. They can, and do, solve burning problems, like the control of the Danube—an incident far too carelessly studied—by their collective action. Even among themselves, they can on occasion prevent war, and they do practically prevent war between great Powers and little States by informal pressure. Germany itself, with all its energy, could not take Denmark or Holland without a European consensus, express or implied. The thing they cannot do is the thing which would be most beneficial,—to formalise their own action, till Europe could feel comparatively secure, and entitled to disarm. They can act as a Vigilance Committee, but not as a Tribunal. They cannot even compel the nations to plead before the Tribunal before fighting, or put a veto on the sudden spring of one country upon another without warning, which statesmen either believe, or affect to believe, to be as possible as ever. Prince Bismarck says that, "under certain contingencies," France would invade without a declaration of war. If only notice of war could be secured, if only it could be arranged as a rule of public law that cession of territory in Europe required European consent, if only the standing section of modern armies could be seriously diminished, Europe would be relieved of the heaviest of her burdens, the one which most impedes progress in the direction of social amelioration in which she is clearly longing to go, and yet it cannot be done. The sole difficulty is suspicion, the inability of a few men so to trust each other as to arrange for a "Truce of God," say, for ten years; but the obstacle is apparently insuperable. Europe can combine against the world, but not against her own jealousies, and must therefore go on paying to her own infirmity a tribute certainly not less than a tenth of her whole strength. Taking forced service and military expenditure together, the Continent certainly devotes a tenth of its whole working power to insurance against calamities which a reasonable agreement would make impossible. We are not members of the Peace party, and do not believe that the use of force is always immoral, or that slaughter is the worst evil a nation can suffer; but we can declare as heartily as Mr. Bright or Mr. Richard, that this situation is as discreditable to the capacity of the nations for government as it is to their professions of Christianity.

THE NEXT EASTERN QUESTION.

LORD DUFFERIN returns to Constantinople on May 4th, to settle, if possible, two or three questions too serious, either in their results, or in the interests they involve, to be entrusted to any Chargé d'Affaires. One of these is the successor to Rustem Pasha, the Governor-General of the Lebanon, whose term of office has expired. His post is of high importance, for it is held under a European guarantee, and is intended to serve as a buffer between tribes each of whom has a European backer, and who, if released for a week from leading-strings, would be at one another's throats. The natural course would have been to reappoint Rustem Pasha, as he has kept the peace, committed no outrages, and is fairly popular; but he is disliked in Paris, and the French Government have made his removal a test of their influence in Constantinople, threatening, it is said, to withdraw their Ambassador, if Rustem is reappointed. The Sultan has yielded, perhaps not unwillingly, for Rustem is too independent, and has suggested Bib Doda, the hereditary chief of the Catholic Albanians, who is retained in Constantinople as a hostage for his countrymen, and who would, as the Sultan fancies, lose, as a servant of the Porte, his hold over his clansmen; while, from his want of local following, he would be compelled to rely on Constantinople for the means of governing. As Bib Doda, however, possesses no qualifications for a most difficult task, and Europe does not want an insurrection in the Lebanon, the remonstrances have been too pressing to be resisted, the Sultan has given way, the appointment is open, and Lord Dufferin will be able to bring his special knowledge both of the Lebanon and of the personages of Turkey to bear. His mediation ought to be successful, for there is no special English interest to be served. If a reasonably good Governor-General can be found who is acceptable to France, there is no reason for thwarting the French Cabinet, already penetrated with the notion, entirely unfounded, that the first object of British policy is to destroy her influence in every quarter of the world.

This question, which is both pressing and important, pressing because Rustem Pasha's term has already expired, and important because of the relations between London and Paris, being once settled, another, much more grave, will, we believe, be brought to the front. It is impossible that Europe should for ever ignore the claims of the Armenians. The Powers bound themselves under the Treaty of Berlin to secure to this people a tolerable Government, and ever since matters in Armenia have been going from bad to worse. The Government of Constantinople has done absolutely nothing. The Pashas probably understand that the province is lost, and by the consent of all official reporters of all nations regard it only as a field for plunder. Justice is bought and sold almost openly, disorder is so great that trade and cultivation are almost impossible, and no Armenian oppressed by an official can obtain redress. The promise of Europe has served only to embitter instead of lightening:

secular oppression, by inspiring the victims with hope and the oppressors with jealous fear. This situation must end, and it is most expedient that it should be terminated before Lord Dufferin quits Constantinople. The Turks know that he never gives way, that he has always succeeded, and that he is always supported to the full by his own Government; while the Russians are aware that, for good and for evil, he understands them. Moreover, circumstances are not unfavourable to the settlement of a question which looks much more difficult than it is. Most of the European Powers care nothing about Armenia. They are willing to keep their word, willing also to protect a people who, as the only Christian nationality in Asia, greatly interest the cultivated, and they have no object whatever in supporting Turkey, but they are not disposed to expend either money or influence on behalf of the Armenians. Two Powers, however, are keenly interested in the Armenians, —the British, who wish them to be independent; and the Russians, who, besides their sympathy for all Christians under Mussulman domination, would like greatly to reckon the whole race among their subjects. They respect the Armenians, raise them to high commands, and are in return regarded by them as of all Europeans their most trustworthy friends. All over Asia, from Constantinople to Peking, the Armenians are friendly to Russia, and as they penetrate everywhere, being the only Christian people whom Asiatics fully recognise as non-European, and are everywhere among the cleverest of mankind, they are invaluable allies. If, therefore, these two Powers can agree, the field, as regards Europe, is clear, and their agreement is not impossible. If they quarrel, to begin with, nothing will be done, for the Sultan will pit one against the other; while, if they agree, the pressure on the Palace will be irresistible. Then, there is no ground of quarrel. The Russian Government does not want to annex just now. It is overburdened with work, with difficulties, and with financial trouble, and would be content if only Armenia were permitted to govern itself. That also would content the British, and the autonomy of Armenians is consequently the object towards which both will be willing to struggle. No promise from the Porte is, in such a case, of the slightest value. No "reform," even if it were conceded, could remove the original difficulty, which is that the Armenians, as Christians, are not entitled under the "Holy Law" to equal justice, and, therefore, while Mussulmans govern the country, will not receive it. The Sultan himself could not make an Armenian's testimony as valid as that of a Mussulman, and every Court of Justice is, therefore, the scene of a bad comedy. The only possible cure is autonomy; and it is towards autonomy, either in its Roumelian form or in the form adopted in the Lebanon, that the two Governments will work. Even together they will have enough to do. The Sultan will contend for an Asiatic province as he would never contend for a European one. He has already lost Egypt and the Lebanon, and will fear lest another retreat in Asia should arouse new desires for freedom among the Mussulmans themselves. He does not want to lose his hold over a race which hitherto has done what we may call the lawyer work for the dominant caste, or to see an autonomous State attracting away from every corner of the empire some of the most taxable of his subjects. He will be afraid of the Ottomans, on whom his throne rests, and who all believe that to surrender a conquered State without any compulsion on the field is an impiety, as well as a disgrace. He will yield, we may be sure, only to pressure, but still the pressure may be sharp. The English Government cannot fight to keep Armenians in slavery, and the Russian Government can, therefore, threaten force, which, as the Sultan knows, could be very readily applied. Russia in this instance has no Roumanian permission to ask before she crosses the frontier, and no Danube to separate her from her foe. Turkey, with her finances all disorganised, her functionaries unpaid, and her soldiers ill supplied, is in no position to declare war, while a pitched battle lost in Armenia might shake down the Sultan's throne. The sovereignty over the principality, though it would be but nominal, would not be given up, and Armenia, once set free, could afford a tribute which would be a welcome relief to the Sultan's impoverished exchequer. It may be necessary to apply pressure in a very decided form, but the Sultan must give way in the end, as he did about Montenegro, about Thessaly, and about Egypt, and after three months of bitter negotiation, Armenia would be free. That would be a result worth a struggle, which Lord Dufferin, with his knowledge of St. Petersburg and Constantinople, and his special experience of such struggles, may be able to avert, though we cannot flatter ourselves, with the Times, that mere conversation will have any weight with the Sultan. No man yet was ever talked out of an estate, and stubbornness is not the quality in which Turks are apt to be deficient. The talk, however, will explain British objects, and Lord Dufferin will have this advantage, that for once even the Sultan cannot suspect the British of interested motives. Armenia has no Bonds—or she would be free by this time—and no Canal.

THE SCOTCH UNIVERSITIES BILL.

IT has long been the fashion to attribute the intelligence of the Scottish people, and the diffusion of a taste for serious reading and thinking among them, to the system of parish schools which the Reformers of the sixteenth century created. But, perhaps, no less credit is due to the Universities. They have always been, and still are, thoroughly popular. Whereas, in England, during the last two centuries and a half, the middle-classes have resorted very little to Oxford and Cambridge, and the poorer classes not at all, the four (formerly five) Universities of Scotland have been cheap enough and accessible enough to serve the poor as well as the rich, and have, in point of fact, drawn five-sixths of their students from among those to whom a University education would have been in England an unattainable luxury. Partly, perhaps, from this cause, the Scottish institutions have never sunk into the sloth to which their English sisters succumbed in the last century. They have been obliged, by their very poverty, and by the fact that those who resorted to them needed a practically useful education, to give a more or less practical training. They have retained those professional faculties, divinity, law, and medicine, which in Oxford and Cambridge dwindled away, and are being with difficulty revived. They have addressed themselves to the mass of the students, aiming rather at bringing this mass up to a fairly good level than at giving a very fine and high polish to a few choice minds. They have shown a reasonable power of keeping pace with the requirements of the age, and so far from caring for pure scholarship only, or pure mathematics only, they produced a hundred years ago the founder of one great modern science in Adam Smith, and one of the earliest and most inventive masters of another in Joseph Black. Since then there has been an unbroken series of distinguished names among their Professors, while the afflux of students has gone on increasing in a much more rapid proportion than the population of Scotland.

In spite, however, of these evidences of efficiency, there has been for some time past a prevailing feeling in Scotland that the Universities need to be reformed. In 1858 an Act was passed reconstituting their government, which had been previously entirely in the hands of the Professors, and appointing an Executive Commission, by which a number of changes were carried out during the three years following. And when experience had shown that these changes had not done all that was needed to provide adequate teaching and enlarge the courses of study, a Commission of Inquiry was named, which presented its Report in 1878. We have not space to enumerate the recommendations of this Report, nor have all of them been approved by the educated opinion of Scotland, which seems to be unanimous upon three points only. They are these,—firstly, that the restriction of the Divinity Chairs to ministers of the Established Church can no longer be maintained; secondly, that new Professorships are wanted, and endowments for them; thirdly, that the curriculum of studies must be enlarged, new subjects more fully recognised, greater freedom of choice among subjects given to students, and in this way a means provided for carrying on persons of special capacity to a much higher proficiency in particular lines of learning and research than is at present found possible. Upon two other points of much importance, opinion is divided. One relates to the University of St. Andrew's, the most venerable by its age and picturesque in its externals of all the Northern seats of learning, but also the smallest and the worst placed. Some hold that it ought to be extinguished altogether, because the expense of keeping it up is out of proportion to its services. Others would transfer it across the Firth of Tay to Dundee, and unite with it the Science College which has been lately founded in that prosperous town. Others, again, propose to hand it over to women, and in this way turn to a new account its buildings and its traditions. And to all these views there is opposed that of the St. Andrew's people themselves, who think their seclusion in some sense an advantage, and declare that, with a little help from the State, they could continue to do valuable work. The second point of controversy is as to the desirability of instituting, in all the Universities, an entrance examination. The provision for higher secondary education in Scotland is admittedly imperfect, and many students come to the Universities who are weak in Latin and mathematics, and entirely ignorant of Greek, so that it becomes necessary for the Professors or their assistants to undertake, in these subjects, a great deal of elementary work which ought to have been done in the schools. This would be corrected by an entrance examination, which, while relieving the Professors from this less worthy work and giving them more time for the higher teaching, would before long react on the schools, and tend to bring them up to a better average. On the other hand, it may fairly be said that the schools ought themselves to be improved before this severe test is imposed on them, and that men of merit and promise will be kept out of the Universities through insufficient preparation who, if once admitted, would have rapidly repaired their deficiencies. There is much force in this argument, for many of those students who now most distinguish themselves in mathematics, or natural science, or metaphysics do, in fact, come up very ill-grounded in Latin, and often from parts of the country where little teaching of Latin is to be had. It is a further difficulty that the attendance at the junior classes of some of the Professors would be seriously diminished, and therewith the incomes of those professors. Such an obstacle can hardly be suffered to stand in the way of a reform approved upon sufficient grounds. But it opens the question of compensating these Professors, and thereby bringing in a new element of expense and complication.

The Bill which the Government have brought in, and whose second reading is to be taken as soon as the Affirmation Bill has been disposed of, does not directly grapple with any of these problems. It proposes to create an Executive Commission, to last for four years, by which the work of reorganising the Universities is to be undertaken. To this Commission the widest powers are to be given. They may abolish all or any theological tests. They may alter the conditions of endowments and the patronage of Professorial Chairs, and the powers and the constitution of the various Governing Bodies. They may create new Professorships and allot salaries to them. They may deal in any way they please with the courses of study, the manner of teaching, the amount of fees, the length of the sessions, the degree examinations, the establishment of entrance examinations, in short, with every department of the University system. And it is left to their discretion to suppress or to reconstitute, as they may think fit, the University of St. Andrew's. These are vast powers to entrust to a body of yet unknown persons, and it could hardly be expected that the Universities would allow themselves to be flung into the crucible, except in return for some substantial benefit in the way of additional endowment. That benefit is conferred by the sixteenth clause of the Bill, which charges on the Consolidated Fund the annual sum of £40,000. But as the Universities now receive a sum of about £33,000 per annum, and as it is proposed to throw upon one of them, the University of Edinburgh, certain charges which the State now bears, the total new endowment to the Universities is only some £6,000 or £7,000. This is no great amount, to be distributed over four establishments, and will not go far in the way of providing new Chairs or more complete educational appliances. There is, therefore, considerable disappointment in Scotland with the pecuniary provisions of the Bill, and many Liberals may be heard to say that Scotland would probably have fared better under a Conservative Government, which would have sought to propitiate her by more generous grants. But otherwise, the measure has been received with tolerable favour. There is, of course, much difference of opinion as to the suppression of theological tests, a pretty strong party in the Established Church wishing to keep the Divinity Chairs to themselves, while the extreme Voluntaries would destroy the Chairs with the tests, and have no faculty of theology at all. But on the more important question of remodelling the courses of study, it is so generally felt that something must be done, that both the scientific party and the classical party are willing to take their respective chances. There will be plenty of criticism from a few of the Scotch Members, but little or no opposition, and the only danger the Bill need fear is want of time and the disposition to sacrifice measures in which the smaller divisions of the United Kingdom are alone interested.

The example of the Commissions which have recently dealt with the two great English Universities is not calculated to induce a cordial confidence in this method of educational reform. They were composed of men eminent, no doubt, but with no special fitness (except in the case of a very few of their members) for their difficult and delicate work. And the changes they have made, while perhaps in themselves an improvement on the preceding state of things, have not brought those Universities nearer to the broader reforms which are really needed, nor solved any of the main problems which confront them. In Scotland, the deficiencies of the Universities are less considerable than their merits, and the danger of ill-considered changes is therefore greater. The English Commissioners have patched up an unsatisfactory system, but they have not spoiled anything which was working well. The Scotch Commissioners may easily do so, and may destroy the distinctive merits of methods which have grown up with and out of the national life of Scotland. Yet it is hard to see how otherwise than through a Commission, University reform is possible. Parliament is utterly incompetent; it has neither the knowledge nor the leisure. No one would surrender such matters to the Executive Government. The Universities themselves have not sufficient legal powers, and the interests of the Professors are too much involved to make it right to leave a large discretion in their hands. We are, therefore, driven back on the expedient of an Executive Commission. But it becomes important to scrutinise closely the powers which this Commission is to receive, taking care that they are no larger than is absolutely necessary, and that ample opportunity is given for objecting to their acts. And it is of even greater consequence to see that the best attainable men are chosen, men who know Scotland and its educational methods thoroughly, and will not seek to supersede those methods by that rival system which has triumphed in England, the system that puts examination above teaching. No delicacy towards persons, however eminent, ought to prevent the names of the Commissioners, when announced, from being fully and freely discussed, and better names suggested, if any can be found. Governments think far too much in such cases of getting persons whose names the public know, Peers or Judges, Members of the House of Commons, prominent clergymen who represent the denominations, and far too little about the special fitness of the men, and of their possession of that sort of fairness and wisdom which prevents special knowledge from degenerating into a crotchety doctrinairism. It is upon the composition of the Commission that the fate of the Bill ought to depend. But we cannot leave the subject without expressing the hope that the clause which empowers the total extinction of the ancient University of St. Andrew's will be omitted, and that a somewhat more liberal pecuniary provision for all the Universities will be made. No expenditure has ever proved more reproductive, to England as well as to Scotland, than that made on the Scottish Universities; and desirable as we all agree retrenchment to be, it is not with this best kind of reproductive expenditure that retrenchment ought to begin.

A NEW EDUCATIONAL EXPERIMENT.

THE meeting held on Tuesday at the Rooms of the Society of Arts differed in one very important respect from most gatherings of the kind. Its object was to supply a want which has been long and generally felt, and so far it resembles many other meetings. Wants are still common enough, and in many cases they do not seem to be much affected by the efforts made to supply them. But a meeting called to establish a Boys' Public Day School Company had the very great advantage that it could point to a similar want which has been faced in a similar way, and to a considerable extent has been actually met. The Boys' Public Day School Company is framed on the lines of the Girls' Public Day School Company, and what the Girls' Public Day School Company has already done, that the Boys' Public Day School may fairly hope to do. It cannot, perhaps, be said that the need of good Secondary Schools for boys is greater than the need of good Secondary Schools for girls was when the older Company was founded. There are many good boys' schools in existence, and before the High Schools were set up it could hardly be said that there were any good girls' schools. But though the need may not be greater, it is felt by more people. The number of fathers and mothers who would like to give their sons a good education if they only knew how to set about it, is probably much larger than the number of those who wish to give their daughters the same benefit. Every parent above the class which, as a matter of course, sends its children to elementary schools, has a direct interest in the work of the new Company. The case could not be better stated than in the letter from the Bishop of Exeter, which was read to the meeting. "Our secondary education," he says, "is defective in every way. It is poor in quality, deficient in quantity, and out of due harmony both with the elementary education on one side, and with the higher education on the other." There has been a disposition of late on the part of some School Boards to try to remedy these defects for themselves. They think that in default of any better arrangement, secondary education may be given up to a certain point in an advanced department of their own schools. But to this there are two great objections. One was stated by Mr. Forster in his speech. The country is not at present disposed, it is doubtful whether it ever will be disposed, to maintain, either out of the rates or out of the taxes, schools for children whose average age is above thirteen or fourteen years. Now, the earliest age at which secondary education ought to stop, if it is to deserve the name, is fifteen or sixteen, so that the School Boards would not be allowed to meet the need, even if they were anxious to do so. The second objection is that elementary education and secondary education, if they are mixed up in the same school, can only injure one another. "It is perilous," says the Bishop of Exeter, "to the elementary education that the schoolmasters in elementary schools should be tempted to find their real pleasure in, and to give their hearts to, a kind of instruction in which the bulk of their scholars can have no share. It tends to the sacrificing of the many to the few, of the average to the clever, which every one deprecates. And meanwhile, the secondary education thus given is poor of its kind, and not to be compared with what would be given in a school devoted to secondary education entirely." If neither the rates nor the taxes can be applied to this purpose, two other methods remain,—the utilisation of endowments, and some form of private effort. The utilisation of endowments is going on. The Endowed Schools side of the Charity Commission is gradually organising secondary schools, wherever the bounty of past generations has given it the means of doing so. But when its labours are at an end, though it will have created, or re-created, a large number of excellent schools, they will be arbitrarily distributed over the country. There will be many in one county, and few or none in another. It is only by private effort of some kind that the vacuum can be filled.

On the calculation of the Schools Inquiry Commission, there are 50,000 children in London alone who should be at school during the years between eight and sixteen. Such schools as the City of London, St. Paul's, University College, and King's College schools provide for some of these; but they can but take in a fraction of the whole numbers, and even if the accommodation they give could be indefinitely increased, they would be too costly for a great many parents,—for the parents, for example, whom Mr. Forster describes as "persons to whom small sums of money are of immense importance, many of them being shopkeepers, who, while wishing to give their children a good education, have to pay considerable sums in rates on account of their business," and who, "as much as any class in the kingdom, find it difficult to make two ends meet." It is to such parents as these that the new Company chiefly addresses itself. It proposes to offer them a good education in one or other of two kinds of school of a lower intermediate and a higher intermediate class, the fees in the one ranging from £6 to £9 a year, and those in the other from £9 to £15 a year. Thus, for £6 a year a boy may be kept at school till fifteen, while the outside charge for boys up to seventeen will be £15 a year. One great guarantee that this will be possible is the fact that Mr. Stone, the Chairman of the Girls' Public Day Schools Company, is also the Chairman of the new Company. It may turn out, of course, that there are difficulties in store for the one that have not been encountered by the other, but the success of Mr. Stone's first undertaking suggests, to say the least, a probability that the second will be a success also. The Girls' Public Day School Company had, in this respect, a more disheartening task before it than can fall to the lot of the new Company. Its way was cheered by the example of how much energy and judgment could achieve in a similar experiment. But without any such encouragement it went on boldly, and it has prospered greatly. When the Company was founded it only asked for £12,000, and even this modest sum was not raised for some time. Now the capital raised is £100,000, and upon this the earnings of the twenty-six schools already founded enable the Directors to pay a dividend of £5 per cent. Most of the schools are self-supporting; some are so much more than self-supporting, that they make up for the few that cannot yet pay their way. Unless the calculations of the best-informed experts are altogether wrong, there is a larger field open to the new Company than was open to its predecessor,—a greater demand for school accommodation, a greater readiness to pay the price asked for it, provided that this price be not beyond the means of the parents. If this be so, failure can only come from some unforeseen and unsuspected cause, and such a contingency as this is too remote to be taken into account, except by those timid spirits who are never quite in their element outside the Three per Cents. What the Boys' Public Day Schools Company asks from the public is not charity, but a loan,—a loan on what analogous experience has shown to be very fair security. The purchaser of shares will probably get five per cent. for his money; and the consciousness that he is helping to start a new and hopeful experiment in middle-class education, may very well make up to him for any temporary uncertainty whether that return will actually be realised.

ATHEISM AS AN INSULT.

WE are convinced that some part of the popular feeling against the admission of any Atheist into Parliament is rooted in a confused feeling that the public avowal of Atheism is a kind of insult to God, which will bring down a certain amount of guilt and punishment on those who permit it without branding it by some mark of disgrace. The line of thought is something of this kind:—"So long as the Atheist is compelled to cover up his Atheism by keeping silence, and by adopting decent forms of speech that would suggest to the world at large that he is, or may be, a Theist, the nation is not made an accomplice in his denial of God; but the moment his Atheism is avowed to the people, and the people, instead of taking steps to brand him with shame, admit that they are compelled by their principles of toleration to put him upon the same political level with every other citizen, that moment they become parties to the insult levelled at God, and share with the atheist the danger of retribution." This, or something like this, is at the root of such a speech as that of Sir Richard Cross, for example, and also of Sir W. Barttelot. Now, we are not going to discuss the argument here suggested, or the assumptions wrapped up in that argument, except so far as concerns the notion that it is so insulting to the Almighty Being whom we ourselves reverently recognise, that another should deny his existence, that we are positively bound by loyalty to him to put some slur or mark of discredit on the man who thus denies that existence. That appears to us to proceed from the assumption that the Atheist only ignores God, just as a rude man might ignore the presence of his superior in rank, instead of really failing to discern him. No one would regard it as an insult to a Sovereign if a man born blind failed to recognise his presence and to pay the respect which follows such recognition,—hardly even, if when assured of his Sovereign's presence by those who could see, he still insisted that they had never satisfied him of the existence of that marvellous faculty of sight by which they pretended to be assured of the Sovereign's presence, and that, failing the verification of their power, he must decline to accept their assertion that they possess it in lieu of proof. Under such circumstances, we might, perhaps, deplore the blind man's infirmity, and even gently blame his reluctance to accept the assertions of others in place of his own experience; but we should never deem such a man's infirmity, or even the incredulity which accompanied it, insulting to the Sovereign whose presence he had really failed to discern, and had failed reverently to acknowledge only because he had failed to discern it. We should pity the man who could not see, and who could not find it in him to believe the report of other men's eyes; but we should never think of branding him with infamy because he had this infirmity. And, therefore, we assume that those who regard it as insulting to God that one who does not believe in God should be admitted to any position of trust in English public life, do so under the impression that an Atheist is a man who, being perfectly conscious of the divine presence, yet chooses to ignore it, in order that he may not be required to pay those becoming tokens of respect which all who recognise it pay as a matter of course. They want to see Mr. Bradlaugh

excluded from the House of Commons, not because they look upon him as a man deficient in one of the most important of all the avenues of human knowledge, but because they look upon him as one who, having that avenue of knowledge, affects to be destitute of it only in order that he may withhold the act of reverence which would otherwise become due from him. In other words, they hold the Atheist as not in reality an Atheist at all, but as a rebel cloaking his rebellion under a pretence of an inability to see. Nor would we deny that such forms of Atheism really exist. Doubtless there are deniers who deny not as a simple expression of their personal conviction that there is no God in whom to believe, but rather as a veiled expression of their defiance of the object of belief. Just as one who wants to insult an acquaintance will look him carefully in the face and absolutely ignore him, so there are Sufis who deny God rather because that strikes them as the most insulting way of defying him, than because they really discern vacancy where others discern an awful personal Creator. We would not be understood to assert that even in England there is no such form of Atheism. We do not doubt, indeed, that in very many hearts the incredulity about God is partly the result of shrinking from him, just as a sick man's incredulity if told that he is in imminent danger of death is not unfrequently due to his reluctance to meet death. Still, incredulity is one thing, and defiance is another. And we cannot imagine a man really intending to insult God by ignoring his existence, who could be in the least incredulous on the subject. Defiance of any one implies a very confident belief in him, and a wish to subvert his power. The intention to insult God by denial of his existence must be based on absolute belief, not on unbelief,—on the belief of hatred, the belief of evil beings who loathe the righteousness whose existence they acknowledge even while they try to shake off its hold on them by feigning not to see it. Whether there is among English Atheists any such spirit of defiance as this, we incline to doubt. For this is the state of mind not of dull or carnal unbelief, but of bitter spiritual antagonism to God; and of bitter spiritual antagonism to God we have seen but little trace in this country as yet. At all events, it must be obvious to those who maintain that the Atheism of the day is a disguised insult to a Power fully recognised, and not true failure to discern Him whose touch on men's consciences is sufficiently acknowledged by the world in general, that the burden of proof lies with them. It is for them to prove that this Atheism is insult, and not blindness, since it is clear enough that to treat true blindness,—whether moral or intellectual,—as wilfulness plotting insult, is a fatal error, both in public policy and for the purpose of treating the particular case. It is a fatal error in public policy, because by punishing as deliberate and criminal what is more or less involuntary, you create and multiply enemies of the State, where you need have made no real enemies at all. It is a fatal error also in the treatment of the particular case, because nothing hardens a man more in an opinion, than to be conscious that he is punished for one which he had involuntarily, though it might be not very fixedly, entertained. It is as certain as anything can be that to insist on treating the profession of Atheism as a disguised form of deliberate insult to God, is as fatal a blunder, from either the political or the religious point of view, as the State could commit.

The vague impression which some people entertain that those who recognise the divine presence are guilty of a sort of conscious participation in the insolence or blindness of those who won't or don't recognise it, unless they put some indignity on the refusal or the failure, seems to us to partake of the etiquette of an Oriental Court forward to resent seeming insolence or negligence to the Monarch, rather than of the devout worship of that righteousness which ignores all mere semblances and trains us to respect realities alone. What we have to ask ourselves is, whether the God of Christ can possibly be sensitive to external homage, whether he is not more concerned to forbid even the trace of a true injustice, than to multiply, however profusely, that external homage which has been rendered in far larger degree to false gods than it has ever been rendered to him. It is simply impossible that the God whom Christ revealed can desire us to resent any unwitting offence against his majesty. It is certain that he condemns us far more gravely for running the smallest risk of injustice, than for incurring the greatest risk of error by letting off guilt. In the case of a profession of Atheism, we have absolutely no right to assume that the blindness is affected for the purpose of insult, and we have very seldom any good reason for suspecting it.

And this being so, that we should ever venture to risk a gross injustice for the sake of evincing our zeal in the cause of Deity, only shows how jealous we are for the external majesty of a being whom to conceive externally is to conceive falsely altogether; and how careless we are of the infinite righteousness on which alone Christ himself founds the majesty of God.

ENGLISH LONGEVITY.

MR. N. A. HUMPHREYS, in his paper on the decrease of mortality, read before the Statistical Society on the 17th inst., has done a considerable service to the public. With infinite care and painstaking, he has brought a mass of floating and vague opinion upon the subject of English health to the test of accurate statistics, and has told us exactly what modern hygiene has and has not done for Englishmen. In July, 1881, for example, writing on an approaching Medical Congress, we mentioned the prevalent belief in the increase of longevity, and asked the European Doctors to tell us how far it extended, and whether we really gained by it,—whether, that is, the young lived longer, or the mature, or the old. We ourselves suggested, as results of observation, that old age had grown stronger, the pantaloons stage of mumbling senility being now seldom seen, except among the over-worked poor; and that youth or ladhood was now protracted further into life. Men of twenty-eight are beginning, instead of men of twenty-four. Both those suggestions turn out to be accurate. Mr. Humphreys, who has even drawn up a new Life Table to compare with Dr. Farr's, shows that ever since 1872, when the first Public Health Act was passed, the longevity of the English people has sensibly increased. Whether from the operation of that Act, or from the general attention to health which produced the Act, or from an unobserved change in the ways of the people akin to the development of temperance now going on, or from one of those alterations in the virulence of disease which have repeatedly occurred in history, the mortality from epidemic diseases suddenly declined, till the mean mortality in England, which between 1838-54 had been 22·5 per thousand, dropped in 1876-80 to 20·8, and is dropping still, the mean death-rate of 1881-82 being only 19·3, a total improvement of very nearly one-seventh. This increased longevity is not, it is true, quite equally divided between the sexes. Owing to causes which are still only partially ascertained, but which probably have some relation to the extra liability of women during the child-bearing period of life, females benefit most by improved sanitary conditions, and the total progress effected may be broadly stated thus. Men live two years longer than they did thirty years ago, and women three years and four months longer, a difference, we need not say, quite large enough to be perceptible in human life. It is equivalent, if with Mr. Humphreys, we take forty years to be, roughly speaking, the usual term of life, to an improvement of six per cent., and would in a generation leave a country of thirty millions with two millions more people in it than it otherwise would have had. A population greater than that of Denmark would have been saved from perishing. Whether that addition to numbers is a good must, of course, depend upon a multiplicity of conditions. We have never ourselves been able to accept that rabbit-warren theory of national growth of which statisticians are so fond; do not believe that China is an ideal country; and contend that Canada is, or may be, a nobler, as well as happier, place than Belgium. Of the fact, however, as regards England there can be no reasonable doubt; and it is well that the fact, whatever it is worth, should be universally recognised. Our people tend more strongly year by year to keep alive.

This is the broad fact, but Mr. Humphreys adds details of the highest interest. Our suggestions, derived not from figures, but from observation, were, it appears, correct. The very old live longer,—that is, of course, they are, as we suggested, stronger, less liable to that senile feebleness and degeneracy which struck our ancestors as their natural condition. They decay, of course, and lose powers of all kinds, but they no longer sink into a second childhood; but, except when over-worked, die, so to speak, standing, as only heroes used to do. We see men and women now-a-days over eighty with all their faculties intact, able to converse, to eat well, and to walk, and with a decided and admitted influence on the affairs amidst which they live. This is the more striking, because the increased longevity of the very aged is not shared by the old. Both in men and women, the chance of survival between fifty-five and seventy has not increased, but has rather, if anything, declined. People of that age do not benefit so much by the reduced power of epidemics; they feel, unless exceptionally strong, the influences, such as sudden falls of temperature, over which science has little power, and they decidedly suffer from the increase of worry and anxiety which, among men and women with grown families, so markedly characterises modern life. It is, however, in youth and early maturity that the improvement is most marked. The man's chance of life is increased most decidedly between five and thirty-five, and the woman's between five and fifty-five; and as, of course, great numbers, though not increased numbers, who reach those ages survive, Mr. Humphreys condenses extensive calculations into the following sentences:—"Although a large proportion of young people cease to be dependent before twenty, and a large proportion of elderly persons do not become dependent at sixty, we shall not be far wrong in classing the forty years from twenty to sixty as the useful period of man's life. Table IX. shows us that of the 2,009 years added to the lives of 1,000 males by the reduction of the death-rate in 1876-80, no less than 1,407, or 70 per cent., are lived at the useful ages between twenty and sixty. Of the remainder of the increase, 445, or 22 per cent., are lived under twenty years; and 157, or 8 per cent., above sixty years. Thus, of the total increase, 70 per cent. is added to the useful, and 30 per cent. to what may be called the dependent-age periods. The increased number of years lived by 1,000 females, according to the rates of mortality that prevailed in 1876-80, is 3,405. Of these (see Table X.), 2,196, or 65 per cent., are lived at the useful ages between twenty and sixty; 517, or 15 per cent., under twenty years of age; and 692, or 20 per cent., over sixty years."

If, therefore, Mr. Humphreys' figures are correct—and there is every reason to believe them—the question we put in 1881 is finally answered, and answered in the affirmative. Hygienic progress, so far as it extinguishes or diminishes disease, does not merely lengthen life, which would be no boon, if the extension were confined to the Psalmist's period of "labour and sorrow;" but it increases efficiency. More youths live and more men and women in their prime, and youth and early maturity are less suddenly and frequently cut short. The reservoir of force in the nation is deepened as well as the reservoir of vitality, and a generation of the English people, taken as a whole, gains more time to do its work, whatever it may be. Three minutes for men and five minutes for women is added to every hour of their time on earth. That is most satisfactory, even to us, who see with a painful clearness to what extent crowding diminishes the happiness of life, and reduces it to a continuous struggle, for if effective vitality is increased, so also is the capacity for emigration. Moreover, Mr. Humphreys, adhering, like a true statist, to his figures, might, had he wandered out of them, have indefinitely strengthened his case. An addition of six per cent. to the longevity, taking the sexes together, must mean a much greater addition to health. The epidemic disease kills fewer, because it attacks fewer, and strikes those it does attack more lightly, leaving fewer of those terrible sequelæ which interfere so deeply with human happiness. If scarlet-fever kills fewer persons, it leaves fewer still with that liability to disease and incapacity to work, often for years on end, which attend a severe attack. We all saw this when small-pox passed away. The result of vaccination was not merely a diminished death-rate, but a diminished amount of blindness, rickettiness, and—for that also is an evil, often a torture—of artificial ugliness. The race is healthier in a proportion which the advocates of sanitation would do well to ascertain more definitely than they do; and a healthier race is a happier and a more energetic one. Whether it is a better one is not quite certain, the "pride of life," as we understand that phrase, having its own vices; but mental energy depends greatly on physical energy—great Generals say dysentery extinguishes soldiers' courage, and certainly no man can be enterprising under a bilious attack—and that must be beneficial. Courage, endurance, cheerfulness, and resignation are all fostered by good health, as is also the charity which, though it often blossoms in the feeble, is seldom strong in those who suffer pain. Upon the whole, we can grant Mr. Humphreys the victory which he claims over the Spectator and his other opponents with hearty cordiality, and shall not be displeased if, twenty years hence, he proves that English life has increased ten years, and that all the increase has been to the benefit of early manhood. Science, if it is to Science we owe the improvement, will in that direction have done much for mankind, to whom some of its gifts have not been unmitigated boons. We may set vaccination against dynamite, and greater longevity against the telegraph—greatest, perhaps, of thought-destroyers—and "on balance," as the City men say, concede that something has been acquired.

WILLS, ANCIENT AND MODERN.

ONE of our contemporaries entertains, or it may be tantalises us, with a weekly account of how testators whose Wills have been recently proved have distributed their property. Beyond the evidence of a widely distributed wealth which these notices supply, on which we have furnished statistics before and shall furnish them again, and the satisfaction of a certain curiosity about other people's affairs which few of us are too philosophical not to feel, these accounts have little novelty or interest. Testators seem very seldom to look beyond their own family or kindred. The only noticeable exception is to be found in bequests to charities; and these bear but a small, and, we are inclined to think, a decreasing proportion to the total of the wealth devised. One would think that so cheap and easy a form of liberality would commend itself to people who do not give away in their life-time—and these, it must be remembered, constitute a large majority of the wealthy—but this does not seem to be the case. The motive of personal advantage which suggested the vast religious bequests of earlier days is absent, and there is nothing to disturb the feeling of the absolute right to property which seems, notwithstanding the development in an opposite direction of Socialist thought, to grow continually stronger in modern life. The average Englishman stares at you with unmixed amazement, if you tell him that the privilege of making a will is a concession, and a revocable concession, from the State to the individual. He is quite unable to realise the idea of his being bound by any duty outside the ties of family attention in distributing it. It is, he feels, absolutely his own, and when he ceases to be able to keep it himself, he shows his ownership by leaving it to those who are nearest to him. This may account for the really curious rarity of bequests outside the circle of kindred. Legacies suggested by feelings of friendship, by admiration of political services, or appreciation of literary excellence, all of them more or less common at other times, are now rare exceptions to the general rule. An admirer, indeed, of Lord Beaconsfield bequeathed to him a considerable sum, on the condition that she should have a niche in his family vault, and two or three other eminent personages in our time have received similar gifts; but the sentiment or the imagination of wealthy testators is now very seldom capable of such efforts.

If we go back to mediæval or to classical times, we shall find ourselves in the presence of a widely different state of feeling. A curious volume* just edited for the Early English Text Society, by Mr. F. J. Furnivall, shows us the passion for religious and charitable bequests apparently at its height. The wills published are not selected for any peculiarity in their contents, but because they are the earliest that are written wholly or partially in English. They tell us much of great interest relating to domestic life at the time (they take in about fifty years from 1387), but the characteristics that predominate in all, with but few exceptions, is the subjection of the family feeling to the absorbing interest in the future welfare of the soul. The earliest of them all (that of John Corn, in 1387) says:—"I bequeath my goods in two parts, that is for to say, half to me." John Corn reminds us of the miser who, having been with difficulty persuaded to make a will, left his property to himself. His meaning, of course, was that it should be spent in masses for his soul, and in bespeaking the prayers of religious persons and of the poor generally on his behalf. John Pynchin, in 1392, leaves nothing to his family or to his friends, but provides that "when men may espy any poor man of religion, whether Monk, Canon, or Friar," such poor man is to have six-and-eightpence. Lady Alice West, in 1395, after giving her best beds and second-best beds to her daughters and daughter-in-law, proceeds to develop an elaborate scheme for the benefit of the souls of Sir Thomas West, of her relatives, and of all Christian folk. Besides a sum of £14 10s. (equivalent to about £160 of our money) for 4,400 masses, there are nearly twenty bequests of 100 shillings to various religious bodies, such as "the Menouresses dwelling without Aldgate," "the Friars of Newgate," "the Friars of Ludgate," for the same purpose. A bailiff or reeve and sundry old servants are not forgotten, but they are of far less account than the dispensers of purgatorial relief. It is characteristic of the prevailing feeling of the time that only one secular priest is found among the recipients of Lady Alice's bounty,—the Vicar of Newton Valance is to have forty shillings. This noble lady, however, seems to have had the territorial instinct, and does not alienate her lands. We find other testators more thorough in their devotion to the same object. Thomas Walwayne leaves the third of the value of his land to go to the building of the steeple of Marcle Church, and after providing for the immediate saying of a thousand masses, leaves land for the founding of a chantry, "where a priest is to sing continually." John Chelmswyk goes far beyond this. After many smaller bequests for spiritual purposes, he gives £70 to two priests, to sing for seven years for his soul. His manors of Hay and Tasley are to be sold for the same purpose, and if he die childless, his manor of Haverton is to be similarly disposed of. Here a secular priest, the parson of Tasley, comes in for nothing but the friendly gift of some bedding. Richard Bokeland, in 1436, provides for a million masses at fourpence each (a more liberal payment than Lady Alice West's, forty years before). William Newland makes provision for pilgrimage to be made for his spiritual benefit. His executors are to find a man who will go to Jerusalem for fifty marks (something about £300 of our money). Another is to go to Canterbury barefoot for ten shillings, and a third to the shrine of St. James of Compostella for £5. Another common characteristic of these wills, one of which, by the way, we may find traces in the provision of modern testators, is the jealousy shown of wives. In one, it is provided that the widow, as a condition of holding the manors bequeathed to her, was to make a solemn vow of chastity, in the presence of the Bishop and the congregation.

Circumstances change, again, entirely when we get back to the testamentary dispositions of Roman times. We find, indeed, that property was extensively burdened for religious purposes, so much so, that an inheritance free from these troublesome and onerous obligations—sine sacris hereditas—became a proverbial phrase for exceptional good-fortune; but these burdens were rather provisions of immemorial age for the performance of the worship peculiar to a family than recent bequests. But a distinguishing characteristic of the wills belonging to the period which literature has made familiar to us is the wide range taken by the testator's bounty. That the Emperor was frequently made a legatee was doubtless due in part to the necessities of the time. "It is only a bad Emperor," says Tacitus, "whom a good father would make his heir." But other motives were extensively recognised. Legacy-hunting became a regular profession, on which satirists were never tired of expending their wit. Of course, this was partly due to the childlessness then so commonly found in the wealthy class. But it was certainly developed by the prevailing custom of looking beyond the family circle in dealing with property. It was evidently the custom, perhaps we might say, the fashion, for a wealthy Roman to divide a considerable part of his property among his friends. Nor did he always wait till he could no longer enjoy it himself. We find Pliny, for instance, making up the property of one friend to the qualification of an eques, and giving a marriage-portion to the daughter of another. But legacies of this kind were of continual occurrence. Nor was it only friends who were thus favoured. Literary excellence was evidently considered to be a claim. One of Pliny's letters is curiously significant upon this matter. He is writing to Tacitus, and has been flattering himself that they are pretty nearly on a level. "Whenever there is any talk on literary matters, we are named together. . . . And you must have noticed in wills the following fact. Unless it so happens that a man is on very friendly terms with either of us, we receive the same legacies, and from the same quarters." We do not suppose that Mr. Tennyson and Mr. Browning among poets, or Mr. Payne and Mr. Besant among novelists, could exchange a similar experience. Roman testators were not free, as we have grounds for knowing, from selfishness and caprice, but in this respect they certainly showed a larger and more liberal sense of duty than the wealthy now seem able to attain.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

INFORMERS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I am glad to see that your conscience (like that of many of us, I suspect) is vexed by the system of justice which secures success to a villain like James Carey. But is it certain that a good cause must rely on such means? We have now a Government which, in many points, looks beyond the mere conventional arguments of immediate advantage, and considers moral principles. It has thrown off, apparently in spite of some pressure, the wicked plan of "agents provocateurs"; it has rejected the old injustice of packed juries; could it not go a step further, and give up encouraging "informers?" The favourite argument seems to be that by the treachery of their accomplices these men will be taught that conspiracy is useless, as their allies cannot be depended on. But is a disbelief in honesty the most desirable thing to encourage, in men too much inclined in that direction already? Plato was disposed to point to "honour among thieves" as the first step to the justice which was the foundation of a State. Do we wish to show them that we Englishmen, who talk so pharisaically of Irish lying and dishonesty, really like their lying, when it serves our turn?

Let us look a little further than the immediate execution of these wretched murderers, for the results of the principle. The death of an honourable and duty-doing man like Mr. Burke evidently startled many; the heroic self-sacrifice of Lord Frederick Cavendish threw a halo round the cause of order. Is it not clear that the employment of James Carey has destroyed much of this halo? If the Phoenix Park murderers had escaped their just fate, the law might have seemed weak; but it must now seem unjust and immoral. Which is the worst?

At the same time, I would venture to add that you may be doing an injustice in bracketing Norman and Carey. A man who, finding himself dragged into schemes whose purport he had not realised, may well be horror-struck and ready to expose them, when he finds out their real meaning. A man who first stirs up men to murder, and then saves himself by betraying them, is surely a different being altogether.—I am, Sir, &c.,

Sydney Cottage, Roslyn Hill, Hampstead. C. E. MAURICE.

[Our correspondent expresses the latent feeling of many minds, but he forgets the imperative duty of the State towards those murdered, and those liable to murder. He forgets, also, that the alternative is trial by court-martial, with sentences based, not on evidence, but on moral conviction.—ED. SPECTATOR.]

THE REVERENCE FOR RANK AND WEALTH.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—It would be impossible to add anything to your demonstration of the inadequacy of the title to reverence which your correspondent, the Vicar of Selby, recognises in the possession of land or money. But perhaps you will allow me to suggest, by way of corollary, that when clergymen of the Church of England undertake, as I believe most country clergymen do undertake, to inculcate the worship of mere position, they throw away a most efficacious instrument for the promotion of higher aims and a higher morality.

Reverence, or hero-worship of some sort or other, comes naturally to the great majority of men; cynics, real and pretended, are, fortunately, a small minority. Few people, however, are so constituted as to be always reverencing. Reverence, like other forces, has its limits; and the more of it we expend, as recommended by your correspondent, on the squire and his rich relations, the less of it have we left for other objects. Now, it is quite certain that there is an intimate connection between the characters of men and the direction in which their reverence is bestowed. What a flood of light, for instance, is thrown upon the aspirations and ethical standard of the bulk of our comfortable classes by their recent manifestations of reverence for the career of Lord Beaconsfield? To give a right direction, then, to the feeling of reverence is one of the most potent means by which one man can influence for good the character of another. It is true that each man's heroes must be of an order not wholly uncongenial with his own. But so far as men can be got to reverence what they are able to recognise in other men, living or dead, of magnanimity and generosity, of self-sacrifice for wise or noble ends, of intellectual gifts worthily used, there is always hope that they may be thereby stimulated to imitate what they reverence.

The Catholic Church acts wisely in everywhere disseminating amongst its members the "Lives" of its Saints. Does the Church of England clergyman act as wisely in making the possession of land and money his test, or one of his tests, of reverence justly due? Does he not thereby misdirect a weapon powerful for good, alienate some (and those not the worst) of his parishioners, and encourage others, perhaps capable of better things, to take for their ideal and main object in life the reverence they may expect to gain by rising to be squires, or to be the rich relations of squires? And is this the kind of ideal and object that a Christian minister should wish to promote amongst his flock?

By far the least agreeable feature in the English character is the too common servility of each class towards the classes above it. This repulsive tendency seems to be very widely diffused, tempering, I believe, the relations of the upper and under servants in kitchens and servants' halls, but perhaps culminating in the abject demeanour of tradesmen before a profitable customer, or of newly-enriched plutocrats before a lord. I know not how far viscounts and barons order themselves lowly and reverently in the presence of dukes and marquises. But, surely, this unfortunate national failing deserves repression, and not development, wherever it be met with.—I am, Sir, &c.,

GOD AND PAIN.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Many of the Clergy will be grateful to Mr. Footman for his lectures, and to you for calling attention to them. We are beginning to find out that Ritualism, Dissent, and Disestablishment are small matters, compared with the subversion of all faith in Christianity, or even of belief in a God at all.

The existence of suffering, contemplated in itself, is one of the Theist's saddest troubles. But if all human life is for the education of souls, and if suffering be, in one way or another, a mighty influence, indispensable to much that is noblest in human character, how could that suffering appear in man without previous traces of it in his animal forerunner? And we may remember that although certain physical signs are generally indications of severe suffering, yet they are not always so, even in mankind; and that even among men themselves, the highly cultivated appear to be susceptible to pain in circumstances and to a degree which their savage kinsfolk seem almost to escape.

That such considerations only diminish, but do not remove, the difficulty, is true enough; but what right have we to expect to see, at this stage of human progress, all moral difficulties cleared away, any more than scientific difficulties as to the origin of life, the relations between mind and matter, and the like? We see our way but darkly; the passing cloud lies heavy, and depresses us. We must watch, and wait.—I am, Sir, &c.,

BISHOP BUTLER ON THE PURPOSE OF THE CREATOR.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In connection with your remarks on Mr. Footman's book, it may not be uninteresting to call attention to the development of Bishop Butler's views on the main subject of your article, the character of God as revealed in nature and morality.

In the "Sermons," in spite of constitutional melancholy, Butler's mind is not yet completely emancipated from the shallow, hedonistic optimism of Shaftesbury. Thus, in Sermon xiii., the character of the perfect (human) being who might fully satisfy all human desires, as he believes that God will hereafter satisfy them, is thus described:—"Here, then, is a finite object for our minds to tend towards, to exercise itself upon: a creature, perfect according to his capacity, fixed, steady, equally unmoved by weak pity or more weak fury and resentment; forming the justest scheme of conduct; going on undisturbed in the execution of it, through the several methods of severity and reward, towards his end, namely, the general happiness of all with whom he hath to do, as in itself right and valuable."

Ten years' reflection convinced the great apologist of the impossibility of ascribing such a character to the Creator of such a world as ours. In the "Analogy," he says, "Some men seem to think the only character of the Author of Nature to be that of simple, absolute benevolence. This, considered as a principle of action, and infinite in degree, is a disposition to produce the greatest possible happiness, without regard to persons' behaviour, otherwise than as such regard would produce higher degrees of it. And supposing this to be the only character of God, veracity and justice in him would be nothing but benevolence conducted by wisdom. Now, surely this ought not to be asserted, unless it can be proved so? And the object of the two following chapters, "Of a State of Probation," is to show that "the present is peculiarly fit to be a state of discipline in virtue and piety," which are treated as ends in themselves.

The change in Butler's position is still more clearly traceable in the dissertation "Of the Nature of Virtue," published with the "Analogy." (Butler in the "XV. Sermons" is, notwithstanding his view of the authority of conscience, in many respects a Utilitarian.) "It is manifest," he says, in Sermon xiii., "that nothing can be of consequence to mankind, or any creature, but happiness." (Again, "That mankind is a community, that there is a public end and interest of society, which each particular is obliged to promote, is the sum of morals."—Sermon ix.) In the "Dissertation," he says:—"Were the Author of Nature to propose nothing to himself as an end but the production of happiness, were his moral character merely that of benevolence, yet ours is not so." (Although there is no formal retraction, the "Dissertation" was probably written to correct a view of moral philosophy inconsistent with the argument of the "Analogy," to which the Bishop felt he had given too much countenance in his "Sermons."—I am, Sir, &c.,

STUDY AND STIMULANTS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your very interesting article on this subject, in the conclusion of which I am disposed to agree, recalls to me, however, the late Canon Kingsley's panegyric on tobacco in "Westward Ho!" chapter vii. Salvation Yeo, loq.: "Ah, Sir, no lie, but a blessed truth, as I can tell, who have ere now gone in the strength of this weed three days and nights without eating; and, therefore, Sir, the Indians always carry it with them on their war parties; and no wonder, for when all things were made, none was made better than this; to be a lone man's companion, a bachelor's friend, a hungry man's food, a sad man's cordial, a wakeful man's sleep, and a chilly man's fire, Sir; while for stanching of wounds, purging of wounds, purging of rheum, and settling of the stomach, there's no herb like unto it under the canopy of heaven." And the Canon, like the Poet Laureate, was a smoker himself, you know.—I am, Sir, &c.,

MODERN UNBELIEF.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Permit me to thank you for your review last week of Mr. Footman's book on "Modern Unbelief." What is wanted now-a-days is the evidence that a man may thoroughly understand the stress of sceptical arguments, yet calmly hold his Christian faith. And further, he, as Coleridge says, who views opposing systems from their inside is the only man who is able to help others to hold Christianity as intellectually reasonable. Of course, I do not mean that everybody is to accept Christianity only in this way; it would be a large estimate to say that one in a hundred ever thinks at all, and religion, like all other practical matters, influences us in a thousand different ways, appealing to our emotions, will, conscience, imagination, as well as our reason proper. Still, there are honest thinkers here and there, whose logical conclusions, in the long-run, will exert a wide-spread influence. Such an one I hail in Mr. Footman, and I would venture to recommend his book strongly, because it combines honest thought with earnest conviction, freedom from prejudice with a reverential spirit, wide reading with a charming and forcible style.

I should like to say a word on one or two points to which you specially refer. First, as to pain. It seems to me that we are all disposed to judge of the Universe as good or bad by the one touchstone of happiness and suffering. Is not this really childish? Is it not the fact that the noblest amongst us somehow develop into an intense practical belief that truth and duty are ends of equal, I will not say greater, importance, with happiness? But then, if there is to be any real unity between all creatures, a thought natural enough to the Christian, and emphasised by the theory of evolution, that which manifestly brings nobility to the highest creatures would almost necessarily be found in a rudimentary form in those lower down. If happiness be the only end, this would imply the sacrifice of that to something else; but if happiness be only one end, then other ends less important must have their weight. This argument would have little force if suffering predominated, but only pessimists (as closely connected with disbelief in God as gloom follows the hiding of the sun by a cloud) hold this. Happiness predominates, and the exceptions may surely be explained by the consideration I have suggested.

And secondly, as to "the materialistic, as distinguished from the agnostic view of Nature," of which you add that "it is quite true that the two views are inconsistent." For years I have been trying to get people to see that the purely phenomenal philosophy of J. S. Mill is utterly opposed to the fatalistic materialism of H. Spencer. But it is really marvellous how opposers of Christianity will in the same breath argue against it, because we can know only phenomena and nothing of the Power behind, and then set aside free-will, &c., as absurd, because of the absolute and mechanical rigidity of cause and effect.

Mr. H. Spencer's philosophy is an attempt to unite these two opposite conceptions, and the absurdity of this attempt has been more than ever exposed. I conceive, myself, that the present popular Pantheism has a fascination for many minds because, from want of thought, the irreconcilability of the two philosophies has not yet been generally perceived. Still, that time must come, and then it will be clearly seen that a purely phenomenal philosophy is too opposed to every instinct of human nature to last a moment, and that a purely Materialistic or Pantheistic solution of the mysteries of life can never satisfy man's noblest aspirations. Hence, Christianity may calmly wait the intellectual issue, for it harmonises law with liberty, reverence for mystery with revealed knowledge; it satisfies all that is human, while it proclaims the divine. As the fittest, it will, it must survive.—I am, Sir, &c.,

OSTRICH INCUBATION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—My attention has been called to a review in the Spectator in which it is stated or inferred that among ostriches the female bird does not sit upon the eggs in hatching. As a good many errors with regard to the habits of this bird prevail among naturalists, will you permit me to set right the false impression which your reviewer seems to have gathered from them? The female bird regularly takes part in hatching, where birds are reared naturally instead of by artificial incubation, or where they propagate in their wild state; and this statement applies to the North-African as well as the South-African ostrich. The statement can be verified by any visitor to an ostrich camp where breeding is carried on by natural means. In an article in the January number of the Century magazine, I mention this among other facts concerning the habits of ostriches; and other recent writers corroborate me, among these being Mr. Arthur Douglass, an experienced ostrich-farmer, who, in his book on "Ostrich-farming in South Africa" (Cassell, Petter, Galpin, and Co.), pages 106 and 107, says, "Whilst some pairs will bring out nearly every egg, nest after nest, others, again, never bring out more than a small per-centage. This is generally caused by one of the parents beginning to sit before the other. . . . The less the birds are visited or noticed [during incubation] the better, as also in the frequent cases where the cock will not sit at all," &c. On the page opposite this is an engraving of a hen sitting, the engraving being from a photograph taken at Heatherton Towers, near Grahamstown.—I am, Sir, &c.,

GEORGE ELIOT.*

THE faults of this book appear to us chiefly two,—one, that Miss Blind has written in anticipation of the materials for a true biography, and has consequently been compelled to make her book more of a literary criticism than of a life, and so disappoints our expectations; the other, that she does not really face the chief act of George Eliot's life, on which it is certain that the estimate of her as a woman must more or less turn, and while Miss Blind is herself doubtful about it, she does not attempt to reconcile it with the principles which she admits that George Eliot herself laid down for her own guidance and the guidance of others, in cases of similar trial.

Of the former, the literary side of the book, we have not very much to say. Miss Blind is not an indiscriminate admirer. She knows the weak points of George Eliot's writing, and points them out clearly enough. She is not a profound admirer of the poems. She can see the falling-off from the standard of George Eliot's former works in the book called The Impressions of Theophrastus Such, though why she attributes to that dull book "cutting irony and incisive ridicule," we cannot imagine. She is quite alive to the weak element in Daniel Deronda, and generally we may say that Miss Blind's literary judgment is extremely sensible, though she is apt to use somewhat pedantic and high-flying phraseology in expressing it. Why, for instance, in speaking of George Eliot's first period of scepticism, should Miss Blind close her sentence with the extremely pedantic and very unintelligible phrase, "It was a period of transition, through which she gradually passed into a new religious synthesis"? Miss Blind means at most a new religious 'doctrine,' and had no real occasion at all for that new-fangled use of a purely logical word in a purely common-place sense. Again, what is it but a mannerism, and a bad mannerism, to talk of the following passage from George Eliot's essay on "Worldliness and Other-worldliness" as scathing? There is nothing even aggressive in it; it is only a defensive remark, made on the part of those who do not believe in immortality, to the effect that a good deal of morality remains as potent over themselves as ever it was,—nay, that there are moral claims which seem to be even the more potent for the loss of their belief in a future world:—

"For certain other elements of virtue, which are of more obvious importance to untheological minds,—a delicate sense of our neighbour's rights, an active participation in the joys and sorrows of our fellow-men, a magnanimous acceptance of privation or suffering for ourselves when it is the condition of good to others, in a word, the extension and intensification of our sympathetic nature, we think it of some importance to contend, that they have no more direct relation to the belief in a future state than the interchange of gases in the lungs has to the plurality of worlds. Nay, to us it is conceivable that to some minds the deep pathos lying in the thought of human mortality—that we are here for a little while and then vanish away, that this earthly life is all that is given to our loved ones, and to our many suffering fellow-men, lies nearer the fountains of moral emotion than the conception of extended existence. . . . To us it is matter of unmixed rejoicing that this latter necessity of healthful life is independent of theological ink, and that its evolution is ensured in the interaction of human souls as certainly as the evolution of science or of art, with which, indeed, it is but a twin ray, melting into them with undefinable limits."

It may be true that one sentence here was intended to reflect on the selfishness of those who attach more importance to the prospect of their own future reward or punishment than to the actual pangs or joys of their fellow-creatures, but even that implied reflection is mild enough, and to speak of it as "scathing" is to misapply language altogether. Again, what in the world does Miss Blind mean by speaking of "the transfixing medium of George Eliot's genius"? She is speaking of the Dodson family painted in The Mill on the Floss, and remarks:—"Realism in Art can go no further in this direction. These women, if present in the flesh, would not be so distinctively vivid as when beheld in the transfixing medium of George Eliot's genius." How can a medium transfix? And if it could transfix, how could it make anything more vivid by transfixing it? Was St. Sebastian any the more vivid for being transfixed by the arrows? Miss Blind is at bottom a woman of good common-sense, but her style is, unfortunately, a little pretentious; and when she tries to say something fine, she falls much below the mark, instead of, as she intends, rising above it. On the whole, however, we should be inclined to say that Miss Blind knows very well what is best and what is least good in George Eliot's writings, and tells her readers truly enough what she knows. But we do not think that her extracts and criticisms answer any very good purpose, except that of refreshing a failing memory. The latter are usually sound, but they are never subtle or original.

On the other hand, Miss Blind's treatment of the most critical resolve ever taken by the subject of her memoir is wholly unsatisfactory. She hardly ventures to pass any judgment on it herself. And she does indicate her surprise that a writer whose openly expressed convictions on the general sanctity of marriage appeared to incline so strongly in the direction of reverencing the marriage tie above almost every other social institution, should have adopted for herself a course so widely at variance with the apparent drift of those convictions. Speaking of the poem of "The Spanish Gipsy," Miss Blind says:—

"Nowhere do we perceive so clearly as here the profound sadness of her [George Eliot's] view of life; nowhere does she so emphatically reiterate the stern lesson of the duty of resignation and self-sacrifice; or that other doctrine that the individual is bound absolutely to subordinate his personal happiness to the social good, that he has no rights save the right of fulfilling his obligations to his age, his country, and his family. This idea is perhaps more completely incorporated in Fedalma than in any other of her characters—Fedalma, who seems so bountifully endowed with the fullest measure of beauty, love, and happiness, that her renunciation may be the more absolute. She who, in her young joy suddenly knows herself as 'an aged sorrow,' exclaiming:—

'I will not take a heaven
Haunted by shrieks of far-off misery.
This deed and I have ripened with the hours:
It is a part of me—a wakened thought
That, rising like a giant, masters me,
And grows into a doom. O mother life,
That seemed to nourish me so tenderly,
Even in the womb you vowed me to the fire,
Hung on my soul the burden of men's hopes,
And pledged me to redeem!—I'll pay the debt.
You gave me strength that I should pour it all
Into this anguish. I can never shrink
Back into bliss—my heart has grown too big
With things that might be.'

Surely, if these high sentiments mean anything, then, to one who held, as George Eliot certainly did, that on the sanctity of the marriage tie depend the highest bonds of social life, it should have been impossible to set the example which George Eliot set, an example which, as Miss Blind candidly admits, has tended to neutralise,—in all probability, indeed, has much more than neutralised,—the direct influence of George Eliot's own teaching. If the individual be "bound absolutely to subordinate his personal happiness to the social good," and if, as Miss Blind contends, George Eliot's writings "inculcate an almost slavish adherence to whatever surroundings, beliefs, and family ties a human being may be born to,"—an expression much stronger than any which we ourselves should have used,—the great authoress could hardly have dealt a severer blow to the moral influence of her writings than by personally setting at defiance that belief in the sanctity of marriage which, to do her justice, her stories most religiously inculcate. It is not enough to say, as Miss Blind says, that the companion whom she chose was already married, though his married life was over, and that he could not obtain a divorce. And we cannot understand how she, even without any reverence for the divine authority under which marriage usually shelters itself, can have held that it was really "subordinating her individual happiness to the social good," when she struck this heavy blow at the domestic morality of her country and her age. Miss Blind speaks strongly enough of George Eliot's own private convictions:—

"Circumstances prompted her to disregard one of the most binding laws of society, yet, while she considered herself justified in doing so, her sympathies were, on the whole, more enlisted in the state of things as they are than as they might be. It is certainly curious that the woman who in her own life had followed such an independent course, severing herself in many ways from her past with all its traditional sanctities, should yet so often inculcate the very opposite teaching in her works—should inculcate an almost slavish adherence to whatever surroundings, beliefs, and family ties a human being may be born to."

We cannot disguise our conviction that George Eliot, whilst holding up in her works a view of marriage not only noble, but almost sacramental in its strictness, deviated in her own life from her own high standard, without apparently having even the excuse of that engrossing and absorbing species of personal devotion which leaves its stamp on the entire life. The sequel of her own history makes its most important incident much more difficult than it otherwise might have been to interpret in any fashion consistent with the moral reverence with which George Eliot's tone on these subjects usually inspires us. Mr. C. Kegan Paul, in a biographical study of George Eliot which he has just published, is bolder on this subject than Miss Blind, for he speaks of her step in uniting her lot to a man whom she could not marry, as not one "for which there was need of excuse." We entirely differ from him, and agree with Miss Blind that we find the gravest reason in George Eliot's own writings to think that, whatever she may have believed her final decision to be, her own mind was never easy on the subject, and that she was always striving to make compensation in her works for the influence of her example. That, no doubt, was noble in her. Indeed, it is the unquestionable nobility of her writings which makes us grieve the more deeply for the still graver loss of her example. But that she did conceive of a far higher ideal of moral duty in this matter than any which she realised, we entertain no doubt at all. The truth, probably, is that her scepticism as regarded the divine authority of the most sacred of human institutions, unhappily sapped her practical reverence for that institution itself.

As regards George Eliot's genius, it is pretty clear that its chief defect was want of instinct, want of spontaneity, want of spring. Her voice, her style, her cast of thought were all somewhat heavily self-conscious. Her voice was musical, but severely graded. She intoned, rather than conversed. Her style was without ease, moulded into august sentences often painfully scientific. Her whole cast of thought was wanting in spontaneity. She believed too much in the power of elaborate reflection to reach truth, and assigned far too little importance to the vehement protests of those spiritual instincts which assured her that, in deference to one section of her intellect, she was browbeating what had more claim to intellectual authority than all the power of her skilful analysis. To our minds, she is never at her greatest when she is giving us her own thoughts. Her essays, her prologues to her novels, her satire, her chit-chat, her poetry, rich as they are in powerful thought, are prevailingly heavy, careworn, and weary in tone, without any victorious life in them. It is when she paints others, and chiefly when she paints those most different from herself, that she rises into a world of genius all her own. Her pictures of Dinah and Hetty, of Mrs. Poyser and Mrs. Cadwallader, of Mr. Trumbull and Mr. Brooke, of Tito and Tessa, and dozens of other characters, raise her to one of the highest levels of creative genius ever attained in English literature. But no sooner does she drop into the reflective and satiric vein, than she seems to us to fall heavily to the ground,—to become cumbrous, self-conscious, and sometimes even pedantic.

Mr. Kegan Paul, who knew her well, speaks of her countenance as reminding him of the countenances of Dante, Savonarola, and Cardinal Newman. But surely there was not that expression of passionate self-abnegation in her face which is in that of the two first, at all events, if not also in that of the great Oronian Cardinal. Miss Blind, on the other hand, gives a very odd hint of one of the elements in that expression, for which we were quite unprepared, and which, so far as our own knowledge goes, we should have entirely denied:—

"Besides M. d'Albert's Genevese portrait of George Eliot, we have a drawing by Mr. Burton, and another by Mr. Lawrence, the latter taken soon after the publication of Adam Bede. In criticising the latter likeness, a keen observer of human nature remarked that it conveyed no indication of the infinite depth of her observant eye, nor of that cold, subtle, and unconscious cruelty of expression which might occasionally be detected there."

Is there any authentic foundation for that criticism? There is certainly no trace of cruelty in George Eliot's writings, though there is of intellectual scorn, which is a very different quality indeed.

On the whole, we should say that Miss Blind's book is as good as we could have expected from a competent but not a brilliant writer who has not had access to any original biographic store of material, and who has been compelled, therefore, to produce a study of a life before the materials for that study were in her hands.

AMONG THE MONGOLS.*

We have a difficulty in passing judgment on this book. It is possible, even probable, that the impression it has made on us is individual to this reviewer, and due to an accident which, with other readers, will not repeat itself. He had taken up the book in idleness, and with a certain sense of disgust, due to its catchpenny binding, it having pleased the Religious Tract Society, in a fit of imbecility, to issue a record of Missionary life in bright blue cloth, slopped over with gold, a gold picture, gold names, and gold borders, all awry. It was impossible to hope anything from such a binding, or from a few sentences of banal religious reflection on which the reviewer's eye first rested. Having time, however, and an interest in nomads, he read a page or two, and read on, and read on, for five hours, till he had finished the book,—which is much too short,—fascinated, lost, carried out of himself and

* Among the Mongols. By James Gilmour, M.A. London The Religious Tract Soc.ety.

England. He was in Mongolia, sitting under a blue-cloth tent, with savage dogs howling around, and gazing outside, through the doorless doorway, on a vast panorama of poor tufted grass, stretching away to huge black hills in the distance, and Tartars on camels, Tartars on horses, Tartars on springless, unbreakable ox-carts, hastening up to the encampment; while inside he listened to a quiet Scotchman, resignedly yet clearly explaining everything in a voice—there was the puzzle. Where in the world had the reviewer heard that voice before, with its patient monotone, as well known as his oldest friend's, its constant digressions and "reflections," its sentences so familiar, yet so new, sentences which, as each topic came up, he could write before they were uttered. "James Gilmour, M.A." Never knew him, or heard of him; yet here was he, talking exactly as some one else had years ago talked a hundred times. So oppressive at last became the will-o'-the-wisp reminiscence, that the reviewer stopped, after an account of the Desert of Gobi, and deliberately read it through again, in search of a clue which might reawaken his memory. It was all in vain, and it was not till another hundred pages had been passed, always under the impression of that bewildering reminiscence, that he exclaimed to himself, "That's it! Robinson Crusoe has turned missionary, lived years in Mongolia, and written a book about it." That is this book. To any one who, perhaps from early neglect, does not perceive this truth, our judgment will seem erroneous; but to any one who does, we may quite fearlessly appeal. The student of Robinson Crusoe never expected that particular pleasure in this life, and he will never have it again; but for this once he has it to the full. Mr. James Gilmour, though a man of whom any country may be proud, is not a deep thinker, and not a bright writer, and not a man with the gift of topographical, or, indeed, any other kind of description. He thinks nothing extraordinary, and has nothing to say quotable. There is a faint, far-off humour in him, humour sternly repressed; but that, so far as we know, is the only quality in his writing which makes him littérateur at all. But Heaven, which has denied him many gifts, has given him one in full measure,—the gift of Defoe, the power of so stating things that the reader not only believes them, but sees them in bodily presence, that he is there wherever the author chooses to place him, under the blue tent, careering over the black ice of Lake Baikal, or hobnobbing in tea with priests as unlike Englishmen as it is possible for human beings to be, yet, such is his art, in nowise unintelligible or strange. It may be, as we have said, that it is an individual impression, but we never read, save once, the kind of book in our lives, did not deem it possible ever again to meet with this special variety of unconscious literary skill. We are aware of a dozen shortcomings, of a hundred points upon which Mr. Gilmour ought to have given light, and has not; but there has been, if our experience serves us at all, no book quite like this book since Robinson Crusoe; and Robinson Crusoe is not better, does not tell a story more directly, or produce more instantaneous and final conviction. Heaven help us all, if Mr. Gilmour tells us that he has met any unknown race in Mongolia, say, people with the power of making themselves invisible, for Tyndall will believe him, and Huxley account for them, and the Illustrated London News publish their portraits—in the stage of invisibility. We do not say the book is admirable, or perfect, or anything else superlative; but we do say, and this with sure confidence, that no one who begins it will leave it till the narrative ends, or doubt for an instant, whether he knows Defoe or not, that he has been enchained by something separate and distinct in literature, something almost uncanny in the way it has gripped him, and made him see for ever a scene he never expected to see.

We do not know that we have any more to say about the book. Its merit is that, and no other; and we do not suppose anybody ever proved Robinson Crusoe's value by extracts. But we must say a word or two about the author and his subject. Mr. Gilmour, though a Scotchman, is apparently attached to the London Mission, and seems to have quitted Pekin for Mongolia on an impulse to teach Christ to Tartars. He could not ride, he did not know Mongolian, he had an objection to carry arms, and he had no special fitness except his own character, which he knew nothing about, for the work. Nevertheless, he went, and stayed years, living on half-frozen prairies and deserts under open tents, on fat mutton, sheep's tails particularly, tea, and boiled millet, eating only once a day because Mongols do, and in all things, except lying, stealing, and prurient talk, making himself a lama. As he could not ride, he rode for a month over six hundred miles of dangerous desert, where the rats undermine the grass, and at the end found that that difficulty had disappeared for ever. As he could not talk, he "boarded out" with a lama, listened and questioned, and questioned and listened, till he knew Mongolian as Mongols know it, till his ears became so open that he was painfully aware that Mongol conversation, like that of most Asiatics, is choked with doubles entendres. As for danger, he had made up his mind not to carry arms, not to be angry with a heathen, happen what might, and—though he does not mention this—not to be afraid of anything whatever, neither dogs nor thieves, nor hunger nor the climate; and he kept those three resolutions. If ever on earth there lived a man who kept the law of Christ, and could give proofs of it, and be absolutely unconscious that he was giving them, it is this man, whom the Mongols he lived among called "our Gilmour." He wanted, naturally enough, sometimes to meditate away from his hosts, and sometimes to take long walks, and sometimes to geologise, but he found all these things roused suspicion—for why should a stranger want to be alone; might it not be "to steal away the luck of the land"?—and as a suspected missionary is a useless missionary, Mr. Gilmour gave them all up, and sat endlessly in tents, among lamas. And he says incidentally that his fault is impatience, a dislike to be kept waiting! In the real or Chinese Mongolia, the vast region between the Chinese Wall and the Russian frontier, half the nomads are lamas, priests, vowed from childhood to celibacy, and maintained for the most part by the labour of the "black" folk, or laity. They are vowed to the profession as children, but something in the national character also inclines them to that career. Mr. Gilmour thinks the Mongols have lost their courage since they swarmed out behind Tchengis and Timour Leng; and though we doubt that interpretation, seeing that Chinese dread Mongols, it is possible that the energy of the race was exhausted in those efforts,—that all the brave emigrated, settled abroad, or perished, and that the residuum became a changed people. At all events, the Mongol of to-day is in many respects a separate man, timid, yet given to long, lonely journeys over pathless deserts; habitually abstemious, yet a drunkard; a controversialist, yet superstitious; a thief by instinct, yet law-abiding; rough, brutal, and cruel—using torture, for example, to extort evidence—yet in one respect gentler than any European. Nothing can induce him to hurt an animal, however low in the scale of creation:—

"Nowhere will you find less cruelty than in Mongolia. Not only do their cattle and flocks receive expressions of sympathy in suffering, and such alleviation of pain as their owner knows how to give, but even the meanest creatures, insects and reptiles included, are treated with consideration. One of the best proofs of the habitual kindness of the Mongol is the tameness of the birds on the plateau. Crows perch themselves on the top of loaded camels, and deliberately steal Chinamen's rucks and Mongol's mutton, before the very eyes of the vociferating owners; hawks swoop down in the market-place at Urga, and snatch eatables from the hands of the unwary, who simply accuse the thief of patricide and pass on; and swallows, year after year, build their nests and rear their young inside the very tents of the Mongols. A Mongolian's pity seems to flow out freely towards the suffering of all creatures, even the meanest and most vexations. My bald-headed camel-driver was nearly driven to distraction one evening by a cloud of mosquitoes, which kept hovering over and alighting on his shining pate. During the night there came a touch of frost, and, when we rose in the morning, not an insect was on the wing. Looking at them as they clung benumbed to the sides of the tent, he remarked, 'The mosquitoes are frozen!' and then added, in a tone of sincere sympathy, the Mongol phrase expressive of pity, 'Hoarhe, hoarhe!' There was no sarcasm or hypocrisy about it."

This tenderness is the more strange, because the Mongols, in their few cities or standing camps, let beggars die of cold and exposure, though they never display the complete callousness of Chinese. The Chinese Government in Lama Miao, the great entrepôt, punishes highway robbery with violence by a sentence of death from starvation; and Mr. Gilmour saw this sentence carried out, the man being placed in a cage in the street, with his head outside, so that he might see the eating-shops, and die slowly of hunger and thirst. He was four days dying there in public. The Chinese citizens found this interesting, and strolled up every evening, laughing and jesting, to see the unhappy wretch suffer. "The feature of that Lama Miao crowd was the apparently entire absence of any commiseration or compassion in every one, young or old." To a people like the Mongols, entirely filled with belief in Buddhism, the life of a lama offers ease, freedom from cares, and future "merit," and they adopt it till, to the delight of the Chinese, who dread them, the population is kept too thin to be capable of combination. The Russians, who wish for population, will not stand the system, and contrive to keep the proportion of Lamas down to twenty per cent. of the whole, still a larger proportion of priests than any known elsewhere. Mr. Gilmour, though he has no prejudices, and gives Buddhism its full share of credit as a faith, is satisfied of the superiority of Russia to China as a civilising Power. She protects her people efficiently, and she raises the Mongols:—

"English travellers in Siberia sometimes sneer at the Russians there, as being only half-civilised. But it is the primitive simplicity of their style and manner of life that enables them to elevate the Mongol. Some of the Russian poor live very rudely. The difference between them and the Mongols is slight. The first upward step to be made in the social scale is so low, that many make it, and once begun, they go on. Buriats till the ground, work at handicrafts, and engage in trade, just as the poorer Russians do. Russians and Buriats live together on good terms, eating and sleeping together. The Buriats learn the Russian tongue, go to Russian schools, know what the Russians know, have all their aspirations in the direction of agriculture, manufactures, trade, learning, and Government service, fostered by the Government; and it is no uncommon thing to meet with respectable men, educated, intelligent, and wealthy, who were born mere Mongols, but who have been elevated to the civilisation and intelligence of the nineteenth century by the happy influence of the judicious measures adopted by the Russian Government for the amelioration of the condition of its more lowly subjects. One of the most interesting sights to be seen anywhere is the process of elevation."

In becoming Russian, however, the Mongols lose much of the simplicity which makes them free, and in their way happy. They wander on horseback with their flocks over the endless plain, live in tents which are only poles with blue cloth hung over them, wear sheepskin, and eat only one meal of meat a day, without bread or vegetables, except a little millet steeped in tea. When they want anything more, they go to China or Russia for it, thinking nothing of continuous journeys three months long, during which they receive hospitality in every tent. If the horses fall ill, they leave them to get better; if the camels get footsore, they mend their feet. "After the camels had travelled some days the soles of their feet began to wear through to the quick in one or two places, and had to be mended! The animal was thrown over on his side, his feet put up on a low stool, and the tender part covered by a patch of leather, which was held in its place by thin thongs drawn through the adjacent callosities of the sole. The animal's foot was mended very much as a cobbler mends a shoe." If thongs are wanting, they pluck hair from the horse's tails, and twist it into a strong thread, and thus, sleeping when needful in the open air, they could cross the world. They believe intensely in Buddhism, with its doctrine of "merits,"—that is, of virtuous acts carried to your credit,—and in the Grand Lama, the incarnate Buddha, who is found by the priests among the children, treated as half-God, half-King through his whole life, but controlled in secret by a Board of Lamas, who, if he shows signs of will, or realises, as has happened, his own complete ascendancy over the tribes, poison him, and find another. In all this there is nothing new whatever. The newness and the value of the book consist solely in its Defoe quality,—that when you have read you know, and will never forget, all Mr. Gilmour knows and tells of how Mongols live.

A NEGLECTED STUDY.*

THERE is no doubt that of late years the science of Political Economy has fallen into some disrepute in this country. We seem almost to have come to the conclusion that we have realised in practice as much of it as can be safely put into operation for the present, and the apparent inconsistency is observable of the science being least honoured where its precepts are most adhered to. In France, in Germany, and in Italy, where economical laws are violated with almost universal applause, their study shows considerable activity, but in England both publicists and public regard the subject with distrust and disfavour. The explanation of this anomaly is not far to seek. Either political economy is a science, or it is not. If it is, its conclusions must be true, universally and for ever. But recent legislation wears the appearance of being in opposition to its fundamental principles, and the notion has therefore got abroad that it is a science rather for the study than for the forum or the market-place. The mistake is a natural but a dangerous one. Two special difficulties beset political economy; the mass and complication of the facts it deals with are such as to render the drafting of its conclusions a most troublesome and perplexing task; and its connection with sociology on the one hand and politics on the other is so close, that a completely satisfactory definition and delimitation of its province verge upon the impossible. Hence the enunciations of its pundits have too often, during a period of great social and political change, been open to the comment both of the philosopher and the politician; and the apparent harshness of the science, especially in its pronouncements upon the universally interesting questions of labour and capital, wages and distribution, have brought it into evil repute with the masses of the people.

The study of political economy is, however, no less important now, than in the days of Mr. Bright's famous predecessor at Glasgow. Indeed, disobedience or neglect of its laws, which M. Say has recently compared with those of mathematics and physics, meets with a speedier and ampler retribution in the nineteenth century than at any previous period of history. Many, if not the majority, of the most interesting social questions that are pressing for answer can only be understood in their full significance, to say nothing of their being satisfactorily solved, by recourse to what has been foolishly termed the "dismal" science. A glance at the excellent little book before us will show the variety, the importance, the deep human interest of the problems with which political economy is concerned. In a modest preface, Mr. Milnes states his aim to have been simply the instruction of students preparing for the various university and public examinations. With that view he has collected some two thousand questions from the examination-papers in political economy set during the last decade, which he has arranged according to the main divisions of the subject, and as far as possible in an ascending order of difficulty, appending to many of them references to the works of the principal economists who have discussed the theories and problems involved in them. But the book appeals in reality to a far wider circle than that of University and Civil-Service candidates. Its pages are full of interest, and rich in suggestion for all who care to labour in the fruitful field where Adam Smith, Mill, Ricardo, and Jevons reaped such plenteous harvests. Even the general reader will find his curiosity awakened by many of the problems presented to his ingenuity, and no intelligent person can scan these pages without gaining some clearer perception of what the science of political economy really is, and of the vast importance to mankind of the questions with which it concerns itself. Gathered from many sources, and spread over a period of at least ten years, these two thousand questions, each of them embodying a test applied to a high order of candidates by an eminent worker in the subject, present an interesting and most instructive view of the actual condition of the science, and of the principal aspects of it which excite discussion. A number of moot points are brought together, very differently treated by different economists, sought out and formulated by the ingenuity of examiners for the purpose of testing both the knowledge and the original capacity of their candidates, and equally available for the purposes of those who have leisure and inclination to work out some of the many attractive problems of modern society. It is just such "moot points," such questiones vezatae, that, adequately considered, lead to a thorough comprehension of fundamental principles. Take, for instance, the difficult subject of capital. How is capital to be defined? Is credit to be reckoned as capital? Are unimproved land, muscular force, learning, skill, money, &c., to be considered as comprised in the term? Are human individuals capital, can there be a glut or excess of it, is the profit on its use necessarily diminished by a rise in wages? A variety of queries and concrete problems, many of which are very suggestive, bearing on these and other points connected with the subject, are given in the chapter on "Capital," and students, old as well as young, will find it a most instructive and by no means an unamusing task to work them out. It is curious that economists should have written so little on the value of morality as a kind of capital. Mr. Milnes finds only two questions on this matter. Mr. Bright lately complained that £4,400,000,000 sterling had been spent in wars by this country during the present century, an expenditure which represents only a portion of the loss induced by a laxity of international morality. The greater part of our annual civil budget is needed to ensure a rough and insufficient protection of person and property at home. The vast crowd of functionaries of all kinds—whose number the course of legislation, especially of regulative legislation, tends yearly to augment—the ever-increasing battalions of lawyers, whose costs remove justice further and further from the suitor, the expensive devices of all kinds necessary to furnish some sort of defence against fraud, constitute a most serious drain on the resources of the nation. It would be interesting to calculate the total cost in this country, less of actual crime and fraud than of their prevention, a much heavier item; the sum, we feel assured, would be of startling amount.

The questions gathered together under the heading "Free Trade, Reciprocity, and Protection," present a really valuable survey of the principal arguments used by the advocates of these doctrines, and those contained in the chapter on Trades Unions are even more worthy of attentive consideration. To any one interested in the last-named much-contested, and difficult subject, we can recommend the solution of the various problems connected with it which Mr. Milnes has here brought together. One of the questions goes to the root of the whole matter, and the candidate who answered it satisfactorily must have been a clever fellow. It is, shortly,—how far a miners' strike was justifiable that had taken place upon the owner's refusal to dismiss a non-Unionist collier? The question, set at an Oxford examination, appears to imply that the strike was, to some extent at least, justifiable. Of the miscellaneous questions, many are of a very suggestive character. We can only briefly indicate the nature of a few of them. The effect of custom on competition, an important inquiry, is the subject of some. Others deal with the economical results of an increase of the industry devoted to amusements, or with the ultimate incidence of the losses caused by the cattle-plague. The proportion between the cost of food, labour, and materials, four centuries ago, and the cost of erecting buildings at the same period, is contrasted with the like proportion at the present day; the principles are hinted at on which hospitals should be administered so as to avoid pauperisation; the economic results of the modern movement from status to contract—a movement in some important relations now under reversal—are inquired into, and many other subjects of permanent or passing interest are worked into questions often ingenious, but some of which must have sorely puzzled the candidates who had to answer them. What satisfactory reply, for instance, can be given to the question, "What are the natural laws relating to human wants?" An interesting query asks what checked mechanical invention in ancient times, and the editor pertinently appends the note, "Would a slave care to invent?" The development of inventive power in modern days, however, is more probably one of the many effects of the enormous increase in the intercourse of nations and individuals due to the perfection and cheapness of the various means of communication.

None of the questions bear upon the subject of statistics, nor are we aware of any treatise, except that of De Jounés, upon this important division or adjunct of economical science. Hardly any means of illustration or proof is more abused, owing to the almost universal ignorance of the mode in which statistics are obtained, of their scope and signification, of the fallacies that beset them, and of the proper methods of using and applying them. We trust that in some future collection Mr. Milnes may be able to include questions showing that the subject has received more attention. Meanwhile, we can heartily praise the one before us. Not only are the difficulties and problems of economical science admirably stated in this little volume, but the views of the more prominent schools of thought are also indicated, and the sources of information upon the points raised mentioned. A good deal of labour has been expended upon the work, which economists and publicists will find as valuable as it is unpretentious.

MR. AINGER'S "ELIA."*

LAMB has not been always fortunate in his commentators and critics. His acquaintances, indeed, have tried to preserve a faithful portrait of this incomparable essayist; and Barry Cornwall's recollections of his old friend are worthy of the writer and the subject. The subject should be treated modestly and tenderly, not for the sake of displaying a man's own acquisitions, but in order that the retiring virtues and exquisite art of a great humorist may be brought into the light more distinctly. Some years ago, an attempt was made to produce a complete edition of Charles Lamb's works, but, like Gillman's Life of Coleridge, it was left imperfect, a single volume only remaining to tell the world what might have been. We know nothing as to the cause of this failure, but the oppressive and elaborate brilliancy of the introduction which preceded the correspondence proved, we think, that the clever editor had in this instance mistaken his vocation. The reader is tempted to forget Lamb altogether, in the discursive talk about Lord Byron and Napoleon Bonaparte, about Pepys and Sterne, about Abelard and Heloise, about Horace Walpole, Thackeray, Dickens, and fifty other personages, ancient as well as modern, whose names, linked together like onions on a string, are intended, we suppose, to give a racy flavour to the essay. That they give it pungency is not to be disputed, but it is not every one who, like Porson, can drink spirits of wine, or swallow a bottle of embrocation.

Readers familiar with Mr. Ainger's biography of Charles Lamb, in "English Men of Letters," do not need to be told that his treatment of the essayist is wholly free from the defects to which we have alluded. Indeed, it would be difficult to find a greater contrast than the style of the essay on Lamb's life and genius published in 1868, and the judicious introduction to Elia in the volume before us. The editor writes with the perfect knowledge that springs from love, with the critical sagacity that is the growth of sympathy. He is doubly fortunate, first, in having produced a portrait of Elia that is likely to supersede all others, and then in publishing an edition of Lamb's choicest work with which no earlier issue can bear a moment's comparison. We cannot say that the appearance of the volume is entirely satisfactory. It is a pleasant-looking, but not a beautiful book; a book to be used, but scarcely one to be admired. Yet there is surely no writer who deserves better the lavish attention so dear to the bibliophile. The peculiar charm of the Elia essays is well defined by Mr. Ainger. The discursiveness of some writers is wearisome. Neither Burton nor Sir Thomas Browne is always a welcome companion, De Quincey can be tedious, and in some moods Southey's Doctor will irritate; but Lamb never delays us too long or carries us too far, we never feel that his good things would be better for compression, we are never inclined to say, "What a pity he had not the sense to stop at this point, or at that!" Free to do what he likes, to go where it pleases him, his joyous liberty—a boon merited only by great spirits—never degenerates into licence:—

"To 'wander at its own sweet will' was the first necessity of Lamb's genius. And this miscellaneousness of subject and treatment is the first surprise and delight felt by the reader of Lamb. It seems as if the choice of subject came to him almost at haphazard,—as if, like Shakespeare, he found the first plot that came to hand suitable, because the hand that was to deal with it was absolutely secure of its power to transmute the most unpromising material into gold. 'Roast Pig,' 'The Praise of Chimney-sweepers,' 'A Bachelor's Complaint of the Conduct of Married People,' 'Grace before Meat,'—the incongruity of the titles at once declares the humorist's confidence in the certainty of his touch. To have been commonplace on such topics would have been certain failure."

No writer, perhaps, was ever more indebted to books than Elia, and yet there is not an author of our century who is more original. He wears, apparently, an antique garb; but it is of his own weaving, and what he borrows he has a poet's skill to change and to adorn. Every lover of this unique humorist will agree with the following estimate of his style. After quoting a fine passage from the Old Benchers of the Inner Temple, "one of the most varied and beautiful pieces of prose that English literature can boast," Mr. Ainger adds:—

"It is in such passages as these that Lamb shows himself, what indeed, he is, the last of the Elizabethans. He had 'learned their great language,' and yet he had early discovered, with the keen eye of a humorist, how effective for his purpose was the touch of the pedantic and fantastical from which the noblest of them were not wholly free. He was thus able to make even their weaknesses a fresh source of delight, as he dealt with them from the vantage ground of two centuries. It may seem strange, on first thoughts, that the fashion of Lamb's style should not have grown in its turn old-fashioned; that, on the contrary, no literary reputation of sixty years' standing should seem more certain of its continuance. But it is not the antique manner, the 'self-pleasing quaintness,' that has embalmed the substance. Rather is there that in the substance which insures immortality for the style. It is one of the rewards of purity of heart that, allied with humour, it has the promise of perennial charm."

And now it may be as well, without dwelling on Lamb's special charm as an essayist, a subject which, although well worn, is none the less tempting, to state what Mr. Ainger has done to elucidate the text. The Essays, as all readers know, are frequently autobiographical; and they are full, too, as the editor points out, of mystifications. Lamb liked, as it were, to turn his facts and confessions upside down; and he had also "a certain natural incapacity for being accurate,—an inveterate turn for the opposite." Then he is fond of using initials, and Mr. Ainger has been happily able to identify the persons they stand for by a list filled in with the real names by Lamb himself. He can vouch, he states, for the handwriting, phraseology, and the spelling being indubitably Lamb's. When necessary, an account of these friends and acquaintances is given in the notes and obscure allusions to places as well as people are also cleared up. There may be no explanation that is singly of great importance, but the variety of explanations afforded gives a fresh interest to these invaluable essays. Even readers who pride themselves on their familiarity with Elia will gain some addition to their knowledge from the careful research of Mr. Ainger. What he has done is contained within a narrow compass, but it must have involved no ordinary amount of labour. In spite of every effort, he has been unable to verify some of the quotations, and it is possible they saw the light for the first time on Lamb's pages. Why should not he, like Walter Scott, have coined a verse, when it suited his convenience to do so? There are some mysteries in the Essays to which there is no clue. We scarcely know more of the fair "Alice W——n" than of Wordsworth's "Lucy." Some have regarded her as an imaginary being, but, in Barry Cornwall's opinion, the attachment so often hinted at was to a real woman. Mr. Ainger identifies her with the Anna of Lamb's sonnets, and in some respects also with his "Rosamond Gray." In the key to the initials already mentioned, he explains that "Alice W——n" stood for Alice Winterton, but adds that the name was feigned. Better, perhaps, that this one dream of love in Lamb's life should be treated as a dream, for such to all intent it became; and the editor rubs off a little of the bloom of the romance by saying,—"Her actual name was, I have the best reason to believe, Ann Simmons. She afterwards married Mr. Bartram, the pawnbroker, of Princes Street, Leicester Square." And so the "fair Alice" was concerned with other pledges than those of a poet-lover!

Lamb, like all men of large imagination, and therefore of human sympathy, had a dear love of children. It is one of the most striking traits of his character, and is seen in some of his best writings—what a tender heart must he have had who wrote the "Dream Children"!—and now Mr. Ainger supplies us with a new illustration of this delightful characteristic. The letter we are about to quote, not hitherto printed, was addressed, we are told, to a little girl (one of twin sisters), the daughter of Kenney, the dramatist, after Lamb and his sister's visit to the Kennys at Versailles in 1822. At the close of a short note to Mrs. Kenney, Lamb adds, 'Pray deliver what follows to my dear wife, Sophy':—

'MY DEAR SOPHY,—The few short days of connubial felicity which I passed with you among the pears and apricots of Versailles were some of the happiest of my life. But they are flown! And your other half, your dear co-twin,—that she—you,—that almost equal sharer of my affections, you and she are my better half, a quarter apiece. She and you are my pretty sixpence, you the head and she the tail. Sure, Heaven that made you so alike must pardon the error of an inconsiderate moment, should I for love of you love her too well. Do you think laws were made for lovers? I think not.—Adieu, amiable pair, yours and yours,

CHARLES LAMB.

'P.S.—I enclose half a dear kiss apiece for you.'

With this Elia-like notelet we shall do well to close this brief review of a volume that deserves a welcome in every English family. Lamb has secured his place as a classic, and few even moderately good libraries are without a copy of his works; but this new edition of Elia has claims which cannot be neglected.

THE STORY OF A PLAIN WOMAN.*

"My Trivial Life and Misfortune; a Gossip, with No Plot in Particular. By a Plain Woman. In three vols." This is the announcement which we read upon the title-page of the novel before us, and we proceed through the two first volumes (comprising 614 pages!) in the constantly confirmed conviction that we have herein read a full, true, and particular description of the work of the "Plain Woman,"—that it is a gossip, and nothing more, and that the woman is certainly a plain, and a very plain, woman indeed. But as we enter upon the third volume, we are compelled to alter our opinion, not as to the plainness of our heroine—certainly not—for that fact is more painfully forced upon us in each succeeding page, but as to the truth of the statement that the story contains "no plot in particular." We cannot admit this plea as to the third volume, though it is abundantly true of the first and second. But to begin with, may we be allowed a few words as to the plainness of our heroine? It would be unreasonable to complain because we are called upon to take an interest in the fortunes, or, as in this case, in the misfortunes of a plain woman—for many a plain woman is interesting, charming, attractive, she may even be elegant, or have beautiful hair, a musical voice, a redeeming smile or laugh. What is more charming in a woman than a sweet voice and melodious laugh? She may sing, or play, or paint, without interfering with her plainness in the least; or she may be highly educated, and a cultivated and interesting companion; but the Sophy who tells her own story in these pages is not one of all these things. Nature has not endowed her with a single attractive gift; not one external or mental charm are we allowed, to lend a grace to the young lady whose misfortunes we follow closely through 895 pages. She is, according to her own description, "common-looking, with fat cheeks, a double chin, a large and fat nose;" she is "short and stout, with no one good feature, with hair of no particular colour," and she is, we regret to add, pert—a fact which she does not herself seem to appreciate. She dwells, in a humiliating and abject manner, upon the subject of her personal appearance, and on the constant snubbing and neglect which she receives at the hands of all her friends and acquaintances, and she never gives us an opportunity of forgetting for a moment any of her social disadvantages. All this, we feel, is hard upon the reader, and we resent it warmly; such extreme uninterestingness is unusual in real life, and unnecessary and unpardonable in fiction. When we come to her mental powers, we find that Sophy cannot learn German; it is too hard for her. She cannot sing or play, and only once takes a few lessons in painting; her grammar also is of a doubtful character, and sins in omission, if not in commission; and many of her expressions are ugly, we might almost say vulgar. She speaks, for instance, of being "deadly sick" of this, that, and the other; she talks of "botherations" familiarly, instead of annoyances; we hear of "dowdy frights" or "old dows," "tall dashers," "carriages snailing along," &c. All this is to us very unpleasant, though it may be considered lively. The tone of the "good society" in which she lives is, we think, questionable, when two ladies, who are neither deaf nor dumb, talk to one another in the deaf and dumb alphabet in the presence of other ladies—strangers—at a ball. But we must desist from loading the already too much enduring Sophy with our censure, in addition to the trials which our authoress most unrelentingly piles upon her, from the first page to the last. Indeed, her life seems to be one long misfortune, which begins at her birth; for, brought up by a weak and good-natured mother, to whom, however, she is devoted, and an exacting Evangelical aunt, whom she cannot endure, Sophy acquires a flippant and displeasing manner of speaking of religious subjects generally, though she is herself an excellent young woman.

In the first volume, Sophy describes for us the small spites, envyings, triumphs and disappointments, slanders and back-bitings of the society in which she and her mother live together, after the marriage of "Aunt Jane" to "an excellent Christian gentleman of sound Evangelical views." All this is told in a very lively and amusing—perhaps we should better express our own opinion by saying smart—style, and to all those who are satisfied with the smallest chit-chat of gossip—as to how Miss Tutterton "interpreted classic" music, and was immensely applauded by "her set," to the great disgust of Mrs. Elmer-Elmer; or of how Miss Ermytrude Elmer-Elmer took her high notes, and thereby sent Lady Tutterton and her daughter sweeping out of the room in jealous rage at the applause of "her set," and especially of a certain Pasha, Houstapha Koustapha Bey; or of how Denis Rigardy-Wrenstone cut his aunt and cousin, and "walked about with his hat all on one side in search of his shirt cuffs,"—this volume will, no doubt, be very edifying.

In the second volume, we have an account of Sophy's life of intense, dreary, almost maddening monotony with her uncle and aunt, and a friend of her aunt's—the "admirable Catherine Sherbrook-Stewart"—at Sherbrook Hall. The only redeeming feature of this part of the story is that we become, in a quiet way, attached to the honourable, but narrow-minded and one-ideaed Uncle Sherbrook, whose character is the best in the book. We may say here that Sophy is remarkably unfortunate in her circle of acquaintance, for it comprises only six really honest, right-minded people in all, of whom only three are possessed of an average amount of common-sense, and only one of an average amount of will and independence. "Uncle Sherbrook" is a really interesting character, and so is his heir-apparent, his good, but weak-willed cousin, James Sherbrook, the rector of the parish. The tedium of this part of the story is relieved, but unpleasantly so, by a visit of Sophy's to a very fast and abominable set of people of the "quite-too-awfully-awful" type; and here she meets her future husband, David Scott, who being harassed by the exaggerated flirtation of the girl with whom he is in love, the beautiful, but unprincipled, Louisa Clarke. At the end of the second volume, the "trivial life" of the heroine may be considered over, and "the misfortune," par excellence, to befall her. In the first chapter of the third volume, she is married by David Scott for love, as she fondly supposes, but really for two wholly different reasons,—for the £30,000 which he hears she is to receive by her uncle's will at his death, and because Louisa Clarke has become engaged to Mr. Fred Tankney, of Tank Court. The plot of the third volume is twofold, and consists, in the first place, of the scheming together of the evil genius of the story, "the admirable and Evangelical Catherine," and the solicitor, Buggle, to defraud the natural heirs of Mr. Sherbrook; and, in the second place, of the endeavours of Louisa Clarke and "her set" to estrange David Scott from Sophy.

The authoress of A Plain Woman, as we find ourselves unconsciously styling this novel, is not more relentless to Sophy, and the few other honest, but most unfortunate people of her story, than she is to her readers, in refusing to pander to their hankering after a little poetical justice. She evidently acts on the principle laid down by Mark Twain in his treatment of "the good little boy who came to a bad end," and "the bad little boy who prospered," for everybody worth anything comes to grief, and all the company of evil-doers prosper, without apparently ever coming to the knowledge of what villains they are.

The book, however, is far from being without ability. The authoress evidently finds it easier to deal with extremes in character than to paint with moderation; but she does it with wonderful consistency; and each character, even the most unimportant, remains in the mind clearly defined and never straying off its lines. In The Plain Woman we have the extremely silent person, the extremely diffuse, the extremely rigid, the extremely lax, the extremely civil and the extremely rude, the extremely insincere flatterer, and the extremely honest and abrupt plain-speaker. Mrs. Rigardy-Wrenstone represents the last extreme, and a capital character she is. In Sophy we have the extremely devoted daughter, niece, and wife; almost always patient under circumstances of unparalleled provocation, extremely high-principled, and extremely plain. In Uncle Sherbrook we have the most rigidly honourable, kind, just, but narrow-minded man, who excites our respect always, and our pity and affection towards the end of his life. Perhaps his letter to Sophy is one of the nicest little bits in the book, and most characteristic of the writer. Sophy has been told by her Aunt Jane that her Uncle Sherbrook refuses to go to law with her nephew Denis, though "Denis has been teasing your uncle about the two oaks in the front avenue." Sophy is alarmed at this intelligence, "for," as she says to her husband, "when a man like Uncle Sherbrook no longer jumps at a law-suit, believe me, there is something radically wrong with his constitution." So she writes, inquiring anxiously after his health, and begging him to consult Dr. Daly. The following is his reply:—

"DEAR SOPHY,—You may be unaware that the Wrenstone and Sherbrook estates are somewhat curiously intermixed. Your aunt's nephew holding a part of his kitchen-garden and the piece of land covered by his flower-garden, from me; while I am forced to rent a small portion of my own lawn and front avenue from him. Your aunt's nephew has lately cut down some of the trees on his land. The two old oaks beside the front avenue were levelled to the ground early one morning, before there was time to apprise me of the trespass. I have taken the first opinion in London. Sir Wighead Pighead advises legal proceedings, and, moreover, says that I am entitled to heavy damages, the terms of my lease expressly annulling the landlord's right to cut timber until such time as the lease shall expire. Were I a younger man, I might perhaps be tempted to file a bill against your aunt's nephew, but I feel that at my time of life, the worry of such a lawsuit would be but a bad preparation for eternity. I cannot also refrain from reflecting that no lawsuit could make the old oaks grow again in my day. I have not had occasion to consult Dr. Daly, my health being no worse than my age should lead me to expect. When threescore years and ten are past, the earthly pilgrimage is over. I am glad to hear a good account of you and your husband.—I remain, your affectionate uncle, E. BREWEN SHERBROOK."

To sum up, then, in spite of the ability which the book undoubtedly contains, we cannot estimate it highly. It is, for the most part, a study of the poor, small and mean side of human nature, the amusement to be derived from which does not, we think, warrant the chronicling of it, especially where every germ of better things in the characters is immediately seized upon and stifled by the authoress, as though she believed in the ultimate triumph of Evil over Good. We should advise her to give up this theory,—if she holds it,—to take better materials, and then, with her talent, she ought to produce a book well worth reading.

JUBILEE LECTURES.*

If the Archbishop of Canterbury, as the representative of the Church of England, were to begin singing to himself,

"Oh, wad some power the giftie gie us
To see oursels as ithers see us,"

he could not do better than borrow these Jubilee Lectures of the Congregational Union of England and Wales; for they contain the deliberate opinions of some of the leading Nonconformists of the day on the polity, the character, and the prospects of the Church of England. The Committee of the Union disclaims in the preface any intention of controversy with any other religious body. "It" had no wish to turn the "grateful emotion which the retrospect of the last fifty years of Congregational Church life in England and Wales had evoked into polemical channels." But the lecturers, who were allowed perfect freedom in dealing with the subjects assigned to them, have not confined themselves to praising the polity they approve, or recording the work and progress of the "Congregational Churches," but have plunged one and all into the sea of controversy. Professor Fairbairn, for instance, whose introductory chapter is marked by considerable learning and ability, devotes twenty-one pages to an attempt to prove that the sacerdotal polity, by which he means the primitive organisation and government of the Church by bishops, priests, and deacons, had an evil effect upon the doctrine, the ethics, and the politics of the religion founded by Jesus Christ,—upon the doctrine, because it substituted "justification by sacraments" for justification by faith; upon the ethics, because it rendered impossible that "inwardness" which is the distinctive mark of Christian morality; and upon the politics, because it depraved the moral and social ideal of Christ and his Apostles, by dividing the Church into the two classes of laity and clergy, and by substituting official for moral distinctions. We do not intend, in the short space of an article, to controvert these propositions, which receive so much apparent support from the facts of ecclesiastical history during the centuries preceding the Reformation. But we may fairly ask for the "ecclesiastical polity" which during 1,800 years has continuously kept alive in the world the Christian faith, what Dr. Fairbairn claims in his first sentence for all Churches and societies, that it should be studied (and judged) "in its history, but through its ideals." The ideal of a Churchman is that of St. Paul, who compares the Church to a body, Ephesians iv., 16; or a building, Ephesians i., 21, in which each part, however small, ministers to the convenience and beauty of the whole.

But this ideal of a Church is also claimed by the Independent, according to Dr. Fairbairn, who analyses the ideas of Browne, Barrowe, Greenwood, Johnson, Ainsworth, Robinson, and Jacob, in four sentences:—

"A Church is a society of the godly, or of men who truly believe and piously live. It is a society expressly to realise in the personal and collective life the religious ideals of Christ. It is capable of extension only by means that produce faith, of development only by agencies that create godliness. It is autonomous and authoritative, possessed of the freedom necessary to the fulfilment of its mission, the realisation of its ideals, endowed with all the legislative power needed for the maintenance of order and the attainment of progress."

These articles remind us of the constitution of some of the South-American Republics, so perfect on paper, so unrealisable in practice. For in the first lecture, on the early Independents, we are informed (p. 16):—

"How long he [i.e., Browne, the founder of Congregationalism] remained in Middleburg is uncertain. But within a year, a quarrel broke out between Harrison and himself; the Church was split into parties; all attempts to restore peace failed."

* Jubilee Lectures. A Historical Series, delivered on the occasion of the Jubilee of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. 2 vols. London: Hodder and Stoughton. 1882.

And again (p. 19), it is said of Barrowe, "one of the most famous of the early Congregationalists," that the relations between him and his friends, and those who acknowledged Browne as their leader, are extremely obscure and perplexing. Greenwood had no more respect for Browne's opinions than Browne felt for his. This lack of unity, this constant liability to schism, which must necessarily ensue when each little society of three or four believers, however ignorant its members may be, claims the exercise of supreme authority and absolute discipline, is frankly acknowledged by Mr. Dale as the weak point of Congregationalism. Yet, as Tertullian exclaimed, "Credo, quia impossibile," so Mr. Dale may say of his ideal system, "Amo, quia impossibile;" for the possible, he tells us (p. 53), is hardly worth living for.

From the history of the early Independents, with whose struggles for religious freedom one cannot but feel sympathy, we are conducted by different writers through the periods when Laud tried to stamp out Puritanism, when the Erastians, the Presbyterians, and the Independents attempted to settle their differences in the Jerusalem Chamber, when the Independents had a brief triumph under Cromwell, when they were again oppressed by the cruel acts of Charles II. and the restrictions of the Georgian era.

In the able essay with which the second volume opens, we are reminded of the attempts which have been made in the past at comprehension, and of the reasons why such attempts always have and always will fail. It has frequently been a dream of generous minds, that by adopting the principle of Victorinus, "In necessariis unitas, in dubiis libertas, in omnibus caritas," all men who call themselves Christians might be able to worship and to work together. It is possible that many a sermon of Mr. Spurgeon's might be preached in St. Peter's, and many speeches of Archbishop Manning might be redelivered in the Tabernacle on the south of the Thames. Yet to the end of time men have differed and will differ as to what is "dubium" and what is "necessarium," and, moreover, will lay more stress on those points on which they differ than on those on which they agree.

It seems as though truth were not merely circular, but globular, so that it is impossible for any society or individual to view it in its entirety. It has been our hope and belief that to each sect, however small, has been entrusted some seed of truth which it is bound in duty to cultivate. The design will appear at last when each has worked out its own portion of the great mosaic. From a careful perusal of these Jubilee Lectures, we have come to the conclusion that the portion of truth which the Independent has to preserve, is the right of the individual conscience to judge and act for itself in religious matters. This, no doubt, is an important truth. The recognition of it would have saved Europe from centuries of bloodshed. But there is no truth, political, scientific, or religious, that can be carried without peril to its extreme logical limit. It is and must be conditioned and balanced by other truths.

If we may refer to the Old Testament, the most lawless period of Jewish history was during the time of the Judges, when every man was allowed to do that which was right in his own eyes. The outbreaks of religious fanaticism in the sixteenth century, and even in our own time, show to what extravagancies men and women may be led by the promptings of a diseased conscience.

Some suffering for conscience' sake, or some deference to authority, is absolutely needed for the preservation of order in the State, or of peace in the Church. Except in the chapter above quoted, on the early Independents, we have no information as to the practical working of the Congregational system. In that lecture (Vol. I., p. 36), it is laid down "that for an individual to resist the judgment and power of the Church was to incur an awful risk." There might be circumstances in which the resistance was necessary; but if he resisted the Church, when the Church was acting under the control of the law of Christ, he was resisting Christ's own authority, and would suffer terrible penalties. This statement agrees in the main with the fifteenth section of the lecture by Mr. Rogers, on "Clericalism and Congregationalism."—

"Our ideas of the prerogative of the Church are as exalted as his own [i.e., Professor Blunt's]. We hold the prerogative of the Church to be supreme in its own sphere; but we differ with him as to the Church, as to the sphere over which its rule extends, as to the foundation on which its authority rests. Our contention is that every society, if believers in the Lord Jesus Christ, united together for fellowship, worship, and work, is a Church, and that in it all the authority which belongs to a Church is vested. . . . Christ is wherever his saints meet in his name, and the presence of Christ makes the Church, and gives its decision validity and force."

We will suppose, then, that three earnest, conscientious, Christian men, say, Brown, Smith, and Jones, form a Church. In due time, Brown has an infant son, whom he wishes to be baptised. But Jones and Smith come to the conclusion that this little child cannot, in accordance with their ideas of the meaning of Scripture, be baptised. And Brown has to accept this, and any other decision of his two brothers, as the decision of the Church, or to resist it, at the "terrible risk of being excommunicate and cut off from fellowship with Jesus Christ." We may be bigoted, but it does seem to us that the consensus of the holiest men who have lived on earth since the time of Jesus Christ is more worthy of deference and respect, than the crude and often hasty judgments of one or two converted and well-meaning people, from which there is no appeal. We have no space to refute the numerous errors that are to be found in these lectures as to the Church of England,—e.g., that she has made a dogged, senseless, and godless opposition to every measure of progress.

What the Congregationalists would have done well to prove is not that the Church of England or the Presbyterians are wrong, but that they themselves are right. Let them, instead of abusing other forms of Church organisation, and raking up old sores, which, we trust, are in process of healing, out-teach, out-preach, out-pray, out-live all other communities in holiness of life, in their love for the fallen, the degraded, and the out-cast; and their next series of Jubilee lectures, to be delivered fifty years hence, will be hailed by all as a record of work done for the sake of him in whose name they meet together.

THESE two magnificent and fascinating volumes, which have been admirably translated and edited by Mr. Walter Armstrong, are "the first instalment of an undertaking which has for its aim the history and critical analysis of that great organic growth which, beginning with the Pharaohs and ending with the Roman Emperors, forms what is called antique art." In themselves, however, they form the most complete contribution to the scientific study of Egyptology which has yet appeared in this country. M. Perrot, who is mainly responsible for the literary portion of them, amply recognises the value of the labours of M. Maspero and of Mariette Bey; and Mr. Armstrong has done well to do for the English public what Professor George Ebers has done for the German, and, it may be added, to call to his aid Dr. Birch, Mr. Reginald Stuart Poole, and Miss A. B. Edwards. Before the late Egyptian Expedition, a stimulus was given to Egyptology by the discovery at Thebes, immediately after the accession of Professor Maspero to the Directorship of Egyptian explorations, of thirty-eight royal mummies, with their sepulchral furniture. This occurred after the completion of M. Perrot's work, but was in Mr. Armstrong's opinion the result of one of those inductive processes of which M. Perrot speaks as characteristic of modern research. Mr. Armstrong has, in an appendix, given a short account of this discovery, and of some of the art objects which it has been the means of adding to the Boulak Museum. We have, indeed, but one fault to find with the special work of Mr. Armstrong, and that will be regarded as the reverse of a fault, by those who think that the sole duty of a translator is to stick to his text. He might have taken a few more liberties than he has done with the rhetorical exuberances of M. Perrot. He might, above all things, have reduced to a fourth, if not a tenth of its present proportions, the original Introduction, which, eloquent and full of antiquarian learning though it is, somehow recalls one of those long "graces before meat," with the "reduction" of which good-taste and sound ideas as to reverence have had even more to do than the light but wholesome humour of Charles Lamb.

Two passages in this work may be quoted as giving between them a key to the whole. M. Perrot tells us (Vol. I., p. 38):—

"The art of Egypt resembled that of Greece in being a complete and catholic art, seeing everything and taking an interest in everything. It was sensitive to military glory, and at the same time, it did not scorn to portray the peaceful life of the fields. It set itself with all sincerity to interpret the monarchical sentiment in its most enthusiastic and exaggerated form; but while it placed Kings and Princes above and almost apart from humanity, it did not forget 'the humble and meek;' on the contrary, it frankly depicted them in their professional attitudes, with all those ineffaceable characteristics both of face and figure which the practice of some special trade so certainly imparts. Looked at from this point of view, Egyptian art was popular, it might even be called democratic, but that such a phrase would sound curious when used in connection with the most absolute monarchy which the world has yet seen."

Again (Vol. II., p. 176), we are told:—

"It may seem to some of our readers that we have spent too much time and labour on our analysis of Egyptian architecture. Our excuse lies in the fact that architecture was the chief of the arts in Egypt. We know nothing of her painters. The pictures in the Theban tombs often display great taste and skill, but they seem to have been the work of decorators, rather than of painters in the higher sense of the word. Sculptors appear now and then to have been held in higher consideration. The names of one or two have come down to us, and we are told how dear they were to the Kings who employed them. But the only artists who had a high and well-defined social position in ancient Egypt, a country where ranks were as distinctly marked as in China, were the architects or engineers, for they deserve either name. Their names have been preserved to us in hundreds, upon their elaborate tombs and inscribed shells."

Looked at in the light of the former passage, these two volumes are in reality a representation of the history of Egypt, and of the life of the Egyptians,—that is to say, of the true Egypt, and the true Egyptians. We quite believe that in the best days of their history the Egyptians were tolerably happy, contented, and prosperous; the original gaiety of the country flashes out still, as M. Perrot reminds us, in the animal spirits of the Cairo donkey-boy. That the architecture of Egypt reached a genuine perfection of its kind, the admirable and abundant illustrations of M. Chipiez conclusively prove. Yet there is a chilling monotony and poverty of design about it; nor are we quite sure that it is adequately explained by the difficulties under which the artists laboured, and the character of the materials at their disposal.

About a third of this work is devoted to the sculpture, painting, caricature, the decorative, and industrial arts of ancient Egypt; but in reality, and leaving architecture out of consideration, sculpture in stone and wood was the one Egyptian fine art. And the characteristic of that art in its first stage was realism of the most startling, complete, and merciless character,—the realism of "The Sheik-el-Beled" at Boulak, of the pair Ra-hotep and Nefert, and of "The Scribe," who, as coloured in these pages, looks even more human than he does in the Louvre. "The realism of the Egyptians," says Mr. Armstrong in his preface, "was a broad realism. There is in it no sign of that research into detail which distinguishes most imitative art, and is to be found even in that of their immediate successors; and yet, during all those long centuries of alternate renaissance and decay, we find no vestige of an attempt to raise art above imitation. No suspicion of its expressive power seems to have dawned on the Egyptian mind, which, so far as the plastic arts were concerned, never produced anything that in the language of modern criticism could be called a creation." That is true, and we prefer Egyptian Art at its oldest, and as exemplified in the figures we have just mentioned. The idealising effect which religion usually produces on art seems to have been but slight in Egypt; at all events, the kings, queens, and sphinxes who stare at one from M. Perrot's pages are simply so many representations, not of "anointed dignity," but of anointed ugliness. There may be said to be one exception to this rule,—that of the female head discovered by Mariette at Karnak, and believed to be that of Taia, the Queen of Amenophis III. But then it is doubtful whether Taia was of Egyptian blood; Mariette thinks not, and believes that, as her husband's empire extended to Mesopotamia, she might have been Asiatic. Even in the case of Taia, there is nothing of the character of idealisation. What we have is simply the realistic representation of the face of a charming woman, who might have been an Aspasia. Can we offer no better explanation of this want of creative or idealising power in Egyptian art and Egyptian religion than the old one,—"Paupertina philosophia in paupertinam religionem ducit"? The explanation may be historically true, so far as it goes; but then, it goes such a provokingly little way.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Merry England, May, 1883. (Publishing Office, 44 Essex Street, Strand.)—This new magazine is, at all events, well edited, and the opening article, on "The Young England Party," by Mr. Saintsbury, is extremely well written. He ignores, however, the leading defect of the Young England Party, that while it adopted good secondary reforms, it opposed all those substantial primary reforms without which the good secondary reforms would have been of no use. It tried to feed the hungry masses on whipped-cream and tipsy-cake. The etching of Mr. Disraeli addressing the House of Commons is admirable. The little tale called "Miss Martha's Bag" is a very skilful and touching one, and Mr. Blackmore's quaint verses on "The Blackbird" are interesting and original. So are the verses—which we extract—on "Primrose Day," which have a flavour in them of Coventry Patmore, though we object to the line "That unappropriated yet," as the most prosy we have seen in verse for many a day:—

"PRIMROSE DAY.
Why dedicate the primrose lowly
To this proud Pillar of the State?"

In fields of asphodel
His shadow flits—we know it well.
The amaranth and moly
Besem him wholly.
A bolder flower and more complex
Will better mate his mind ornate,
His affluent fame,
Than this which, timorous, decks
Our April fields, and flecks
Our April forests with faint flame.

But even as when
The Seer passed out of sight of men,
And people cried:
'What flower shall shroud him?' Nature's self replied:
'Take ye the pale primrose
That, unappropriated yet, (With the meek violet—Imperial chosen!) blows
In his beloved woods at Hagheuden.'
So says our England at this hour
Of him who gave to her his dower
Of strange romance and effort strong,
And purpose that outdid his power,
And service half-a-century long:
'He was not of our clime nor race;
The Orient owned his speech and face;
His mind was Eastern as his mien.'
Yet, since he served our England true,
And won the worship of our Queen,
Henceforth we hold him one of us
In thought, in feeling, and in fame,
By linking our familiar flower
For ever with his name."

On the whole, this magazine promises to be a social success.

An Old-Testament Commentary for English Readers. Edited by the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol. Volume II. (Cassell and Co.)—This second volume contains the books from Deuteronomy to II. Samuel. The first-named book, together with Joshua, has been annotated by the Rev. C. H. Waller, Judges by Canon Farrar, Ruth by the Rev. R. Sinker, I. Samuel by Canon Spence, and II. Samuel by Professor Gardiner, of Middletown, Connecticut. The work of all these contributors, while varying in character and, to a certain extent, in value, seems to be well suited for the purpose in view. The "English reader" will get the information he wants in a convenient form. Difficulties, too, are fairly met. Saul's ignorance of David's person in I. Samuel, xvii., 55, for instance, is well explained. We notice a curious oversight in page 180. The age of Jacob at his death was 147, not 130 years. The latter number gives his age when he came into Egypt, and he survived that event seventeen years (Gen. xlvii., 28).

Evolution and Creation. By H. Boase, M.D., F.R.S. (J. Long and Co.)—The author of this work describes it as "a thesis maintaining that the world was not made of matter by the development of one potency, but by that of innumerable specific powers." An argument of this order needs every aid that it can gather from directness of expression, clearness of thought, and mastery of scientific fact. Deficiencies in these qualities are conspicuous in the volume before us, and will prevent the majority of scientific readers from considering the cogency of the objections which Dr. Boase urges against the doctrine of evolution. It is difficult to believe that any writer can seriously say, in this last quarter of the nineteenth century (p. 112), "Nor is there any reason to believe that the air which we breathe derived its oxygen in any considerable proportion from vegetation, which probably consumes as much and even more than it produces." And again, "The mutual convertibility of natural forces rests on unverified assumptions" (pp. 113 and 227); or, "Ether is pure matter . . . a binary compound of the physical powers, attraction and repulsion" (pp. 217, 218); "Are molecules and chemical elements the same thing? I think not; the thing analysed is not matter, but chemical compound; and the products obtained are not diverse kinds of matter, but those of various elements, the constituents of this compound." Scores of quotations of the same character might be made, but the four above given may be regarded as sufficient and fair specimens. Even where Dr. Boase's argument, though it be not new, is expressed with some force, as in the chapter on vitality (pp. 95-120), we find the old fable reproduced concerning the Theban mummy wheat germinating, after having lain dormant for ages! We wish we could honestly have said some commendatory words about the contents of this well-printed and comely volume, for the object with which it has been prepared is a worthy one,—the defence of revelation. We ought not, however, to allow ourselves to be irritated by the defects of this book, after the discovery that its author was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society so long ago as May 11th, 1837.

Idler and Poet. By Rossiter Johnson. (Osgood and Co., Boston.)—These verses are not all bad. There is a dash of imitation in them, now of Longfellow and now of Præd, and the best of them, "A Rhyme of the Rain," has something of Edgar Poe, and just a faint suggestion of Clarence Mangan in it. The imitation is lively, and some of the conceits are amusing. We do not remember ever to have met with a more flagrant example of bad-taste than one piece in this volume: it is called "An Indian Love-song," and it would be witty, but is simply coarse and repulsive. There is no humour in such lines as,—

"And to beguile the voyage, if thou wilt come aboard, Till sunset fire the waters the fire-water shall be poured ;"
OR AS,—

"A thousand thoughts from thy dear hide are knotted round my soul."
The refrain of the song is very unpleasant:—

"Then clad in noiseless moccasins the feet of the years shall fall, For I will cherish thee, my love, till Time shall slip us all."

Mr. Rossiter Johnson's little volume contains one or two samples of his better mind and manner that ought to have secured the exclusion of this sample of his worse.

Judæa and her Rulers. By M. Bramston. (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.)—The author of this work explains that its object is "to give a connected view of the history of the nation of Israel between the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar and that by Titus, for the use of such persons as have not access to libraries where books containing the necessary information on the subject may be procured." What that necessary information is may, doubtless, be a matter of opinion; but inasmuch as it is probably not intended absolutely to restrict the use of the volume to the unfortunate persons alluded to, we regret that the author has not appended, for the benefit of the unlearned who may wish to learn, a short list of standard works dealing more fully with various portions of the subject. To such works the present book might well form a useful introduction. We believe that the history of the Jews is sure, sooner or later in life, to rouse some interest in all intelligent people, and that the interest usually tends to increase rather than diminish, as more information accumulates. Assuming this to be the case, it would be gratifying to see a book like this, which presents a general outline of a most attractive section of history, so planned and equipped as to constitute the first step in a progressive study. Having said so much, we gladly acknowledge that the author has written a fairly adequate summary of the various relations between the Jews and those nations under whose influence they successively fell. It appears to be, on the whole, sufficiently well adapted to the class of readers in view, who, we may infer from the tone observable in certain passages, which have a strong flavour of the Sunday-school class, are expected, as a rule, to be young. If this hypothesis is correct, we will not complain of the somewhat didactic manner occasionally assumed, nor object too seriously to the awfully imaginary pictures which embellish the chapters from time to time. The style has, at least, the virtue of simplicity, and the strong good-sense of sundry incidental remarks, the clear recognition of the complexity and contradiction in human character, and the excellent use made of the Apocryphal Books, deserve full credit. These merits go far to redeem the occasional tendency to assume the attitude of a preacher, and will certainly give the book a higher value than could have belonged to a mere compilation of facts.

Rienzi: an Æsthetic and Historical Poem. By T. Stanley Rogers, B.A., LL.B. (Ponsonby, Dublin; Pearce, Southport.)—"Among the most vicious effects of the modern crusade against those forms of faith and aspiration which have hitherto preserved in varying degrees of development the co-operation of individuality with society, may be observed an increasing tendency towards limitations of individuality by the intolerance of majorities," &c. When the reader has mastered "The Argument," he will, perhaps, be sufficiently inflated with self-complacency to go on with the poem. It will not reward him.

Coming; or, the Golden Year. A Tale. By Selina Gaye. (Seeley, Jackson, and Halliday.)—This is a story of German religious life, very enthusiastic and speculative; full of yearning for the Millennium, and hopes of "the brightness of His Coming," who has tarried long. There is some good writing in it, but the story, as a whole, is, we should think, much over the heads of the young people who are supposed to be its readers.

The Causation of Sleep. By J. Cappie, M.D. Second Edition. (James Thin.)—It would be manifestly impossible to do adequate justice to Dr. Cappie's argument in a brief notice. But we may commend his clearly written essay on the causation of sleep to those of our readers who are interested in this difficult but interesting subject. The essay before us was published in a different and less perfect form long ago, but the present book is almost a new work, so largely has it been augmented and altered. We do not venture to pronounce in favour of Dr. Cappie's views as to the balance of the distribution of blood within the cranium (rather than an alteration in its amount) corresponding to the sleeping and waking states, but his statements are worthy of attentive study. An exquisite chromo-lithograph represents the circulation in the comatose and in the waking retina.

A Study; with Critical and Explanatory Notes of Alfred Tennyson's Poem, "The Princess." By S. E. Dawson. (Sampson Low and Co.)—Very critical, highly explanatory, rather pompous, and quite unnecessary. "The Princess" is not a mystery, and Mr. Tennyson has displayed the great charm of lucidity to peculiar advantage in that work. The loving labour of these explainers of the meaning of the men who of all others explain themselves best, is a ridiculously apposite realisation of the French proverb that tells us how needless it is enfoncer une porte ouverte.

The Little Princess. From the German of E. Marlitt. Translated by Blanche E. Slade. (Remington and Co.)—Without feeling that The Little Princess possesses any extraordinary merit, we must most sincerely condole with her author on the singularly clumsy dress in which she has been presented to the English public. A great many people seem to think that the merest smattering of a foreign language entitles them to translate books out of it, but at least such people generally have a fair knowledge of their own tongue. Miss Slade apparently has not, and the result is much more curious than agreeable. The story she has tried to translate is one which, with certain variations of time and place, has been told over and over again. There is a young girl brought up in the country, a gentleman of middle-age who falls in love with her at first-sight, an absent-minded father; various persons who draw the girl into difficulties, from which her elderly lover rescues her, and a faithful old servant to whom she flies, in order to be brought back by the said lover. But this particular heroine is so very wild and childish, that she evidently ought to have been seven, instead of seventeen; and it passes even the most indulgent novel-reader's powers to believe that Mr. Claudius's "large, blue, fiery eyes" could have seen anything attractive in her. In fact, "it is incredulous," as one of the characters pertinently remarks; and after that we are not surprised to read that "she contemptibly pushed aside some fine, embroidered sheets," and did a great many other odd things. There is one word, apparently a favourite with Miss Slade, her authority for which we should like to know,—it is "scrouched." "The bolt scrouched as it was pushed;" "the gravel scrouched." She ought also to explain what she means by "the game of La Grasse," which does not quite suggest the same idea as "the game of La Grace;" why she chooses to say "Frankish," instead of "French;" and why, when Mr. Claudius has just shown some acquaintance with horses, he should be said to have "a knowledge of cavalier manners."

Nights at the Play. By Dutton Cook. 2 vols. (Chatto and Windus.)—Mr. Dutton Cook has collected in these volumes some hundred and fifty theatrical criticisms, contributed during the years 1867-1881 to the Pall Mall Gazette and the World. No man has a higher reputation as a dramatic critic; he is above the suspicion of partiality, a failing which is probably at least as common among the critics of the drama as among the critics of literature, and he has unrivalled qualifications in his knowledge of the past of the English Stage and his familiarity with the present. The two volumes contain a record of the best things that have been seen in the London-theatres during, we may say with fair approach to accuracy, the last fifteen years. The present generation will find in them not only a vivid and agreeable refreshment of their own recollections, but a store of sensible criticism; to generations to come they will be an invaluable store-house of information. Nor is it impossible that the theatrical history which he relates will seem to those generations to contain events not less important than those which Hazlitt commemorated, "the advent of Edmund Kean and the triumphs of Miss O'Neill." It is interesting to note that, in the performances criticised by Mr. Cook, we find sixteen of Shakespeare's plays, half of them being tragedies and half comedies. Othello and Hamlet occur three times in the table of contents, Romeo and Juliet and The Merchant of Venice and Richard III. twice.

The Medical Language of St. Luke. By the Rev. W. K. Hobart, LL.D. (Hodges, Figgis, and Co.)—This elaborate treatise discusses with much learning and acumen the arguments in favour of the position that the Gospel according to St. Luke and the Acts of the Apostles were written by the same person, and that the writer was a medical man. Dr. Hobart cites the usage of medical words in narratives and descriptions which do not deal with subjects connected with disease. He shows how the writer of the Gospel of St. Luke and the Acts imported medical language into accounts in which other New-Testament writers did not use it. The references to the works of Hippocrates, Aretæus, Galen, and Dioscorides are very full. A good index and a critical table of contents add largely to the value of the work, which is, moreover, carefully printed. Dr. Hobart's treatise is published in the Dublin University Press Series.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL on Monday resumed the adjourned debate on the Affirmation Bill in a clever speech, which he commenced by taunting Mr. Gladstone with his obscure dissertations on mediæval divinity,—Lord Randolph appeared to think that Augustine, Origen (whom he pronounced "Origen"), and Jerome, all lived in "the middle ages,"—and then continued by launching into an elaborate dissertation on the analogy between Judaism and Arianism, a creed which he appeared greatly to favour, and described in a flight of most original theology as an improved form of Judaism. Lord Randolph's inquiries into the life and times of Athanasius had quite convinced him that, so far as it was lawful to pry into the causes of religious progress, "it was as much owing to accident as to anything else that the whole of Europe at the present moment was not Arian." The orthodoxy of the West "depended entirely on the caprices of a despotic Emperor, the intrigues of an Oriental Court, and upon the hairbreadth escapes of an adventurous Bishop." He went on into a close imitation of Mr. Disraeli's defence of "the Semitic principle," but did not attempt to show why the Jews, who, if they be true Jews, must hold Christ to be an impostor and blasphemer, should have any more claim on Christian sympathies than the naked unbeliever who has never believed enough in God to regard the case of Revelation as even plausible. It is true that Judaism stands to Christianity in a certain relation, but it is the relation of the morning twilight to the day; and, when the day has come, the eye that prefers the twilight must be regarded as longing for the night.

Mr. Labouchere followed, with a lively speech, in which he remarked that Lord Randolph's chief object had been to prove that it was he on whom "the mantle of Elijah had descended," though of the new Elisha Mr. Labouchere had formed evidently no very reverent estimate. He illustrated the value of the present oath, by stating that there were gentlemen in that House who had themselves told him that they had never taken either the oath or the affirmation; and he pointed out that the admission made by the Conservatives, that an Atheist might take the oath unless he happened to have specially communicated his atheism to the House of Commons, really meant nothing but this,—that they would look through their fingers, like a marine-store dealer at stolen goods. The debate then became very languid, and was concluded on Monday by Mr. Stanhope, who urged that if the popular opinion of the moment was against the Affirmation Bill, that was the final and absolute court of judgment, from which there was no pretence for appeal,—a curious sentiment for a Conservative, and one savouring strongly of the principles of the plébiscite.

On Thursday, the debate was resumed by Mr. Newdegate, in a speech which was a variation on the well-known song, "Pity the sorrows of a poor old man!" indeed, a threnody on his hard fate, in being worsted, by Lord Coleridge's judgment, on the question between him and Mr. Bradlaugh. Then the most remarkable speech of the evening was made by the Solicitor-General,—a speech calm, clear, vigorous, in which he exposed Lord Randolph Churchill's blunder in relation to the construction of a repealed statute, of which he had treated the preamble as the operative part, and which, being directed solely against persons converted from Trinitarianism, he had treated as if it applied to Atheists. The Solicitor-General expressed his profound conviction that to insist, as at the time of the relief of the Jewish disabilities, on the omission of the words "on the true faith of a Christian" as an abandonment of the national recognition of Christianity, was infinitely more plausible than to insist now on the admissibility of affirmation as a rejection of God, and concluded a very remarkable speech by a strong plea for the admission into Parliament of men who have already been relieved from their conscientious difficulties in Courts of Justice.

The rest of the debate was not very impressive, except that Mr. O'Brien naïvely suggested that Members who found difficulty in swearing allegiance to Queen Victoria, and who would have been very glad to admit conscientious Atheists into the House, if conscientious Republicans could be admitted on the same easy terms, were not going to aid the Government in relieving the former, and in refusing relief to the latter. In other words, Mr. O'Brien, who had scruples about taking an oath in a non-natural sense, but had got over them, would not hear of relieving the similar scruples of others. Mr. Goschen made a vigorous attack on the Conservatives for their party use of religion, to which Sir S. Northcote replied in a very moderate speech, deprecating the discussion of this subject on party lines; and Lord Hartington closed the debate, in a vigorous but very ill-reported plea for the Bill. The Bill was then thrown out, by 292 votes against 289,—majority against the Government, three.

The Liberals who voted against the Government were the three Messrs. Fitzwilliam (South-West Riding, Malton, and Peterborough), none of whom explained their remarkable vote; Sir E. Watkin (Hythe); Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens (Finsbury); Mr. Montague Guest (Wareham); Mr. Jerningham (Berwick), who expressed himself, we believe, in his canvas in favour of the Affirmation Bill, but has since been subjected, it is said, to a great deal of Roman Catholic pressure from behind the scenes; with Mr. Nicholson (Petersfield), and Mr. Foster (Bridgnorth), troglodytes, who seldom lose an opportunity of entering a cave, however small and inconvenient. Further, a few Liberals copied the example of Mr. S. Morley, who stayed away from the division, and whose remorse, it is said, for having helped Mr. Bradlaugh's candidature once, now takes the remarkable form of assisting the party which is making a martyr of Mr. Bradlaugh, and so spreading his views broadcast through the country. Mr. S. Morley's remorse is even more mischievous to his religion than the sin for which he feels that remorse.

Two remarkable incidents have occurred in the course of the Irish trials. Fitzharris ("Skin the Goat"), the carman who drove the murderers of Lord F. Cavendish and Mr. Burke, has been acquitted by the jury. Nobody doubted his presence in the Park, and he may have been guilty; but there was no evidence that he was a consenting party to the murder, except his own interference, and no one can tell what was in his mind. The Judge pointed this out strongly to the jury as a defect of legal evidence, and Fitzharris was very properly acquitted, subsequently pleading guilty to the charge of being accessory after the fact. The next two prisoners were Thomas Caffrey and Patrick Delaney, and both pleaded guilty; Delaney pleading that he was betrayed into the affair, and that he had save Judge Lawson's life. He added, "What Kavanaugh," the carman, "states is perfectly true, and what James Carey states is true; but I took no act or part in it. It was Brady and Kelly committed the murders, and no other person." This unpremeditated confession, so strongly supporting Carey, has created a deep impression, as Delaney is a very different character from the informer, and did, it would seem, save the Judge. Both prisoners were sentenced to death, but it is not likely that they will receive capital punishment, though their solicitor stated that no inducement had been held out to them, and that they had pleaded guilty in defiance of his advice. Caffrey also affirmed that he had been sent to the Park without warning, and would have been put to death if he had not obeyed his orders. The whole incident shows the necessity of treating the entrance into these Societies as a criminal offence, and completely justifies the Roman Church in its extreme severity towards all who enter such communities.

The Irish-American Convention at Philadelphia on Friday week passed unanimously a number of resolutions, declaring, among other things, that the English Government "has no moral right whatever to exist in Ireland"—the consent of the majority of Irish representatives having apparently no meaning—and that it is the duty of the Irish race throughout the world to secure "national self-government" for Ireland by all "legitimate" means. The Irish-Americans, therefore, merge all Societies in one "Irish National League of America," for "the purpose of supporting the National League of Ireland, of which Charles Stewart Parnell is President." The members of the Convention also resolve that they honour Mr. Parnell the more because Mr. Forster attacked him; that they sympathise with the Irish labourers, and demand on their behalf from the farmers a fair day's wages for a fair day's work; that Irishmen ought to buy only Irish and American goods; that the English Ministry, in first reducing Irishmen to pauperism, and then sending them as emigrants to America, is unnatural and inhuman, and should be resisted by the Government of the States, who should prohibit the despatch of Irish paupers; that Mr. Patrick Egan is "a sturdy, undaunted patriot and prudent custodian"—what of it is not stated—and finally, that as a "brutal Government" compels large numbers of Irishmen to emigrate, they must be warned of the snares of poverty in large cities. A governing Council, with one member from each State, was appointed; and Mr. Alexander Sullivan, of Maine, thirty-five years of age, and born an American, was elected president. He is a lawyer, and has once, the despatch-writers say, been tried for murder, but was acquitted.

Mr. A. Sullivan has, it is said, stated that, while the League does not contemplate warfare, which is outside its organisation, it considers warfare for Ireland as lawful as the warfare for the Thirteen Colonies. The League, however, still trusts in peaceful means, and will forward the funds it collects to Mr. Parnell, to be used for the relief of distress, and "for keeping up agitation." The practical outcome of this programme is that the Irish-Americans propose for the time to support Mr. Parnell, but will not condemn those who would resort to much more extreme measures; and the effect will be that Mr. Parnell, to keep his position, must enter on some sort of new campaign. The resolutions point to an agitation for the labourers, but as this will irritate all farmers, and only farmers vote, this will soon be given up, and Mr. Parnell may be thrown back on his Parliamentary resource, Obstruction. The party under his control has, since the American meeting, shown a decided increase of spirits.

Egypt has probably been delivered from a serious danger by the victory which Colonel Hicks, in command of the force in the Soudan, has gained over the followers of the Mahdi. He was attacked on his march to Obeid by about 4,000 men, but the Egyptians held firm, and the enemy fled, leaving 500 dead. The affair was probably not a general engagement, but it will have two important effects. It breaks the prestige of the Mahdi among his followers, and it removes the danger of the Egyptian troops going over to the Pretender. Whatever else is uncertain about the expected "Messenger," it is certain that he is expected, as the immediate Agent of Allah, to win his battles; and that if he does not, true Mussulmans will wait until the right man appears. The troops engaged were most of them the old Egyptian soldiery, who thought their despatch to the Soudan part of their punishment.

At the meeting of the Wordsworth Society, on Wednesday, which was held in the Deanery, Westminster, Mr. Matthew Arnold presided, and delivered one of his eloquently humorous and humorously eloquent speeches on the genius of Wordsworth. He had reached an age, he said, at which it became a man to spend much of his time in reviewing his past life, and striving after the final exaltation and amendment of his own character. In old times, one in his position would have entered a monastery. It was not possible for him to enter a monastery, but the next thing to it that was open to him was probably the step he had taken in joining the Wordsworth Society. The monastic life involved vows of poverty, of chastity, and of obedience. To join the Wordsworth Society was to submit oneself to the spirit of Wordsworth, and the spirit of Wordsworth had consecrated "plain living and high thinking," the severity of a crystal purity, and a reverent submission to the authority of higher and nobler minds. His address, unfortunately delivered on a day when there was much else (much of it of less significance) to report, has received little notice from the Press, but was curiously felicitous, and passed from gentle badinage to true criticism by those delicately graded transitions of which Mr. Arnold is one of the few living masters. Interesting papers were also read, one written by Mr. Aubrey De Vere, on the highly-charged personality of Wordsworth's poems, and one by the Rev. Stopford Brooke, on the poetical feeling exhibited in Wordsworth's "Guide to the Lakes."

The National Liberal Club, which was opened on Wednesday with great éclat by a magnificent banquet at the Westminster Aquarium, where some 1,900 members, representing at least 400 English towns, sat down together, showed that it understood the exigency of the hour, by passing a resolution at a preliminary meeting calling upon the Government not to prorogue Parliament till it had passed all the measures named in the Queen's Speech, in spite of obstruction. At the dinner, which was served under brilliant electric lights—blue, yellow, and crimson, lights which have, however, this disadvantage, that the muffled sound of the engines which supply the electric force materially aggravates the already very bad acoustic properties of the place as a hall of audience—Mr. Gladstone's reception was enthusiastic in the extreme, hundreds of ladies in the long galleries and the nineteen hundred assembled members of the club waving their handkerchiefs with unanimous desperation for some five minutes together, when he entered and stood up to speak. Lord Granville, Mr. Gladstone, Lord Rosebery, and Mr. John Morley were the principal speakers,—Lord Granville remarking that a seat in the Cabinet was at least a good stage-box from which to watch the drama of politics, and describing the impression made upon himself by the political obstruction which had taken place. He commented in strong language on the terrible danger to the Constitution involved in this damming-up of the stream of legislation, and on the ruin which a Conservative mind might reasonably anticipate from the time of reaction, when the torrent would break down the dam and sweep away many of the ancient landmarks.

Mr. Gladstone opened by remarking on the strange device assumed by the Conservatives for a new Conservative journal,—a picture of the beautiful clock tower and clock of the Houses of Parliament. It was curious because, the merit of a clock being to keep good time, the Conservatives would hardly be expected to appreciate that merit, inasmuch as it was the invariable rule of the party to be many years behind time. For instance, they had within the last few days been parading their tardy sympathy with Catholic Emancipation, which was carried fifty-four years ago, and with the removal of Jewish disabilities, carried twenty-five years ago, they having been the steady opponents of both these reforms at the time when they were first carried. From this Mr. Gladstone passed into a review of his own Administration since taking office in 1880, and of the manner in which the Government had dealt with the legacy of embarrassments left to it, for which he claimed at least a respectable amount of success. But the cream of his speech was his very lucid comparison of the financial achievements of the triennial period 1877-1880, under Tory administration, and the triennial period 1880-1883, under his own. He began by admitting that the total expenditure of the first three years was 253 millions and a half, while the total expenditure of the last three was 259 millions, leaving an apparent balance against the Liberal Administration of five and a half millions of expenditure. But deducting in both cases the expense of collecting the revenue, this balance against the Liberals is reduced to about three and a half millions, instead of five and a half millions, and that without reckoning how much of the expenditure went to pay-off Debt. Deducting repayment of Debt, as not constituting true expenditure, but only saving in disguise, the balance is turned from one of three and a half millions against the Liberals to one of eight and a half millions in their favour; which, again, when increased by the three millions handed over to India on account of the Afghan war, in which India had been improperly and unscrupulously involved, swelled the amount in favour of the Liberal Government to eleven and a half millions. Mr. Gladstone went on to claim the Egyptian and South-African expenditure of the present Government as an obligation handed down to them from their predecessors. But without taking that into account, the financial comparison between the two Governments is remarkable enough, and favourable enough to the present Administration.

Lord Rosebery and Mr. John Morley both made speeches of interest, Lord Rosebery quizzing the Tories for their attempt to represent their party as the true friends of popular measures, and Mr. John Morley insisting that England was the only great Western State which had not suffered a revolution during the last twenty-five years, and that she owed that immunity from revolution wholly to the steady increase of the popular power in this country. Instead of fearing agitation, Mr. Morley invited it, being more and more assured that it was the deficiency of ready communication between the constituencies and the House of Commons which alone rendered the existing system of deliberate obstruction possible, not to say easy. The whole demonstration was a most impressive one.

On Wednesday, Mr. Bright, for the first time in his life, attended the annual meeting of the Liberation Society. After the formal proceedings, in which the abolition of the Scotch Church was strenuously urged, as the first work to be done, and Mr. Dillwyn received quite an ovation for his proposal to disestablish the Church in Wales, an evening meeting was held, and Mr. Bright spoke. He declared that his purpose was not to injure the Church of England, but to terminate its union with the State, which, as he maintained, injured both. So far from the union making the State more merciful and peaceful, the Bishops, the picked men of the Clerical body, voted for the cruel old criminal laws, under which sixty-seven crimes were capital, defended the slave-trade and slavery, and were never to be found resisting war. Indeed, they had accepted a prayer in which the Egyptian Expedition, with its bloodshed, was attributed to the Lord. The Established Clergy resisted the Burials Bill and the abolition of the Theistic oath, "many more men being willing to worry Government than to honour God," and they keep thousands of families in misery by resisting a reform of the marriage laws. He entirely admitted the virtues of thousands of State clergymen, but could not believe they would be worse or less efficient, if separated from the State. An Established Church "was the slave of the State," and when Establishment was abolished, as it would be, it would look back with horror upon the chains from which it had been delivered. The speech, though containing little that is new, was heard with the deepest silence and attention, and Mr. Bright's voice reached every ear in his great audience.

The Duc de Broglie on Tuesday brought forward the question of the Tripartite Treaty in the Senate, in a speech which was really a declaration of policy. He asked the Government whether the alliance was or was not menacing to France. He feared it was, though France had given no provocation, either to Germany or Italy. The idea of an alliance with Russia had ended, and surely the Government was anti-clerical enough to secure Italy against any machinations from that side. Still, there was the alliance, no doubt in form defensive; but then sometimes the mode of defence adopted was attack. "Whenever a Power meant to attack, it could always find its Kroumirs." He therefore thought concentration of force the first duty of the Ministry, and deprecated the foreign expeditions to Tonquin and Madagascar, which could not be made successful without sacrifices both of men and money. The speech was intended, of course, to discredit the Republic, which has certainly not succeeded in diplomacy, partly from its distrust of the old diplomatic men; but its drift in some degree justifies Prince Bismarck's idea that Germany has more to fear from a Restoration than from a Republic. The Duke suggests, with a certain truth, that a Monarchy would set itself to find allies; and French alliances or coalitions are precisely what Prince Bismarck dreads. He has repeated again this week, through the North-German Gazette, that the Republic, even if ill-tempered, is safer than a Monarchy in France.

The reply of M. Challemeil-Lacour was in one respect a singular one. He denied official information of the alliance, stating that French Ambassadors could only know what they were told, and they had not been told about this. He thought "rapprochement" would be a better word than "treaty" to define the agreement, and maintained that it had existed for some time, and was not directed against France. She took no umbrage at it, and conforming to the exigencies of the present time, would seek no alliance with any Power, but would endeavour to live on good terms with all. It was natural that a country which had been conquered, which was seeking recovery, and which was surrounded by young and ambitious Powers, should be solicitous, or even anxious; but that only imposed the duty of watchfulness upon the Government, and watchful the Government would be. "Silence, in certain circumstances, was dignified." This speech is said to have been favourably received everywhere, and more especially in Vienna, where they are by no means anxious to begin a quarrel à outrance with France. Prince Bismarck is an invaluable ally, but might he not, think the Hapsburgs, grow a little,—well, a little insupportable?

Sir W. Lawson on Friday week carried his resolution in favour of Local Option by 206 to 130. His idea is that the inhabitants of districts should have power to abolish all public-houses in their districts, if they please; but his supporters in the division do not all mean this. The Government, for instance, favoured the resolution, but Sir W. Harcourt explained that what they intended to do was to entrust the power of regulating the grant of licences to the municipal and rural Councils. It is now entrusted to the Magistrates, and is, Sir W. Harcourt said, quite absolute, the licences having been recently decided in court to be annual grants, and the Magistrates having power to refuse them all. The Government, therefore, propose a mere transference of power; but they did not intend that this should be exercised through a popular vote. The right must be conceded to permanent bodies elected by the people, and enjoying their confidence. Until, therefore, the County Government Bill has been passed, it will be impossible to do anything in the matter. Mr. Gladstone pointedly added that the views of the Home Secretary were his also, and that when he was enabled to create municipalities over the whole country, the control of the liquor traffic would be confided to them. "The views of the Government were settled." We suspect, when action commences, it will be found necessary to name an irreducible minimum in the Act, or the local council may find itself suddenly besieged by bodies of navvies or other labourers crying aloud for beer.

The Victoria-Street Society for the Protection of Animals from Vivisection held a very successful meeting on Tuesday, at the house of Lord Mount-Temple, the Earl of Shaftesbury in the chair. The Bishop of Oxford discussed at it the meaning of Dr. Lyon Playfair's principle that "man's duty to man is greater than his duty to beasts," and maintained that to subordinate absolutely man's duty to the beasts to his duty to man, would necessarily be subversive of his duty to man itself, since it would extinguish in him that spirit of compassion for suffering, as suffering, which could not be extinguished anywhere, without being weakened everywhere. Mr. George Russell, M.P., and Mr. Reid, M.P., reviewed the recent debate, and showed how little the Home Secretary appeared to understand the working of the Act which he had to administer, and how alarming was his statement that he intended to be guided in its administration by the Association for the advancement of Medicine by research, a mere Association for promoting Vivisection, so far as it can be promoted under the present Act; and Lord Coleridge made one of his profoundly impressive speeches against the principles and doctrines of the friends of Vivisection.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE DEFEAT OF THE GOVERNMENT.

THE English people have many fine qualities, but a steady reasonableness is not one of them. They cannot emulate the Scotch and Welsh here for a moment. The Scotch and Welsh are both very religious, but they can see what really injures religion and what does not, and are not misled by superficial appearances. The English, on the other hand, are subject to somewhat spasmodic impulses, and like bolting horses, are very apt to take the bit between their teeth, when they find that it guides them in a direction in which they do not want to go. The dislike to Mr. Bradlaugh,—founded, we believe, even more on other publications of his than on his atheistic opinions,—has been so rampant in many constituencies, that English Members, no doubt sharing this dislike to the full, and caring very little how far they could or could not justify on principle the vote which they wished to give against him, have done Mr. Bradlaugh a very great service, in the effort to express their aversion. They have set him up as a persecuted man for another spell of two or three years, and have given all the vogue they can to those peculiar opinions on the subject of religion and morality for which they desire to express their loathing. They have done a very foolish thing, whether they voted against the Affirmation Bill, or whether they adopted that very weak and unmeaning course of refusing to give a vote at all; and before many weeks are over, they will probably bitterly regret the impulse which led them to take the bit between their teeth and bolt. But there will always be plenty of Englishmen to act on irrational impulses, even when they know in their own minds that the impulses on which they act are not sane ones, as they pique themselves on these impulses,—in other words, on the unsteadiness of their own judgments. And the only hope is that as the influence of education is brought to bear more and more upon England, Englishmen will feel less proud of their unconquerable disposition to ignore the bridle of reason, and bolt under the influence of panic where it is least safe for them to go. We are aware, of course, that these remarks do not in all probability apply to such Members as Messrs. Fitzwilliam, Sir E. Watkin, and Mr. McCullagh Torrens. They have voted with their eyes open, no doubt from sheer dislike to the Government, and not from dislike to a particular application of the principles of religious liberty. But it was the impulsiveness of their constituents that alone rendered it safe for them,—safe, at least, in their own estimation,—to express their dislike to the Government in this way; and so long as the English people are what they are, they will constantly furnish excuses to their representatives for helping the cause they would prefer to defeat, and undermining the cause they want to help. English public opinion has none of the steadiness of Scotch and Welsh public opinion. Liberals in Wales and Scotland know what they mean and do it, and so do the Conservatives. In England, neither Liberals nor Conservatives, as a Party, always know exactly what they mean; and even if they do, they will sometimes follow their humour, and do the opposite. Their convictions are only some of the elements on which they act. Not unfrequently, they will act against their convictions to express an irrational but overwhelming aversion. Some of the English and many of the Ulster Liberals have acted thus on the occasion of the Affirmation Bill, and if we judge rightly, the result will be most mischievous to the cause they have at heart. We do not in the least blame the Irish Home-rulers, Catholic or otherwise, for seizing the occasion to do what they think will injure a Government which they cannot forgive for its various efforts to do justice to Ireland. They have acted on the supreme instinct of their political being, and by that they are to themselves justified. But the English and Ulster Liberals have, by their desertion or abstention, done all in their power to weaken the hands of the only Government from which they can get the measures they really want, and that, too, with the result of extending the power of the man whose mischievous influence over the country they wish to blot out. They will soon repent their blunder, and their constituents will repent it still sooner. For we regard the vote of Thursday night as likely to cripple the Government very materially, not only in its conflict with obstruction, but in its general moral influence.

We conclude that after Sir Stafford Northcote's pointed remark that he deprecated the attempt to discuss the question on party lines, there is on neither side of the House the smallest wish to make a political crisis out of the defeat of the Government. Why the Conservatives do not wish this, it is not very easy to see. Probably Sir Stafford Northcote knows that a dissolution on an all but accidental question of this sort, even if he could force one, would give him a following of a very unsatisfactory kind; and perhaps his ascendancy in the councils of the party is not yet securely enough established over that of Lord Salisbury to render an immediate crisis desirable. But however this may be, it is clear that Sir Stafford in his very moderate speech of Thursday night did intend to deprecate as much as possible any party aspect for the division, and it is obvious enough that the Liberals will not court an appeal to the country on a matter on which the drift even of Liberal opinion is so vacillating and capricious. But none the less it seems to us idle to deny that the Government have received a blow from the effects of which they will hardly recover before they have gone to the constituencies again, and that their own policy should now be shaped with the view of rendering possible an appeal to the country as speedily as is consistent with the pledges they have already given. We do not for a moment think that they should give up the Tenant-farmers' Compensation Bill, for that is a matter on which their opponents will hardly venture to join serious battle; and it is, moreover, one of great urgency in the present condition of agriculture. It is most desirable, too, that the common impression of the indifference of the Liberals to the welfare of the farmers, should not be confirmed by any apathy on a practical matter so pressing and so definite, and we earnestly hope that this measure will be pressed on with all convenient speed. But as regards the rest of the Government programme, we hold that they would do well to drop all reforms which essentially require a strong and united party,—like the Government of London Bill, for instance,—and which are not very well understood by the public at large, in favour of those on the character of which a very strong opinion will be formed by both parties in the country, and on which an appeal to the country is far from improbable. We all saw in the Government of 1869-74 how completely the defeat of the Government on the Irish University Bill paralysed it for general work, and how soon after that defeat the collapse came. If the Government go on with a long programme of measures of somewhat local significance, for passing which they require great authority, without possessing it, they will fritter away their influence, as they did in 1873. The only course to be pursued now, as it seems to us, is to prepare as soon as possible the greater political measures promised by the Government,—especially the County Franchise Bill and the Redistribution Bill,—and thereby to quicken the popular interest felt in an Administration which has suffered this serious shock. No Government in England undergoes a blow of this kind without suffering in influence, and we do not believe that even Mr. Gladstone's Government will be an exception. The vote of the House of Commons has declared that, in the opinion of the majority of that House, the effort which the Government made to defend the cause of religious liberty was not demanded by the circumstances, and partook rather of the nature of unjustified sympathy for Mr. Bradlaugh than of respect for the principles of religious liberty. We all know, of course, that this opinion is a false opinion. We all know that Mr. Gladstone, in his magnificent speech, expounded the true ground for the action of the Government; but it is impossible for a Government which has failed to convince the House of Commons of this, to command the same influence after the hostile vote as it commanded before it. The only wise course, therefore, is to press on as soon as possible the larger political measures with which the Government is identified, and to appeal to the people, if necessary, upon the character of those measures. Let us not again make the mistake of allowing the confidence of the country to ooze away in dribblets, while the Government is pressing on difficult and complicated measures, the significance of which will not be fully realised in the provinces, though they expose a great surface to the opposition of open foes and of disaffected allies. A shaken Government should concentrate its efforts on those larger issues on which alone the country will rally to its aid.

THE NATIONAL LIBERAL CLUB.

IT is simply ridiculous for the Tories to object to the National Liberal Club, whose opening was celebrated on Wednesday, as a kind of Supreme Caucus. They have had the thing in full operation for years. There is not a Tory Agent in the country, or a Tory working politician, who does not look to the Carlton as a centre, from which advice and aid and, in certain cases, motive-power can be obtained. The Political Committee of that Club is a supreme caucus for that party, with this peculiarity, that it is independent of Tory electors, instead of representing them. The only innovation introduced by the Liberals in founding the new Club, is that they make it more genuinely popular, that the provincials, instead of visiting a shrine, are to come to a home, and that the London politicians, instead of being hosts and superior hosts, will be comrades in council, with valued visitors. That deviation from the old routine seems to us most wise. There are two impediments in the way of organising the vast masses of voters who now bewilder statesmen which all parties in all countries, if they desire power, must remove. One, the extent of which men living in a capital can hardly conceive, is the difficulty of making the true leaders known to the people,—accurately known, known so that rumours and calumnies have no weight. One would say that, with public speeches incessantly going on, with the public men incessantly “starring” about, and with the journalists pouring out volumes of criticism, the work would be easy enough; but all experience shows that it is not so. In America, the trouble drives politicians to such despair that unless they can catch a successful General, like General Grant, they prefer a dark horse, as being, at all events, less sure to be misunderstood. In France the electors know no one, except the head of the State, or an exceptional man like Gambetta; and even in England the difficulty distinctly contributes to the one-man ascendancy, which since 1867 has marked our politics. The people knew Lord Beaconsfield and they know Mr. Gladstone, but they could not remember the names of the Tory Cabinet, and do not recollect half the Liberal one. Lord Hartington has the advantage of his rank, which induces Englishmen to take much for granted; but just ask ordinary voters in that huge province, Lincolnshire, where Cabinet Ministers never speak, their idea of Lord Hartington? He will be Premier before they know anything about him. The National Liberal Club will help greatly to dissipate that kind of ignorance. The average voters will not attend it, of course, but their delegates will, and each man who comes up to town and haunts it for a week will, on his return, be to his own circle a trusted News-letter embodied in the flesh. He will have a distinct conception of a dozen men who before were names to him. Every leading man has not, of course, the personal magnetism of Mr. Gladstone, which so impressed the host assembled on Wednesday, that if the Dissolution arrived next week, that one dinner would have a perceptible effect on the results, but every leader worth obeying has an impressiveness of some sort, which is felt most in personal contact with him. Lord Hartington, for instance, a totally different man from Mr. Gladstone, never speaks without increasing his influence. The second difficulty, when personal contact has been established, is that of keeping the electors en rapport with the shifting state of affairs. They are sure, even when intelligent, to be a little behind; to expect something which cannot be done; to have missed some argument which, if they heard it, would seem irrefragable; to be under some illusion, which ten words of rough sense would dispel. There is no device tolerable by English manners for curing that evil equal to a London Political Exchange, where information can be procured, and people seen, and country politicians with a certain social timidity, but very useful, can feel themselves in place. The National Liberal Club will give all that, and we only wish that more Ministers had been able to be present, and to make speeches in the least formal and cumbrous way.

We do not know that the speeches actually made on Wednesday were specially good, though they impressed the audience mightily. Mr. Gladstone's short but carefully prepared sketch of the actual facts as to the comparative finance of Tories and Liberals, with its really wonderful lucidity and adaptation to the knowledge of the audience, had, no doubt, a profound effect; and so had the speeches both of the Foreign Secretary and the Premier, on the “veiled obstruction” which is stopping work. The latter helped greatly to clear the minds of men who do not watch the House closely, of a latent idea that the Cabinet lacks energy, and could force its Bills through, if it would. They brought home to the audience the truth that in the House of Commons, as everywhere else, the day has only twenty-four hours, and that if twenty-four men are allowed to waste an hour apiece and are determined to do it, no time for anything will remain. They deepened the perception that a remedy must be found for the evil, and that it will not be found unless the constituencies will enable, or if need be compel, their representatives to take very strong measures indeed. To our minds, that is now the first question of British politics. We deliberately believe Parliamentary Government to be in danger of asphyxia, and would, rather than see the danger continue, consent to radical changes, such as the true “Clôture,” the formation of a Speaker's Committee with most extensive powers over procedure, and a serious reduction in the existing number of the House of Commons. It is evident, from the speeches of Wednesday, that the danger is engrossing the attention of statesmen, and the words used in the Aquarium were well adapted to make provincial delegates realise fully the central fact of the political situation. They saw that the Tories did not intend business to go on. But beyond this, which was most important, we do not know that there was much said. The leading speakers missed or refused the chance offered of speaking on the Liberalism of the future, and they were compelled, in speaking of the past, to dwell, except as regards finance, on generalities. The total drift of all said was that the Government had inherited a bad situation, and had, on the whole, extricated the country from it; and that was patent before, to all who can see. Still, the audience saw the facts more vividly than before, and they went home enthusiastic, with a conviction of the vitality and movement of the Liberal party stronger than the one they brought. That is a most valuable result, and one which, as time goes on, those who govern England must seek even more attentively than they do. It is a hard burden to put upon them, but they will be compelled to do more educating work than they have attempted, to visit unvisited districts, and to visit them in groups. We should like to see the experiment of two or three meetings, large and cordial as that at the National Club, tried in a county like Lincolnshire, with the distinct intention of letting light into that county, and breaking the prestige of pretentious windbags like Mr. Chaplin. We believe it could be done, and that if all electors could only be made to realise what the Liberal Ministers are like, and what they really mean, the Government might dissolve even on a question like the Affirmation Bill, and still strengthen their majority. Wire-pulling, we may depend on it, has had its day. A popular constituency must be conciliated by popular means, and the best of those means is argument directly addressed to thousands of representative men, by speakers who are responsible for acts, as well as words. Speeches may not change votes in the House of Commons, though even that is not true, but they most unquestionably change them in the country.

MR. VILLIERS STUART ON THE CONDITION OF EGYPT.

THE Government has evidently made up its mind not to retire from Egypt in a hurried manner, or without the fullest evidence that its objects have been accomplished. The few and short sentences in which Mr. Gladstone on Wednesday, in his speech at the Aquarium, referred to the situation of affairs there, made as they were, in the presence of so many who dislike the Expedition, show that he was both conscious of the difficulty of his task, and determined to discharge it. Lord Dufferin is even more emphatic. In the complimentary letter to the Egyptian Premier with which he took his leave for Constantinople, he allows himself gradually to glide from pleasing assurances and rose-coloured descriptions into sentences of serious warning that the new system “is destined and intended both to succeed and to endure.” Lord Granville, says his agent, has promised this repeatedly, and “words of this kind, uttered in Parliament, are not lightly spoken.” Finally, the situation itself almost compels the Cabinet to take this course. There is too much evidence that as yet the Khedive has not recovered his authority, that Egypt is still disorganised, and that nothing but the presence of British troops prevents a relapse to anarchy. The new army, the new gendarmerie, the new police are all in process of formation, but as yet there is no strength or grip in any of them. The mere rumour that the British troops were to be withdrawn caused a panic in Alexandria and arrested trade, and neither fear nor caution were unjustified, as the incident of Sunday at Port Said clearly revealed. The Greeks of the town and the Arab soldiery got into one of their perpetual quarrels; the Greeks drew their revolvers, and instantly all native authority ceased. The Governor, with plenty of soldiers at his back, found himself powerless to prevent a riot, in which the safety of the whole town would have been compromised, and, acknowledging his powerlessness in writing, begged Captain Rice, commanding the 'Iris,' to land sailors and marines, and restore order. This was done, Captain Rice, with 200 men, instantly reducing the rioters to submission; but if he had refused, Port Said would have been burnt and pillaged. As invariably happens after such occupations, all true authority—the authority which can secure order without bloodshed—has passed to the Europeans, whose will alone upholds the administrative system. Even when the Army has been reformed, this difficulty will survive; and the certainty of disorder will retard, probably for years, the departure of the small garrison whose presence assures all Egyptians that insurrection cannot ultimately succeed.

It is well that this should be clear, for without it administrative reform in Egypt will never begin, and its commencement is more imperative than ever. It is positively sickening to read of the condition of the Egyptian peasantry, and to know that for one at least of its worst features the people of this country are responsible. Mr. H. Villiers Stuart, the able and experienced Member for Waterford, who knows rural Egypt probably better than any man alive, consented in December last to inspect the condition of the people, and report to Lord Dufferin at Cairo. He visited all the provinces of the Delta, and examined forty-four groups of witnesses, in twenty-six communes, and then repaired to Upper Egypt, where he held thirty-five separate inquiries. His Report, though most temperate in tone, as becomes a man who knows that all the world is not governed like Westminster, would, if made of a British province, leave the Government no alternative between instant and radical reform or dismissal in disgrace. He found everywhere, though more in the Delta—which is our special business—than in Upper Egypt, that with the restoration of order the usurers who had fled before Arabi had returned, and were demanding and receiving interest at from 65 to 120 per cent. per annum, the total paid to these villains exceeding the whole State taxation of the country (page 7 of Blue-book, No. 7, of 1883), heavy as that is. When the peasant, as usually happens, is unable to pay, the Mixed Tribunals, setting aside the old Organic Law of Egypt, under which the cultivator could not be dispossessed of his holding for mere debt, decree the land to the usurer; and "in many villages I saw handsome European houses, surrounded by gardens, vineyards, and well-stocked farms, and invariably the natives told me that these properties belonged to money-lenders, who had become possessed of them by degrees, adding field to field, through the instrumentality of the Mixed Tribunals. They had drawn the net of indebtedness around the fellah, and when it suited them to absorb his land they have foreclosed; and then, although the debt might fall far short of the value of the land, yet from the method of procedure, far away in the Courts in Cairo, a procedure utterly obscure to the poor, ignorant peasant, the land has been knocked-down to the foreign creditor, well versed and instructed in the ways of these Courts. In one small village, the Greek had 200 acres, and no other inhabitant had more than a few acres left; even the Sheikh had only twelve. The Greek's estate had been carved out of theirs, and the little community had been reduced by this means from prosperity to poverty." Of course, the usurers are hated, till the secret of Arabi's popularity was a decree promising that their bonds should be cancelled, and till the personal popularity of the English, to which Mr. Villiers Stuart testifies, is lost in the hatred of the foreigner, to whose tribunals the Fellaheen attribute the whole evil. They could, they say, in the last resort, have bribed their own Judges to give them redress. As if this misery, which is disorganising all society, and will lead to an agrarian strike fatal to the Revenue, was not sufficient, the corvée still exists; and the impoverished peasants—"every landowner up to 100 acres being liable"—are forced out to work "in distant parts of the province," not their own villages, under the following circumstances:—"Those who are liable get no pay whatever for their work, neither does the Government provide them with any food whatever; their friends at home have to send them food from their villages, usually bread dried in the sun is their sole nourishment; it is sent in sacks, a couple of men from each village being deputed to convey it to the scene of operations. They have also to find their own tools and baskets; as a matter of fact, their hands are often their only tools, with these they load the baskets and excavate the soil; no shelter is provided for them at night, nor any covering; a certain number of overseers are appointed, these are armed with sticks, and superintend the work." It is as it was in the days of Pharaoh, only the Egyptians are under the lash of the taskmasters, and Israelites in Paris and London wield the whip. The stick spoken of is freely used, and also the whip of hippopotamus-hide:—"The use of the 'courbash' (hippopotamus-hide whip) and of the stick has increased since the rebellion, as also imprisonment in heavy chains; these punishments often fall upon the innocent; for instance, if a fellah selected for military service runs away to the Desert, his relatives are chained and thrown into prison, although in no way accessory to the offence." The European usurers, who alone could protect the people, look on with indifference; and, indeed, says Mr. Villiers Stuart, in his calm, unemotional way:—

"I met with a Greek gentleman who is much prejudiced against the natives; he said they were very obstinate, and in illustration he narrated an incident which he had witnessed the day before. A postal runner had been waylaid and robbed near a house at night; the owner of this house was not suspected of the robbery, but he was seized and brought before the Mudir, who asked him why he had not gone to assist the postman; he said he had been asleep in his home, and had not heard the cries of the plundered man; the Mudir said he must have heard them, and on his persisting in his statement he ordered him to be beaten on the soles of his feet with the courbash; he received no less than 800 blows, till his feet were reduced to a jelly, and then, as he still refused to confess that he had heard the noise, he was taken home. 'You see,' said the Greek, 'how obstinate these people are!'"

Five millions of people, so industrious that Egyptian land yields a higher rental than land in Lincolnshire, so moderate that, says Mr. Villiers Stuart, they will willingly pay one per cent. per mensem for loans, and only talk of usury when the exaction rises above that figure, and so peaceful that 2,000 Europeans are a sufficient garrison, are subjected to the miseries faintly indicated in these extracts, mainly because, the British being there, insurrection is impossible.

We say at once, hearty advocates as we are of the occupation, that if we cannot end these things, our duty is to withdraw; but we can end them. The Representative Council just decreed will do nothing, for it will at first represent oppressors, and not oppressed; but the British Resident can do everything. He can just as easily compel the Khedive to forbid the use of the lash, and to make his order effectual by the steady execution of those who disobey it, as he can compel him to issue a code which every official will violate whenever he dare. He can just as easily direct him to declare that the old Organic Law as to holdings is again in force, as to set up the International Tribunals, which are, unintentionally, causing such a dissolution of society, and he should direct his energies to those two ends. It is nonsense to talk of interference. It is the old scandal of Bengal over again. If we are not entitled to interfere, and cannot make the native ruler do justice without interference, our duty is to withdraw our support and leave his subjects to their natural remedy, their right of deposing him, a right as fully acknowledged by Mussulmans as by Christians. It is as utterly wrong to guarantee an oppressor against his people by our civilised force, as to use that civilised force in order to oppress for ourselves. There is, however, no necessity for such a priori arguments. The steady pressure of a Resident determined to prevent gross oppression, even if he has to change the Sovereign, can prevent it; and we ought to appoint one, and support him in all needful exercise of authority. It is a cumbrous and a weak system, compared with the direct action of a British Viceroy, who in six months would terminate these iniquities for ever, and secure personal freedom to the whole population; but if the British people fear responsibility too much, let them compel action through the slower scheme. The alternative is to quit Egypt, whatever the consequences to our future.

THE RESULT OF THE IRISH-AMERICAN CONVENTION.

WE take it that the Parnell party among the Irish-Americans did, on the whole, carry the Philadelphia Convention. The representatives of the Ultras were numerous and fierce, so fierce that it was necessary to avoid any formal condemnation of their tenets, and that they held after the larger meeting a Convention of their own. No formal resolution was passed condemning the use of dynamite, the most furious Irreconcilable leaders, though shouted down, were not expelled, and a special resolution of compliment was passed in favour of Mr. Egan, who is supposed, rightly or wrongly, it hardly matters which, to be in a special degree the link between the secret and the public societies. We say it hardly matters, because if he is the link the Convention desired to condone the action of the former, and if he is only supposed to be, its managers wished to leave the impression among Irishmen at large that this was their secret policy. In either case, the Convention was either cautious or sympathetic towards O'Donovan Rossa and those he represents, and the delegates drew down on themselves most justly warm reproaches from those who value the character of Irishmen among the nationalities of the world. The Convention, moreover, was compelled to pander in its Resolutions to the hatred of England which, far more than love for Ireland, animates the Irreconcilables. Instead of pleading that Ireland as a nation had a right to independence, even if England were behaving well—a perfectly reasonable proposition, from the Nationalist point of view, and admitting of any policy not condemned by ordinary morality—the majority of the Convention cannot mention the British Government without calling it "brutal," and condemn Coercion Bills and assistance to emigration in the same opprobrious terms. Still, the Gironde did, on the whole, get the advantage of the Mountain. The friends of Mr. Parnell succeeded in inserting the word "legitimate" into the clause declaring it "the duty of the Irish race throughout the world to sustain the Irish people in the employment of all legitimate means to substitute for British rule national self-government." The word is vague, and indeed useless, as the Ultras consider dynamite legitimate, but it will enable Mr. Parnell to say that his friends have not stepped over the line which renders discussion impossible. They succeeded in inserting a strong vote of confidence also in Mr. Parnell himself, for that is the meaning of the rather absurd resolution which declares that "every stroke of Forster's savage lash was for Irishmen a new proof of Parnell's worth." That sentence suggests the man who, having just been thrown from his horse, replied to the friends who anxiously inquired whether he was hurt, "Quite the contrary;" but Irishmen, when furious, lose their sense of humour as quickly as other people, and the object of the words, despite their grotesque form, is unmistakable. Then the plan adopted is Mr. Parnell's own. All the Leagues and Associations, even the oldest of them, the Ancient Order of Hibernians, are merged in the National League, which is, moreover, avowedly devoted to the support of the kindred League on this side the water, "of which," say the framers of the Resolutions, with clear significance, "Charles Stewart Parnell is the President." And, finally, his latest idea, that of enlisting the labourers in his cause by holding out to them indefinite promises, and sinking, for the moment, the war on landlordism, is embodied in a regular resolution which would hardly have been proposed in Philadelphia without inspiration from this side. It is the farmers, not the labourers, for whom the American-Irish have hitherto declared; but this time they say nothing of the right of the people to the soil, and everything of the right of the labourers to "fair wages." Mr. Parnell, in fact, wants a new instrument.

The Parnellites have won, though after a struggle which, if the history of Revolutions may be trusted, bodes them little good. The Gironde always wins till the Mountain swallows it, the tendency in such movements being always to transfer power to the desperate till they awaken the inevitable reaction; but still, taking the "short views" necessary in politics, the Parnellites have won. Their leader is officially and nominally chief of the whole party in Ireland and America, can depend upon certain, though probably limited, supplies of money—for it was the Irreconcilables who sent most cash through Mr. P. Ford—and can manipulate that scrutin de liste under which, in the disaffected districts, Irish elections are practically managed. Mr. Parnell can nominate the Parnellite Members, can pay expenses for such as need it, and can therefore, on grave occasions and within certain limits, overrule dissent. The question, therefore, for English politicians is how he will use his power. He has the usual three courses open to him. One, incomparably the best, is to regard himself as chief of the Irish Radicals, and steadily insist, whatever Government is in power, on the changes which Ireland, from the Radical point of view, now requires, namely, the alterations in the Land Act asked for by Ulster; a relaxation of the peasant-proprietary clause; the reduction of all franchises to the English level; the concession to urban municipalities and County Councils of all powers now exercised by Birmingham, except, for the present, the control of the police; the substitution of qualified Stipendiaries for the gentry as Magistrates; and the complete decentralisation of the work now concentrated in the Castle. Mr. Parnell, with thirty or thirty-five followers who would really obey, could carry all those reforms, and probably confer immense benefits upon his country, if only because he would train all classes to the responsibilities of power. His support, steadily and honestly conceded to either side, would be worth all that; and either party would, if wise, risk the misuse of the powers conceded for the ends of the Secessionists. His second course, the one he is apparently pursuing now, is to throw his whole weight both in Parliament and with the constituencies against every Administration as it arises, thus, whenever the parties approach equality, making Government unsteady, until the statesmen, in utter weariness, grant Home-rule. This course is, we believe, as hopeless as it is immoral, as the statesmen will not make the concession, but would try in preference new experiments, including even, if driven to despair, the partial disfranchisement of Ireland. A good many things which look impossible become possible when a necessity is visible, and among them the idea of regarding general perversity as as much a disqualification as what the law terms "widely-diffused corruption." Still, this course may seem possible to Mr. Parnell, who is already doing his best to destroy the Government which has done most for Ireland, and it is practically open to him. A third course, the one very recently adopted, is by persistent, scientific obstruction, to render Parliamentary Government impossible, until either by independence or Home-rule the Irish Members are withdrawn. That plan also must fail, because Parliament in the last resort will risk any consequences to save itself; but we greatly fear the logic of events will tend in that direction. Mr. Parnell's difficulty, looking at his position as we might if we were reasonable Irish Home-rulers like Mr. Shaw, is that he is again dependent not on Irish opinion alone, but on Irish-American opinion also, which, moreover, will outweigh the other, because Irish-Americans will find the funds. That opinion will hardly be conciliated by true reforms, because it seeks not a happier Ireland, or a better governed Ireland, but an independent Ireland. Nor will it be greatly mollified by a long Parliamentary battle, in which the heavy blows can be delivered only at intervals, and the great result—the weakening of successive Governments—will scarcely be perceptible at a distance. It will demand visible effects, struggles, "scenes," as evidences that the work is going on, and they can be furnished only through Parliamentary obstruction. Mr. Parnell may hesitate, knowing well the consequences of such a campaign; but the pressure upon him will be in that direction, and may be irresistible. In that event, Procedure may yet become a national question, and we shall have Tories as well as Liberals ridiculing the New Rules, as absurdly weak for the necessities of the day.

MR. BRIGHT ON THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

MR. BRIGHT'S speech on the Establishment proves to demonstration what, for our part, we have never doubted, that the Established Church of England is not, and has never been, a reforming influence in the State, if by a reforming influence we refer to the influence exerted over public opinion on public questions. At the beginning of the century, the Church of England and its chief authorities were passive in relation to one of the most savage Criminal Codes in Europe. Later on, the dignitaries of the Church were far behind the public opinion of the day in relation to the question of slavery. In our own time, the Church has been one of the great props of the Tory party, and so far as we can judge is likely to remain a prop of the Tory party as long as it exists. Where we differ broadly from Mr. Bright is in believing that in this respect Disestablishment would make much difference. Look to the Colonies and to the United States, where there is not only no Establishment, but no State endowment, and the attitude of the Episcopal Church will be found to be pretty much the same. Its prevailing sympathy is with the Conservative, not with the reforming, sections of the peoples to which it ministers. The spiritual life which it cherishes, so far as it is vivid, is seen rather in the strength it throws into the moral and social charities than in the strength it throws into political agitation. We would not go so far as to say that the Establishment, as an Establishment, has nothing to do with this. We do not doubt that the great temporal dignity of the Bishops acts not unfrequently as a stimulating element, and an unhealthily stimulating element, to this Conservative tendency. Indeed, though the Bishops are the only Life-Peers in the House of Lords, and though it is in the direction of creating Life-peers that the greatest statesmen have looked for the reform of the House of Lords, the Bishops must be said to be failures as Life-Peers, if only on this account,—that they do not really give their minds to any political questions which do not specially interest them either as ecclesiastics or as Conservatives. But what Mr. Bright seems to have overlooked is the fact that, so far from being subservient to the Government of the day, the Bishops have never been subservient to Liberal Governments at all. On the contrary, if we were asked where some of the sturdiest opponents of Mr. Gladstone's two Governments had been found, we should have replied, amongst the Bishops, and not least among the Bishops of his own creation. Let us do the Bishops this credit, at least. Doubtless they are biased by their position of dignity, doubtless it makes them more Conservative than they might otherwise be; but it does not, on the whole, make them time-servers. They feel no scruple at all in banning the Government to which they owe their temporal dignity, and are allies not of the Government as a Government, but of the ancient Constitution as an ancient Constitution. And our profound belief is that they would remain on the whole allies of the ancient Constitution, even if they were both disestablished and disendowed to-morrow. Some of the rulers of the Church might be rendered a little less worldly and a little more other-worldly, by Disestablishment; and by Disendowment they would undoubtedly be brought into a position of greater dependence on the laity, with all the good and all the evil of that dependence; but neither by Disestablishment nor by Disendowment would the Episcopal Church of England ever be turned into a vividly Liberal Church, like the Church, for instance, of the Independents or the Baptists. There is something in Episcopacy itself which tends towards the discouragement of democratic feeling, though it is not necessarily incompatible with that feeling. Indeed, it is to our mind all but certain that while genuine popular leaders who, like Mr. Gladstone, combine a deep faith in the popular instincts with deep reverence for what we may call a submissive type of religion, will always throw something larger and more catholic into their statesmanship than mere Radicals can ever throw, they will yet be rare among Liberals, and will always be regarded by the rank and file of the Liberal party with a certain historical wonder. It is perfectly true that no leader of the Liberal Party has ever been so popular, so much the delight and the hero of the party at large, as Mr. Gladstone; partly, no doubt, from the thoroughgoingness of his Liberalism, but partly, too, from the very feeling of grateful astonishment that one who can feel as he does in relation to matters ecclesiastical, should yet sympathise so passionately with the people in relation to matters political and social. We deny, of course, that there is any adequate justification for that astonishment. We believe that at bottom, the acquiescent, not to say submissive, temper towards "things as they are," in relation to God's disposition of events of the past that are unchangeable, is not only perfectly consistent with, but in the deepest minds calculated to stimulate, the effort to make better manifest the true mind of Providence in the future as compared with the past. It is not in the least that we find any inconsistency between what may be called a submissive creed, a submissive religious attitude, and a sturdy political spirit of reform. But though there is no radical inconsistency between the two, the mass of men are so constituted that they cannot easily embrace both attitudes of mind; and so it happens that while the most powerful leader we Liberals have ever had, does embrace both attitudes of mind, the greater number of his followers regard his High Anglicanism with a mixture of wonder and thankfulness that it did not keep him in the Conservative ranks. We ourselves hold that the Episcopal Church, even if it were disestablished to-morrow, would in both its sections—its High-Church, as well as its Evangelical section—remain, on the whole, a distinctly Conservative force, though there would always be good reformers in both sections of it. It would, on the whole, continue to oppose democracy, and to maintain the aristocratic attitude, on political affairs. But we quite admit to Mr. Bright that we should feel no objection at all to the experiment of banishing the Bishops from the House of Lords, where, as it seems to us, they are perfectly useless as Life-Peers, while their temporal dignity rather tends to injure their influence as Christian pastors and preachers.

Mr. Bright made no attempt to show that the passive attitude of the Episcopal Church in relation to political affairs was really due to its connection with the State. Nor does it in the least follow that because a Church is passive in relation to public matters, it does not do a great deal of good to which no Voluntary Church would be equal, in relation to the social condition of the country. Mr. Gladstone has always maintained, and we think quite truly, that a Disestablished Church which should be only so far disendowed as was the Irish Protestant Church in 1869, would be a monster in the State, far too powerful for an independent corporation; while, if you proposed to strip it much barer than the Irish Established Church was stripped, you would do an immense deal of practical injustice, and cause an immense deal of suffering to the poor themselves, for which there cannot be a just demand so long as the English people really desire to see that part of their national inheritance employed as it has been employed for so many hundred years. Mr. Bright's argument seems to us to fail in this. It shows us a serious evil which would be certain to survive Disestablishment, and not only Disestablishment, but even Disendowment. It shows us no compensating good to be gained by that violent interference with English institutions which the Society on behalf of which he spoke contemplates, and is pledged to bring about.

FRENCH DIPLOMACY.

THE debate in the French Senate on the Triple Alliance, or understanding, or, as M. Challemeil-Lacour prefers to call it, the rapprochement, between the two central European Empires and Italy, had an incidental result which the author of the interpellation probably intended to bring about, and the Foreign Minister knew that he could not avert. It showed the completeness of the diplomatic isolation in which the events of the last five years have placed France. This diplomatic isolation is something distinct from political isolation. Political isolation has been the lot of France ever since 1870, and so long as Prince Bismarck's ideas are faithfully carried out, it will, to all appearance, continue to be her lot. But this is, in the strictest sense of the phrase, the fortune of war. It would have been the same if the Empire had survived Sedan, or if it had been followed by a Bourbon restoration. A great defeat, involving the annihilation of an army, the collapse of a military system, and an unprecedented increase of public burdens, must isolate the nation which sustains it. Influence ordinarily follows power, and when France lost power she could not expect to remain an important factor in European combinations. She would still be valuable for what she might one day become; but her value necessarily ceased to be anything but prospective and potential. All this, however, was quite compatible with the retention of a very real diplomatic importance. That is very largely a matter of habit and tradition. It is often enjoyed by countries which, if they were judged by their physical resources only, would count for very little indeed. Diplomatic importance mainly consists in the confidence into which the representative of one power is taken by the representatives of the rest,—depends on whether, to use a slang phrase, he is "in it." This is very largely a matter of social intimacy. The best diplomatist is the man who not only is best able to use his opportunities, but has most opportunities to use. In one way, indeed, these opportunities are fewer than they once were, because the consolidation of the German Empire has abolished the Missions at the small German Courts. These Missions were sometimes of great value, as channels of information about the affairs of greater Powers. A Minister knew, perhaps, what his Government was contemplating at the other end of Europe, and the want of any connection between this information and the affairs of the Power to which he was accredited made him more careless about imparting it to his colleagues. Lord Malmesbury once told a Committee of the House of Commons that the two most important pieces of information he received while he was at the Foreign Office—the intention of the Austrians to cross the Ticino in 1859, and the intention of Napoleon III. to annex Savoy—came, one from the English Minister at Hanover, and the other from the English Minister at Berne. The Diplomatic Body at these petty Courts was a little group of men in constant and intimate association with one another, and when men live together in this way for years, they naturally come to have but few secrets that are not common property. This is a very fair illustration of what diplomatic importance means. It depends on the maintenance of constant, intimate, and equal intercourse. How little this is enjoyed by France at this moment was shown by Tuesday's debate. She has, says M. Challemeil-Lacour, "her diplomatic agents, whose duty it is to inform the Government of what occurs abroad; but they can only tell what they know." The Minister did not go on to say that they knew very little, but the whole tenour of his speech said it for him. It was just such a speech as might have been made by a cautious journalist,—a man who really has no more knowledge of what is going on than his readers can equally gain from each morning's telegrams, but who is anxious not to display his ignorance more than he can help, and so keeps as closely as possible to generalities. No doubt, M. Challemlacour was at a disadvantage. He was answering a man who has been both Ambassador and Foreign Minister, and who is supposed even now to be exceptionally well informed of what goes on in Europe. But when the fullest possible allowance has been made for this, no one can read M. Challemlacour's speech and not see that he was altogether in the dark as to the subject of which he was talking. He knows no more about the Triple Alliance than the man in the street, and the reason of this ignorance is that he has no better sources of information than the man in the street.

What is the reason that the French Republic should be so great a failure, in a line in which success was of real moment to its well-being? The mere fact that it is a Republic is clearly not enough to account for it. The Venetian diplomacy was the best in the world, and the diplomacy of the United Provinces was almost equally famous. At this very day, American diplomacy is successful for its own objects, and if it is less omniscient about European affairs than the diplomacy of other countries, it is simply because it is less interested in them. If at this moment France were represented at a foreign Court by the right man, the habits of old familiarity would revive, and the Minister would find abundance of matter to send home to his Government. Yet the example of the United States seems to show that it is not necessary that a diplomatist should belong to any particular class, or hold any particular rank. It is not because an aristocratic profession resents the intrusion of men who are not aristocrats that French diplomacy is in so low a position in Europe. No doubt, the desire to send as Ministers men of pronounced Republican views, which has shown itself during the last few years, is in part responsible for the change. There is a sense of comradeship in men, and especially in young men of the same social standing, which makes an excellent foundation for professional intimacy. But where the men themselves are clever and judicious, the absence of this foundation may be supplied. What is really injurious to diplomatic success is the fact that a nation cannot send as its representatives to foreign Courts the men who are best qualified to represent it. The omission to do this is a revelation of the extent to which political dissension prevails at home. The Government of a nation for the time being can ordinarily command the services of any one of its subjects. When their help is wanted, political differences are not allowed to stand in the way of its being both asked and given. In France, at this moment, there are men admirably qualified to represent the country who are never asked to undertake the work, and who, if asked, would undoubtedly refuse to undertake it. They are not asked, because there is a rooted determination among Republicans to cut France adrift from Monarchical traditions, and as one means of doing this, to send none but members of their own party as Ambassadors or Ministers. And if asked they would refuse, because the Republic has identified itself with a home policy which forbids them to regard it as anything more than a stop-gap, to be got rid of as soon as an opportunity can be found or created. Foreign Governments and foreign diplomatists know this thoroughly well, and they know also the lesson which it conveys. If France were really a homogeneous nation, men like the Duc de Broglie would not be permanently excluded from the public service. They would go in and out with their party, but they would not be treated as aliens, who can have nothing but an intellectual interest in French affairs. If France was a homogeneous nation, men like the Duc de Broglie would not criticise the acts of the Government as though they were the acts of an army of occupation, whose presence must be put up with until France is strong enough to throw it off. These things are just as visible to foreign Courts as they are to observers at home, and the fact that they are so makes it quite natural that M. Challemlacour should be so badly served by his agents. They are the wrong sort of men, to begin with, and they are chosen not because they are the best that France can supply, but because the better men that she could supply are regarded by the party in power as traitors to the Republic, and would regard themselves as traitors to France if they were anything else. There is no time, consequently, for social distaste to die away, because those who feel it do not believe that it is necessary or even convenient to overcome it. Continental diplomatists regard the ascendancy of the Republic as merely a passing phase of the French kaleidoscope, and as it is a phase which they heartily dislike, they have every motive for exaggerating its transitional character.

BIOGRAPHY IN MORTMAIN.

MRS. OLIPHANT and Mr. Venables both take up the cudgels against Mr. Froude, in current numbers of the May Magazines,—Mr. Venables in the Fortnightly, and Mrs. Oliphant in the Contemporary,—both intimating that Mr. Froude has done his duty very ill, and is responsible for representing the relation between Mr. and Mrs. Carlyle as much less satisfactory than it really was. For our own parts, we have done our best to show that the public impression on this head was very hasty, and that for a very large part of her life at least, Mrs. Carlyle was obviously as devoted as a wife as she was brilliant as a woman. But apart from the question as to the proper inferences to be drawn from the facts, we must say that Mrs. Oliphant, whose very vigorous attack on Mr. Froude is much the more formidable of the two, has not at all sufficiently weighed what was Mr. Carlyle's share of this responsibility, and what Mr. Froude's. She writes as if the publication of the fragment of Diary rested on Mr. Froude's sole responsibility, whereas, as we understand Mr. Froude, Mr. Carlyle had himself selected for publication a part, and a most painful part, of the Diary, though affording no clue to the bitterness of Mrs. Carlyle's tone. "A part only of the following extracts," says Mr. Froude, in giving extracts from the Diary, "was selected by Mr. Carlyle, a part sufficient merely to leave a painful impression, without explaining the origin of his wife's discomfort." Mrs. Oliphant represents it as if no part of the bitter Diary of 1855-56 had been selected by Mr. Carlyle at all, but only fragments of letters which seemed to demand explanation, and that Mr. Froude had out of his head hunted up the Diary to expose the black spot in the relations between the wife and the husband. If we have understood the matter rightly, this is not so. Mr. Froude is, indeed, we suppose, responsible for obtaining and publishing the indiscreet and evidently highly-coloured letter from Miss Jewsbury with which the extracts from the Diary conclude, and is also responsible, we suppose, for some extension of the extracts taken from the Diary, but not,—so we understand what seems to us his explicit statement,—for authorising the publication of passages which reveal the blackness of desolation in which Mrs. Carlyle was sunk at the time this Diary was written. It is quite another question, of course, whether Mr. Carlyle was not exceeding greatly the right of a husband, in authorising, without her consent, the publication of passages which could not but draw public attention to the bitterness of soul in which his wife at one time seemed to be lost,—passages which, we are well inclined to believe, with Mrs. Oliphant, that Mrs. Carlyle herself would never have written had she thought it possible that they would one day see the light. But if we are to blame any one, let us at least blame fairly, and not make Mr. Froude the whipping-boy on whom to vent all our indignation.

It seems to us that Mr. Froude has responsibilities enough to answer for. He has to answer for the literary reduplications which have extended what would have made two charming volumes of unique letters into three volumes of letters abounding in repetitions and monotonies. He is responsible for inviting Miss Jewsbury to add an evidently over-coloured and ex parte criticism to the most painful part of the correspondence. He is responsible, as we understand him, for revealing the explanation of Mrs. Carlyle's darkest moods,—the indignation which she felt at the intellectual charm exercised over her husband by Lady Harriet Baring. But he is not responsible for revealing the fact that these moods were at one time very dark. Mr. Carlyle himself, apparently as a sort of penance, had given his sanction deliberately to this revelation, and had heard with satisfaction that Mr. Froude acquiesced in that decision. So we understand the case. And, therefore, Mr. Froude's responsibility appears to us to consist of three distinct elements,—(1), responsibility for not dissuading Mr. Carlyle from an act of questionable penance, but rather confirming him in it; (2), responsibility for bringing out the secret of Mrs. Carlyle's desolation of heart, instead of leaving it a riddle to the public; (3), responsibility for darkening the picture, by adding Miss Jewsbury's comments. We confess that we think the first of these decisions the most serious of the three, and the second much the soundest of the three exercises of discretion—not a mistake at all, granting that the first course had been irrevocably decided on; while the third seems to us an unquestionable mistake of secondary importance. We do not think that if any evidence of the darker moods which beset Mrs. Carlyle during some years of her life were to have been given at all, it would have been wise or fair to Mr. Carlyle to leave them unexplained. The public imagination is none too charitable in such matters, and while we think it certain that before very long the spirit in which this temporary alienation of feeling between Mrs. Carlyle and her husband is judged, will not be very harsh, we do not know what might not have been the inferences drawn, if Mr. Froude had left extracts from the Diary showing us Mrs. Carlyle in her misery, and had not afforded us any explanation. As for Miss Jewsbury's comments, they seem unquestionably to make matters worse than they really were, and, therefore, they should have been rejected. But they are so obviously inconsistent with some of the facts, that they will not exercise any lasting influence on the estimate of either Mr. or Mrs. Carlyle. It is clear, however, that Mrs. Oliphant minimises excessively when she represents these moods of Mrs. Carlyle as so transient that on turning a few pages you may always come again on the old affectionate language. We believe that for some years at least the tone of Mrs. Carlyle's letters remains more or less proud and frigid, and that you must turn very many pages at some parts of the book, before you can find any trace of the old playful affectionateness and fondness.

To our minds, the primary blunder which Mr. Froude made was in not dissuading Mr. Carlyle from the ill-judged act of penance which, unless we mistake Mrs. Carlyle's nature altogether, she would herself so strenuously have disapproved and condemned, and so certainly have prevented had she had anything to do with the decision. There is a great deal of indignation expended in modern times on the tyranny of "the dead-hand," and it is not we who would contend for the right of "the dead-hand" to control unconditionally the disposition of property among the living, seeing that the living brain is much more competent to judge of the expediency of continuing those dispositions of property which a once living brain conceived, than any brain which had no foresight of the present exigencies of society, possibly could have been. But if, on the one hand, the dead-hand controls the destinies of the living too much, we are ready to maintain that it does not control the disclosures that most concerned the owner of that dead-hand, half enough. It may be maintained, indeed, that no one has any right of monopoly in his own most secret history, if in any way whatever, accidental or otherwise, he puts it out of his own power to keep the secret. Nor would we go so far as to assert that a man, say of the tenth century, whose private history should now be recovered, would have much claim on us of the nineteenth to respect his privacy, if it could be shown that the publication of his story would confer a great benefit on the modern world. The reason, as we understand it, why the privacy of a person lately dead,—or even dead within a period so short that the revelation of his private circumstances would seriously affect a good many living persons,—should be respected, is this,—that he (or she) had means, inaccessible to any one else, of judging how far it was right or wrong to divulge these private circumstances, and when, if ever, the wrong of divulging them would cease to be a wrong. To refuse to respect the privacy of the dead,—at all events, while the dead are still a felt influence among the living,—is to refuse to respect the one judgment which alone was competent to decide on the rightness of privacy or publicity. Thus, supposing we could be sure,—as we quite agree with Mrs. Oliphant that we can be all but sure,—that Mrs. Carlyle would have protested vehemently against the publication of those of her journals or letters which express either personal dissatisfaction with her husband, or a passionate gloom from which the public could at once have inferred the existence of that dissatisfaction, if not of more than the dissatisfaction which actually existed, we may surely say that it distorts the truth of her character and misrepresents her feeling for her husband, when we, the outside public, receive the confession,—even though we know the confession to be involuntary,—of feelings which she could never have written down without great qualification, if she could have written them down at all, had she imagined that they would be overheard.

Why is it simply dastardly to go and repeat to an assembled party a soliloquy accidentally overheard, which we well know that the utterer would have cut out his tongue rather than publish? First, because it grossly misrepresents the person who inadvertently says aloud what he believed himself to be saying only to himself. Next, because the reticence he intended to display was in all probability not only for his own sake, but for the sake of others also, and because he was a better judge of the right and wisdom of both kinds of reticence than he who accidentally overhears him can be. Lastly, because we all trust each other not to break the implied confidence we repose in each other in this way. Precisely the same reason applies, in our opinion, to this unauthorised revelation of Mrs. Carlyle's journal. So far as Mr. Carlyle was the only one to suffer by it, he might, perhaps, be excused for thinking that he had the right to give permission. But then, in the first place, he was not the only person to suffer by it. In the opinion of many of us, Mrs. Carlyle's character has suffered as much, and in part unjustly, because her whole soul would have revolted from this seeming disloyalty to her husband, from which, nevertheless, our knowledge of its involuntary character cannot wholly absolve her. In the next place, even so far as the revelation affects our judgment of Mr. Carlyle himself, surely her judgment was entitled to much weight. No one knew him so well. No one would have been more eager to assert that these crude journals, never intended for the public eye, would misrepresent the truth as to Carlyle himself, even though we know that we are, as it were, eavesdroppers, listening to her private soliloquies, and not taken by her into willing confidence. Now, should not these things weigh with us? Is it fair to her to overhear her in her moods of anguish talking to herself? Is it fair to her husband? Is it fair, indeed, to the present generation, to give it notice that if we can but overhear its secrets,—or, worse still, if we can overhear what it might like us to fancy its secrets, supposing it could be sure that we should try to worm them out and publish them,—we shall have no scruple in betraying those secrets? To our minds, the very same reasons which make it so undesirable that "the dead-hand" should govern the disposition of modern wealth and energies of which the brain which governed that hand had no anticipative grasp, make it in the highest degree desirable that it should govern the responsibility of giving or withholding confidences to the world which survives it, of the wisdom and delicacy of which no one living could have the same power or right to judge as belonged to the dead. No doubt, that right diminishes with every distinct remove from the generation which those confidences would be most likely to fascinate and interest, because the reasons for reticence or disclosure gradually expire with those removes. But, as it seems to us, "the dead-hand" has not half enough power to suppress one-sided and inadequate materials for biography, the communication of which in their present form would have given the most exquisite pain, and caused the most exquisite self-reproach, to the mind and conscience which directed that hand. But in this case, at all events, we blame Mr. Carlyle even more than we blame Mr. Froude.

"THE MAN OF THE FUTURE."

"I WAS a fish, and I shall be a crow," said Lady Constance Rawleigh, who had just been reading the "Vestiges," to the horror of Tancred, who had thought the young beauty spiritual, and had dreamt of making with her a pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre. Mr. E. Kay Robinson is not quite so absurd as the lady who amused her leisure with study of the "Vestiges" and scientific gossip, and whom Lord Beaconsfield should not have extinguished so summarily, but he has ideas which are nearly as unpleasant. He informs the world, through the Nineteenth Century, that he has worked-out the problem of the future of man from the Darwinian data, and with all the newest lights from embryology and the like, and that the following is the result of his investigation:—"The Man of the Future"—that mysterious being who will look back across a dim gulf of time upon imperfect humanity of the nineteenth century with just such kindly and half-incredulous scorn as we now condescend to bestow upon our own club-wielding, ape-like ancestor—will be a toothless, hairless, slow-limbed animal, incapable of extended locomotion. His feet will have no divisions between the toes. He will be very averse to fighting, and will maintain his position in the foremost files of time to come solely upon the strength of one or two peculiar convolutions in his brain. This may seem to be a poor prophecy; but it differs from most prophecies in being a mere logical deduction from accomplished facts." He will not be attractive, certainly, that object of Positivist worship, being exactly like an old, closely-shaven Mandarin, who has lost his teeth, his physical courage, and his capacity to walk, but that is no objection to the theory. A good many prophecies which are unpleasant may, nevertheless, prove true—for example, that the Chinese may conquer Asia and Europe—and if Mr. Robinson can produce evidence for his belief, we shall not, for our own part, be disposed to set up any passionate cry of alarm. Ugliness and goodness are compatible, witness Socrates; moustache and beard are not essential to intelligence, witness Cardinal Newman; and a toothless biped, with bald head and toes like children's mittens, may possess an immortal soul. We cannot admire an old bonze, who just at present is the only being who comes up to Mr. Robinson's conception, but he may be a most estimable and a most competent person, for all that. But we think we may ask that, if we are to believe that beauty, valour, and strength are all sure to retrograde, while intelligence will advance, the evidence presented to us should be very convincing, and Mr. Robinson's is not. His grand postulate seems to us one that will only convince the man who has, as Carlyle described it, the "mind of a kangaroo," moving always in a series of hops. To argue because the child in embryo resembles the animal from whom Darwin thought man was descended, therefore the changes suffered by man in his passage from maturity to old age indicate the changes to be suffered by the species, is surely an audacious jump. Growth is Mr. Kay Robinson's law, and he takes as his evidence of the result of growth the result of decay. Why should Nature, which in forming the embryo does not prophecy, but rejoices to set prophecy at defiance, depart from that course in order to give man a certain prescience of his doom? Mr. Kay does not argue, we repeat, that humanity at large will, like the individual, grow old, and therefore display similar signs of age—which would be a conceivable, though fanciful proposition—but maintains that the Darwinian laws will work on in secula seculorum, and that these unpleasantnesses will happen to man as part of his progressive advance. He will be more of a man than he is when he has no hair, and no teeth, and no toes, and no power of locomotion, and a great dislike to fighting! Well, prejudice is weakness, even though it be prejudice in favour of manliness, as part of the destiny of man, so let us look at the evidence. If all these things are to happen, they ought to be beginning to happen, and Mr. Robinson says they are. Man, for instance, is losing his teeth. The wisdom-teeth come or do not come, as may happen; the canines have become small, man not having now-a-days to fight for his bride with his teeth, as the gorilla does; and teeth in general are decaying much earlier than they did. They will, therefore, disappear, "probably two at a time," and be replaced by hardened gums, "which cannot fail to be incomparably more convenient and suitable to the viands of civilised life." Has Mr. Kay Robinson the evidence for all that such as Mr. Darwin would undoubtedly have accumulated, before he gave his theory to the world? He himself admits that he has none as regards savage races, which still retain their "powerful dentition," and why should not Red-Indian teeth decay, as well as those of white Americans? Mr. Robinson says because the Indians are nearer to an animal ancestor, but where is the evidence of that? Why do we assume, in the teeth of evidence, that Englishmen are "older" than the hairy Ainos of Japan? They are not. The oldest race of which we have any clear evidence, the Copt, retains the teeth he always had, and, for all that is recorded, an Essex ploughman can bite quite as hard as an Australian or Papuan, though he does not look quite so "near" to his ancestor, the monkey. There is evidence that in certain classes of human beings, notably Englishmen, Americans, and Frenchmen, teeth suffer more and earlier than they appear to have done three hundred years ago; but there is no evidence that humanity at large has altered in that respect. Not to mention that our ancestors either were less sensitive to pain, or whined about it less, is it not at least as probable that the theory of the great dentists is true, and that Europeans are suffering for their habit of drinking hot liquors, as that man is advancing to a "more convenient" condition of toothlessness? Why is it more convenient? Most of us think so when we have toothache, but gums have not begun to harden; and on the Darwinian theory, man's teeth were developed by his food, and his food cannot seriously change. We shall not, we may be sure, all live on "messes" like sago and gruel, and short of that, what change is conceivable? We may all become vegetarians? Certainly we may, and shall, if man continues so greedy of mutton as he is now, for all the eatable beasts will be dead; but if Mr. Kay Robinson will ask the next Hindoo he meets to show him his teeth, he will find they are unusually white, even, and firm. That man's ancestors have touched no meat for two thousand years.

As to hairiness, it is the savage and the Mongol, not the European, who tends to be hairless, the Englishman of the cultivated classes being among the most heavily bearded of mankind. Mr. Kay Robinson affirms that man acquired hair by sexual selection—a moustache being, in fact, attractive—and that the operation of this cause is dying away; but he can scarcely mean to be taken seriously. The Chinese value beards immensely, and have not got them; and some races have shaved for ages—showing that they did not consider hair ornamental—and still are bearded. The hair of the head grows thicker and longer as the man more needs protection from the sun, and though the world, no doubt, is cooling, when sunlight in the tropics ceases to be unpleasant man will begin to cease, too. As to the clubbed toes, we thought that one of the few Darwinian laws absolutely past discussion was that no injury from without was heritable, that no result of an operation was transmissible, and that if man wore boots for ages, babies would still be born with toes. Certainly for the present they are so born, the big toe of the Anglo-Indian baby—heir of ages of top-boots—being exactly as prehensile as the big toe of his Aryan cousin in the next cottage, heir to two thousand years of barefootedness. Mr. Robinson's fact is pure imagination, as is also his notion of the decline of locomotive power. He says:—"In that particular form of endurance, again, which enables a man to travel long distances on foot, the savage is, as was to be expected, immensely superior to his civilised brother. And increased facilities of artificial locomotion, by rendering the use by the latter of his lower limbs more and more unnecessary, will reduce them in time to a comparatively rudimentary condition." If there is one fact better proved than another, it is that the civilised man in training can walk a savage to death, outstrip him in a race, and fling him in a wrestle. A troop of naked Guardsmen or costermongers would strangle any troop of naked savages that could be got together, and, if in training, beat them in any conceivable feat of endurance not involving the patient endurance of pain. The "supple savage" is a pure delusion, as great a delusion as the superior size of our ancestors. There are not ten suits of armour in Europe which a Life Guardsman could put on, and there is not and never was a savage who, in water as cold, could rival Captain Webb, who swam across the Channel. The notion that the human race degenerates physically has not only no evidence to support it, but is exactly contrary to all evidence obtainable, and has been repeatedly exposed. We do not believe in the coming grandeur of humanity on this planet, and see little advance that man has made since Pericles save in morals and mechanical appliances; but we should, on the evidence, be much readier to believe that the men of the future, when sanitation, and good food, and temperance have done their work, would all be six feet high, well bearded, and able to run three miles.

There is little use in dreaming about the Man of the Future, for, for anything we know or can help, some horrid little tere-do or other evil-minded insect may learn how to eat the silica-covered grasses, produce a corn disease, and alter all human destinies; but granting that present conditions continue for a thousand years, three changes in man are at least within the range of possibility. The peoples, brought close by electric railways, steamers, and education, will, in all human probability, give up the prejudice of race, and largely cross their blood. Past evidence shows that when that occurs, as it did once in India, the dark races give the white races their tinge, but take their outline of form; and the usual man would be a well-formed human being, slighter and rounder than the present European, and with skin of a very light brown, dark eyes, and hair uniformly black. Then the human race will be crowded, and, being crowded, will have a fierce struggle for means, and in that struggle will develop the enduring power of the Chinaman, the best industrial of the world, who will work sixteen hours a day, and put will into his labour all the while. The slight, brown man will, therefore, be very strong and industrious. And, finally, he will have had a thousand years of brain-toil, will have begun to reject such toil in self-defence, and will tend to intellectual quiescence. In short, he is much more likely to resemble a slightly handsomer and browner Chinese than either the European of to-day, or Mr. Kay Robinson's hairless, toothless, club-toed, timid, and non-locomotive monstrosity.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

SIR WILLIAM PALMER AND CARDINAL NEWMAN.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—You have for many years taken so kind an interest in me, that I venture to hope you will let me publish in your columns a few lines on a personal matter, which in no sense concerns the Spectator.

Sir William Palmer, with whom I was very intimate fifty years since, and who had so much to do with the start of what was called the "Oxford Movement," in an account of it which he has given in the May number of the Contemporary Review, writes about me as follows:—" [Hurrell] Froude had, with Newman, while travelling in Italy, been anxious to ascertain the terms upon which they could be admitted to communion by the Roman Church, supposing that some dispensation might be granted which would enable them to communicate with Rome without violation of conscience." (p. 647.) Again, after saying that I considered myself "predestined," &c., he proceeds:—"Those who conversed with him were not aware of this; nor did they know that while in Italy he had sought, in company with Froude, to ascertain the terms on which they might be admitted to communion with Rome, and had been surprised on learning that an acceptance of the decrees of the Council of Trent was a necessary preliminary. Had I been aware of these circumstances, I do not know whether I should have been able to co-operate so cordially as I did with this great man." (p. 654.)

To this statement, namely, that I was party to an inquiry as to the terms on which, by dispensation or otherwise, Hurrell Froude and I might be admitted to communion with Rome, I give an absolute and emphatical denial. The passage in Froude's "Remains," on which Sir William founds it, with the note appended by me as editor on its publication, runs as follows:—Froude says, in a letter to a friend, "The only thing I can put my hand on as an acquisition is having formed an acquaintance with a man of some influence at Rome, Monsignor [Wiseman], the head of the [English] College, who has enlightened [Newman] and me on the subject of our relations to the Church of Rome. We got introduced to him, to find out whether they would take us in on any terms to which we could twist our consciences, and we found to our dismay that not one step could be gained without swallowing the Council of Trent as a whole." (pp. 306-7.)

I added this note in protest:—"All this must not be taken literally, being a jesting way of stating to a friend what really was the fact, viz., that he and another availed themselves of the opportunity of meeting a learned Romanist to ascertain the ultimate points at issue between the Churches." (Ibid.)

As on the publication of the "Remains" I disclaimed by anticipation Sir William Palmer's present misstatement, so I repudiate it again now. One thing I thank him for, that, by publishing it in my lifetime, he has given me the opportunity of denying it.—I am, Sir, &c., JOHN H., CARDINAL NEWMAN.

THE WORSHIP OF POMP.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—A Constant Reader "seems to be in fear for the village children, lest engrossing reverence for their squire (like that decreed to Darius) should leave no room in them for reverence for "any other, God or man." High as my estimate is of the ideal squire and his position, I do not share in that fear. Moreover, man's faculty for reverence, like his other faculties, the more it is exercised, the stronger, and readier, and more responsive will it become. The danger is rather that when, young and tender, it needs nursing and training, it should remain undeveloped and practically perish for want of employment. Objects, manifestly, must be found for it among those near at hand; as to which, I could wish your correspondent had condescended somewhat upon particulars. Thereafter with divine reverence it will be as with Plato's divine beauty and St. John's divine love.

Through the lower forms will the passage be up to the higher. The Jacob's ladder which reaches to heaven will rest upon earth.

But the radical difference, I doubt not, between your correspondent and myself is in our differing thoughts and estimates about the "My Lords and gentlemen" class. He probably, as the lover of the human race, would improve them off the face of the earth. I, as his rival in the same love, would improve them upon it, believing them to be, as a class, earth's very best, and longing for the improvement of all other classes by and through their improvement. And we shall help them to be truly great by making them feel that we expect them to be so, not by grudging them the accompaniments of greatness, and treating their "so-called" higher position as an expiring anachronism, which they may do well, therefore, while it lasts, to make some mean and miserable most of. That a plutocrat should look up to a nobleman, seems to me natural and proper.

Human equality is a dream, but if one must be a dreamer, I would dream not that the tall men had their heads cut off, but that they grew much taller, and by some magic of brotherhood and sympathy drew up all other men to be tall, too, after their towering example.—I am, Sir, &c.,

GEORGE ELIOT'S EXPRESSION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Will you kindly allow one who knew "George Eliot" for many years, to reply to your query in the Spectator of April 28th,—"Is there any authentic foundation for that criticism?" i.e., that in her eye there was occasionally "cold, subtle, and unconscious cruelty"? I unhesitatingly answer, no foundation whatever, nor the shadow of it. I never, in my whole life, met one so delicately, so tenderly careful of the feelings of others.

To wound the heart, even the self-love of another, although involuntarily, would have given her deep pain, and was what she recoiled from in others. I have heard her say that she believed the only one thing she would wish to see punished was cruelty. So strongly was this extreme sensitiveness of hers to what hurt others borne in upon me, that though at one time, during a severe illness of mine, she came nearly daily to see me, I always disguised, with great effort, my sufferings from her (thereby depriving myself of the comfort and happiness of her loving sympathy), being sure that even to know them would cause her great, kind heart little less than anguish. I kept up the same disguise in my letters to her, when I left London, for the same reason.

No tenderer heart, none more compassionate, ever beat in human breast. Sainte-Beuve, speaking of Madame de Staël, uses the expression,—"The maternal compassion of genius." I always felt how fitly this applied to "George Eliot." What a living emotion it was in her, how evident in the tones of her voice, and in her eyes!—I am, Sir, &c.,

Bonn, Germany, May 2nd.

ART.

ROYAL ACADEMY.

(FIRST IMPRESSIONS.)

THIS is not intended to be more than a sketch of a first impression of this year's Royal Academy Exhibition, and the hope of giving any criticism that is worth reading of special works, after having seen them on only one occasion, is so infinitesimal, that it is better to give up the attempt to criticise, or, rather, to put it off till a later occasion.

A good exhibition, or a bad exhibition?—that is the question. On the whole, bad, less in commission than omission; and worst, in the works of the best men. The President sends nothing very important, nor anything very new; Mr. Millais has two good portraits, and a single figure of a ghost; Mr. Poynter has not finished his "Queen of Sheba," and contributes only a picture of the "Ides of March," and "Psyche," whereof more anon; Herkomer, chiefly portraits; Albert Moore sends nothing, disgusted, as well he may be, at his last rejection as an Associate. Henry Moore, too, has nothing of great importance. Orchardson is better, Pettie worse, than usual, and Graham and Macwhirter much about the same. Mr. Long's large picture is only a magnified pot-boiler, and his single figures nothing but uninteresting damsels, with interesting names. Mr. Yeames has taken a fancy to imitate the President, and sends a pensive young woman, who looks like an unwashed Leighton. Marcus

Stone is less interesting than usual, but still lingers in the green shade of his old-fashioned gardens. Brett is as bright, and Walter Shaw as scientific, as of old, in their painting of ocean and sky. Whatever may be the drawbacks of the latter's art, the painter does not deserve that his beach and waves should be hung on the sky-line. Hamilton Macallum does not exhibit, and his rival, Colin Hunter, is not seen at his best. The Tademas are unusually small, and quite below the artist's usual mark,—even in actual technique the falling-off is considerable. Mr. Gow and Mr. Dicksee both send important pictures, neither quite successful; and the new Associates, Messrs. Macbeth and Gregory, seem to have reserved their chief efforts for future occasions. Anstey and Calderon and Eyre Crowe are neither better nor worse than usual.

As far as I could see, there was not one single picture of the nude in the whole Academy, unless Mrs. Merritt's "Camilla" could be called such.

There is no great historical picture; there is no great poetical picture; there is no great record of actual life; there is a considerable amount of good portrait-painting; there is an inordinate quantity of semi-picturesque, semi-humorous incident; there is some faithful study of Nature, both in her details and in her broad effects. So much for general impressions. Now to run through the rooms quickly, and see if we can gain some idea of them.

In the first room, we are glad to catch sight of Mr. Hook's cliffs and sea, and notice them to be as fresh and bright as ever, though a little less delicate. Why is it that Mr. Hook's sea always looks so much deeper than other people's, we wonder, as we pass on to Millais' "Grey Lady," flitting drearily up a dimly-lighted stairway in some old manor-house. A fine shadow of a picture this, very literally "a nocturne in grey." We will leave Mr. Arnold's "Spanish duellist" to choose between "a lobster supper" and "father's dinner," between which he seems to be hesitating, and look at Mr. Goodwin's "Enchanted Lake," another scene from "The Arabian Nights," such as this artist has painted before. But this will not do, Mr. Goodwin, after earlier "Sindbad Voyages;" it is too coarse, too spotty, and too much like a weak repetition of the same motive. Imagination is there, but imagination wearied and worried from want of fresh material to feed upon. A solid portrait of a Mr. Collins, "Senior Past Master and Father of the Court of the Worshipful Society of Butchers," will at least rid us of the last dregs of imagination, and prepare us for Mr. Long's "Merab" and "Michael," (or Michal) two half-length female figures, gazing placidly at the spectator, with beautiful, large eyes. Betwixt these, notice Mr. Faed, as simple as ever in his "Waefu Heart," a woman and her children sitting in the midst of "Logan braes." Mr. Barnard's pictures of "The Jury" in the "Pilgrim's Progress" ought to be amusing, but it escaped our attention; and Andrew Gow's "Consuelo" is meritorious, but hardly poetical enough for its subject. Mr. Gregory's "Drawing-room Day, Piccadilly," is a small, clever view of our celebrated street, taken apparently from a window on the second-floor; very clever, and somewhat uninteresting. This is Mr. Gregory's only picture here, except a portrait.

And in the second room, Mr. Wyllie's "Home from the Brazils, Refitting," is simply a fact of dockyard life, given very truly, and with the artistic perception of a true painter, but absolutely unfitted for reproduction on so large a scale. And the long, scattered frieze by the President cannot be considered worthy of either his position or his powers. The last word we would have ever thought of calling Sir Frederick Leighton's decoration was "awkward," but little else can be said of this. And it carries uninterestingness to the pitch of yawning, which, by the way, the central figure of the composition is apparently engaged in. Underneath this hangs Mr. Frith's "Private View," a work which is notable for the portraits of a good many well-known people, of whom perhaps the best known are the worst painted. Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Irving, and Sir Frederick Leighton himself, may be mentioned as singularly unsuccessful, even accepting Mr. Frith's essentially vulgar reading of their characters. Mr. Oscar Wilde, however, beams forth from the canvas with more than seraphic sweetness, and there is a young lady with a sunflower opposite to him whom we should recognise anywhere. In truth, a hopelessly inartistic rendering of what should be an interesting scene. Look for a moment at the sunset picture by Mr. Macwhirter, which hangs next to this, in which "all the fat seems to have got into the fire," with the usual result of blaze and fizzle, and test the effect of covering up the lower portion of the picture, so as to leave only the sky exposed. If, after so doing, the spectator can see any resemblance to cloud or firmament, any beauty of colour, or any delicacy, or even hint of form, in what remains, he will have keener sight than the present writer. But we said we would not criticise. Close to Mr. Macwhirter is Mr. Arthur Hughes' "Home Quartet," three girls playing violin or violoncello to their mother's accompaniment on the piano. Very clever and very pre-Raphaelite, and a good antidote to the last mentioned. Here, too, are Poynter's "Psyche," and Napier Hemy's "Oyster Dredgers," and close by a delightful little picture by Mr. John Reid, called "Darby and Joan," unpretending, careful, and good.

Mr. Dicksee's "Too Late," five foolish virgins, is the first picture that arrests the attention in the third gallery, as well it may, for the figures are rather over than under life-size, clever, and well painted, but not a success; and the same words almost may be used of Mr. Gow's "Trophies of Victory." It has that bad fault of historical painting, that it represents an incident which is neither momentous nor well known. One puzzles one's brains to remember or understand what it is all about, and then discovers that it was not worth the trouble. However, this composition is full of ability, the faces are all clever character-studies, and the painting, if a little hard and dull, is more solidly good than ever. Mr. Poynter's "Ides of March" requires careful examination; it is in some ways an advance upon the painter's late work, and there are traces in it of imaginative power such as we rarely notice in Mr. Poynter's art. Mr. Pettie's single figure of "Osric" is his best contribution this year. Both his larger compositions show his worst faults, and show them to excess. Mr. Orchardson is as yellow and as strong as ever; indeed, he is stronger. Both his "Voltaire" and his picture of the "Hairdresser" are fine examples of his work; and Millais' "Marquis of Salisbury" is a worthy pendant to his "Earl of Beaconsfield." Mr. Percy's "High Tide at Kynance, Cornwall," as realistic a bit of seascape as there is in the Academy, has pushed poor Mr. Shaw's "Rising Gale" up into the skies; and M. Carolus Duran's "Countess of Dalhousie," has all this splendid painter's power and "swish," but is unfortunate in its key of colour. In painting, it might give a lesson to most of our Academicians. A lovely bit of domestic waxwork by the President, hangs under a very undomestic fancy-dress portrait of Mrs. Hall as "White China;" and Mr. John Collier's "Professor Huxley" is as life-like as a cheap looking-glass. Mr. Collier's best work this year is that of "The Three Sisters" in the Grosvenor Gallery. Mr. Marks' "Old Clock" is the most perfect piece of genre painting in the Academy, and Mr. Herbert Schmalz's "Beyond," though affected both in title and treatment, has a touch of genius. Mr. Britain Riviere has two works, one of which is of "The Drove of Swine;" the other, of a sick child and a collie dog, and is called "Old Playfellows." The first is clever, but burlesqued; the second, one of the truest bits of work in the Academy, with but a single fault, as far as the idea and treatment of the composition go. This is the position of the collie's head, which, though true enough, is singularly ugly; it always looks in life as if the dog's neck was almost out of joint when he puts his head back thus, and in this picture it looks absolutely dislocated. Technically, the painting is better than Mr. Riviere generally treats us to, though the white ruff of the collie could be improved by being toned down, and not being scabbled about so much. The child is excellent in every respect, both in pose and expression, and has been drawn and painted with great delicacy. No picture of a similar subject with which we are acquainted, has given so true an expression of the listlessness of great illness. This boy has all the passivity of age about his face, without losing, too, his reality of youth. Note, as a little bit of true observation, the manner in which the boy's hands lie idly in his lap. In the whole Academy, so far as I have yet seen it, this is the only picture which I think deserves to have the word "pathetic" applied to it; it touches a true source of tears,—touches it, too, with real sympathy and power.

I must leave all the rest of the pictures to next week, only mentioning Mr. Logsdail's view of the Piazza of St. Mark, Venice. Nothing, we suppose, would tempt Mr. Ruskin to write another word about the Academy, but if it would, it would be this work. I cannot enter into its details till next week. Suffice it to say here that it seems to me that if there be such a thing as morality in Art, this picture would be rightly called, what many are wrongly, "devilish clever."

THE GROSVENOR GALLERY.

[FIRST NOTICE.]

THIS is a good exhibition, a high average of work, and several pictures which are far above the average. Pictures, moreover, look well here, some little regard to relative tone, subject, and shape, being paid by those who have the direction of the Gallery. When all allowance, however, is made for this, I find it difficult not to think that as an exhibition of pictures, this year's Grosvenor is a better one than the Academy. However, fortunately, there is no necessity to make the comparison, and in this notice I only purpose to say a word or two about some chief pictures, leaving the majority of the contributions to another time.

The first consideration should be rightly given to the "Fortune and her Wheel" of Mr. Burne Jones, a picture which might well puzzle a critic to estimate or to define. For though its merit is very great, it is merit of a kind for which it is hard to find an exact description, or to remember an exact parallel, and its shortcomings are evident to "the merest schoolboy." On a gigantic cartwheel are bound (we suppose they are bound, though we see no evidence of the fact) three male figures, felon, king, and poet, or whatever they are intended to represent; whilst by the side stands Fortune, with closed eyes and listless face, languidly turning the wheel. The originality of the treatment is manifest, and there are certain beauties of line in the arrangement of the figures and their attitudes, but the peculiar charm of the whole is excessively difficult to define. Partly, no doubt, it lies in a very exquisite quality of painting, and in the genius for design which appears in every portion of the composition. The arrangement, for instance, of Fortune's robes, is in itself a masterpiece of combined imagination and patience. But all this would not account for the peculiar power of the picture, a power which exists absolutely independent of its painting or its composition. Look for a minute at the portrait by the same painter of young Carr, a little chap about six years old. This has the same charm and the same unreality, and perhaps it is easier to trace the artist's secret in the latter instance.

It is the charm of the triumph of spirit over matter, essence over substance, soul over sense. The peculiar flavour of Mr. Burne Jones's art lies in this, that with a keen, almost too keen, sense of the beauty of form in which it resides, it is, nevertheless, the spirit of a scene or a person which the artist seeks to depict; and it is not strange that this being so, he seldom succeeds in painting characters which are alien to his own—for he can only conceive one kind of spirit, and if he does not discover that in his subject, his sitter, or his model, he finds nothing at all. And this painter, as he reveals himself in his work, is a strange mixture compounded of very diverse materials, showing, equally,—

"Bursts of great heart, Foul slips in sensual mire."

It is strange that his strength lies in this contradictory combination. All his finest pictures have had some trace in them of that purely physical side of love, which he depicts in such strange conjunction with its most immaterial aspect. A painter who varies his subjects between Swinburne's "Laus Veneris," and "The Annunciation," gives plenty of food for reflection to his critics, and it is, as I have said, when he combines the two that this artist does his best work. However, this Fortune has practically none of sensual element evident. It is an almost monochromatic design (some people would call it a harmony in slate-and-gold colour), which attempts in no way to render the physical truths of the scene, but which takes advantage of the subject to obtain a conjunction of beautiful lines, to display much subtle drawing of the figure, and to depict a scene which shall have no relation to the coarse, hard-and-fast motives and actions of the present day, an illustration of,—

"All passes: naught that has been, is;
Things good and evil have one end.
Can anything be otherwise,
Though all men swear all things would mend,
With God to friend?"

Regret and beauty, loss and love, desire and weariness, those are the aspects under which the world appears to Mr. Burne Jones; and even of these he has no gospel to tell us,—only under his hands these things take a lovely shape, and their recesses are sounded to the bottom. A strange art, strangely powerful in its appeal to many of us. Expressing failure in the loveliest way in which it could possibly be expressed. An exact antitype in painting to the old Grecian sculpture; for the perfection we see here brings no joy or peace to its possessors, who have all, like Wolfedietrig, "lain under the Linden," and known that which has made life tasteless to them for the rest of their days.

Look, for an instance of entirely different art, at the portrait of the Duchess of Westminster, which hangs close by; this is by Mr. Millais. A fresh young English lady, in a black-silk dinner dress, black gloves, and a fan in her hands, turning little more than a profile to the spectator; one of the best of Mr. Millais' women's portraits, absolutely lifelike in its reality, without in the least degree straining after effect. The vivid beauty of the flesh-painting, possibly a little exaggerated, braces one like a cold bath, after Mr. Burne Jones's brown men and women, and the work of a very genuine artist, and of a very healthy one; and yet, and yet,—well, there is more real art in Mr. Burne Jones's imperfections than in the merits of these later Millais's, for Mr. Millais now is tending nowhither, and has no great aim in view. He paints as well as he cares to paint—better, in fact, I might say—inasmuch as he seldom paints as well as he can. And the simpler his motive, the more he is pleased. Within the last four years, it would be interesting to know how often he has painted the same model under different names; a very pretty girl she was, too, this "Cinderella," "Sweetest Eyes ever Seen," "Caller Herrin'!" &c.

And as a contrast to Mr. Millais' simplicity, if not lack of meaning, look at Mr. Nettle's picture of "Blind,"—a blind lion followed by jackals, cautiously feeling his way along the edge of a precipice. For the painting, quâ painting, it would be difficult to say much, but both the tragic power and meaning of the work are indisputable; it is a drama of animal life which must end in a tragedy, and is touched with a very sympathetic hand. There is a certain rough grandeur about some of Mr. Nettle's work which places it in a class of its own amongst English painters; he lacks the humour and the grace of Mr. Britain Riviere, and he lacks the solid, good craftsmanship of such men as Hardy, Davis, and Beavis; but he has certainly succeeded on more than one occasion in seizing the essential characteristics of lions and tigers, and in endowing their sufferings with true pathos.

At another end of the pole of painting are the three Venice drawings by Mr. Gregory, the last-elected Associate to the Royal Academy. So minute and faithful that they seem almost as if they had been done from a photograph, these little works are singularly free from the usual defects of small work. They are bold, vivid, and delicious in colour, and are worthy of very careful attention. Mr. Gregory is essentially a figure painter, but few of our architectural artists could equal such work as this.

I must close this exceedingly brief and imperfect first notice, by the mention of Mr. Alfred Parson's two summer landscapes,—one in a green garden, the other in a meadow by a river, with the chief object in the composition a flowering May-tree. Both are essentially clever work, smacking, perhaps, just a little of French training (seen, for instance, in the rather heavy quality of the greens, and the rather blotchesque manner of painting foliage), but very English in their fullness of colouring, and almost pre-Raphaelite in their accuracy of detail. Close to one of these is Mr. Richmond's chief work—he sends nine others—of Miss Netty Davis, which deserves fuller notice than I can give at the end of an article. I have some little hesitation in calling the attention of my readers to Mr. Rooke's series of "Designs in the Nativity," because they belong to myself; but this industrious painter is so rarely seen to advantage in exhibitions, and these little compositions might be so easily overlooked, that it is only fair to him to say that these little pictures, which were originally designed for Christmas cards, seem to the present writer to be very good work of their kind. They do not, of course, profess to be Michelangelos or Tintorets, but they certainly succeed in telling their stories with grace, propriety, and clearness, and in making a little space beautiful with colour. I fear I must add, that of the drawing, the less that is said the better.

BOOKS.

THE WISDOM OF GOETHE.*

PROFESSOR BLACKIE has collected and skilfully translated for us in this little book a very striking and valuable collection of some of Goethe's most weighty sayings,—a collection of which he would, however, have greatly increased the value, had he supplied us with the reference for each of them in Goethe's own works. As it is, even the reader who is most familiar with Goethe's works will often have the greatest possible difficulty in finding the context of many of these passages, though he will often desire to know the context, if only for the due appreciation of the weight attached by Goethe to the thought itself. For instance, to take a passage which no reader of Goethe will fail for a moment to identify, the Faust passage from "The Prologue in Heaven," wherein the Almighty says a good word for Satan, which is reciprocated heartily by the Tempter as the scene closes, Professor Blackie will hardly dispute that the passage which he gives us in its isolation, is much more significant of Goethe's real view of good and evil when it is taken in the context of the great scene we have referred to:—

"Good and Evil: their action and issue—(loquitur Dominus Deus).

Of all the spirits that deny,
The clever rogue sins least against my mind.
For, in good sooth, the mortal generation,
When a soft pillow they may haply find,
Are far too apt to sink into stagnation;
And therefore, man for comrade wisely gets
A devil, who spurs, and stimulates, and whets.
But you, ye sons of Heaven's own choice,
In the one living Beautiful rejoice!
The self-evolving energy divine
Enclasp you round with love's embrace benign,
And on the floating forms of earth and sky
Stamp the fair type of thought that may not die!"

That this conception of the Tempter as a being meant to keep the higher energies of men on the stretch,—a mere instrument in the hands of Providence, even when he brings men to their fall,—is much more significant when it stands as a prelude to the voyage of life in which Faust wrecked himself so sadly, than it is in this isolated form, must be obvious to everybody. And that it actually represented Goethe's prevalent view of the subordination of evil to good, and consequently of the purely relative and temporary character of evil, we do not in the least doubt. Indeed, that is just the reason why we take such a very different view of the significance and influence of Goethe's character from that which Professor Blackie has given us in the biographic sketch which precedes this selection from Goethe's writings and sayings. Professor Blackie concludes his rather ostentatiously special pleading for Goethe's nobility of character, with the following words, in which, as it seems to us, he misleads those of his readers who are not intimate with Goethe, as widely as words could mislead them in the appreciation of that character:—

"And what is this 'culture,' which certain persons in this country have hastily construed into a monstrous intellectual idolatry and sinful self-worship? as if a nature so keenly sympathetic and so widely social as Goethe's could have dreamt of a human culture as a thing possible, made up merely of intellectual dexterities and artistic presentations, without the fine bond of love, the sweetness of social intercourse, and the expansive joy of a large dispensing faculty. By Bildung or culture Goethe meant nothing less than that high human-godlike ideal set up for us in the text of the great Teacher when he says, 'Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father who is in heaven is perfect,' which, as absolute perfection to mortal men is impossible, practically means that it is every man's duty to make the most of himself that he can with the faculties he possesses and the circumstances in which he is placed; and whosoever does this, may retire from the scene with the consoling consciousness that he has led a perfect human life, in a spiritual sense, and it may be also a prosperous life, as the world is accustomed to estimate prosperity. Goethe did both; and with the exception of the human failings here and there, which I have not been anxious to cloak, he may well deserve to be studied by our generation, and to be handed down to long generations as the model of a perfectly wise and virtuous man."

Here is another example of the mischief of not having the context in which a great saying is uttered. The words here taken from the Sermon on the Mount, and applied to describe Goethe's idea of self-culture, seem to us about as inapplicable to it as it is possible for human words to be. Would Professor Blackie indeed venture to assert that Wilhelm Meister, in which Goethe's idea of education is most fully developed, is a book the ideal life of which is moulded on the morality of the Sermon on the Mount? We can imagine no statement not merely more erroneous, but we will say, to careful and thoughtful minds, more ludicrous than this. What is the root-idea of the Sermon on the Mount in reference to the matter we have just had to speak of,—moral temptation. Is it not this,—“If thy right eye cause thee to offend, pluck it out and cast it from thee, for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell”? Is that the ideal teaching of Faust or Wilhelm Meister, or of the Elective Affinities,—nay, is it the guiding principle of Goethe's own letters? If so, what shall we say of the many prurient passages in his works, some in Wilhelm Meister itself, some in the Letters from Switzerland, some in Elective Affinities, and several in his Roman Elegies and other minor poems? Goethe's Elective Affinities is one of the most wonderful illustrations of the complete divorce between his genius and the teaching of Christianity that we ever met with, though he upholds the book as intended to illustrate one of the deepest of the sayings of the Sermon on the Mount:—

"The Poet's Function—Elective Affinities.

The very simple text, of which my novel, 'The Elective Affinities,' is a paraphrase, reads thus (Matt. v., 28):—Whosoever looks on a woman to lust after her has committed adultery with her already in his heart. Whether any one, among its numerous readers and critics, has ever recognised this text behind the paraphrase, I cannot tell. The public never can be made to understand that the true poet is only a masked father confessor, whose special function is to exhibit what is dangerous in sentiment and pernicious in action, by a vivid picture of their consequences. Before the moral significance of a true work of art can be generally apprehended, a much higher degree of culture on the part of the public must be attained. To understand this sort of confession, in fact, the reader must have been trained to play the part of father confessor to himself."

Goethe may, if he pleases, say, and say with truth, that this is the moral of that detestable tale. So, too, it may be said to be the moral of more than half the histories of illicit passion which are contained either in real life or in fiction. But there is more than one way of teaching a moral. It may be taught by warning the moral nature against contamination. Or it may be taught by contaminating the mind, and then enlarging on the bitter results of that experience. It is in this last way that the story of the Elective Affinities enforces, so far as it does enforce, the teaching of the passage in the Sermon on the Mount to which Goethe referred. In Goethe's writings, temptation, however ruinous, is always treated in the same way,—as a subject for delicate analysis and elaborate dalliance, indeed as productive of no true evil even if it results in occasional triumph over man's virtue, on the ground that the full teaching of human "experience," that great object of Goethe's adoration, has thereby been gained in full. Professor Blackie's attempt to represent Goethe's "Selbst-bildung" as a genuine pursuit of Christian perfection, in the proper sense of that term—that sense in which voluntary sin is the one unspeakable evil of life to which no other evil is for a moment comparable—is, to any one who knows Goethe's writings and his history well, hardly serious. The truth is, that with all Goethe's calm appreciation of Christianity as a great power in the world, and on the whole, as he would have said, a very beneficent power, Goethe never pretended to be a Christian. He could enter into his "fair saint's" view, but he never shared it. His was at bottom the Hellenic view, both of pleasure and of virtue. He had no supernatural horror of sin. On the contrary, it, like almost everything else that was human, fascinated him. He loved to probe it, to trifle with it, to measure its power. He never thought of the admonition simply to flee from it, as anything but a Hebraic superstition.

We cannot acquiesce at all in Professor Blackie's account of Goethe's life. Whatever else the first six years at Weimar were, they were certainly not good years. There can be no doubt at all of the course of dissipation in which the Court, and Goethe with it, was plunged during those years. And the impress of this dissipation is left on his works and on his life. To speak, as Professor Blackie does, of the connection which Goethe formed on his return from Italy as a marriage in which the ecclesiastical ceremony was but a few years delayed, is, so far as we know, quite without any sort of authority. There is nothing, we believe, to show that Goethe at first intended marriage at all. Indeed, Christiane Vulpius did not, till after her son's birth, live in his house. And then it was some seventeen years before he married her. There is certainly everything to show that he neither expected nor demanded for his companion the respect which a man would demand for any one whom he regarded as his wife, and whom he had only delayed making his wife from defective respect for the religious rite itself. How could a man who really thought of a woman as his wife write of her to another in the contemptuously patronising style in which Goethe wrote of Christiane to the Frau von Stein? Professor Blackie's account of this and other matters in Goethe's life will not survive for a moment any serious comparison with the facts of the case. The truth is that Goethe, first in leaving Lili for the Court of Weimar,—then, in all his relations there,—and finally, in forming the connection which he had subsequently the right-mindedness to turn into that of marriage, was thinking entirely of what suited best his own self-culture in a very poor sense indeed, as compared with that grand sense in which Professor Blackie regards it, namely, as synonymous with the craving after spiritual perfection. That Goethe knew pretty well how faithless to his own highest nature he had been when he broke through his engagement with Lili for the life at Weimar, he betrayed plainly enough to Eckermann in his old age. In 1830, two years before his death, he said:—"I see the fascinating Lili again in all her vividness before me, and it is as if I felt again the breath of her delicious neighbourhood. She was, in truth, the first whom I deeply and truly loved. Also, I may say, that she was the last, for all the inclinations which affected me in the remainder of my life were, compared with that first, only slight and superficial. I was never so near to my true happiness as in that time of my love for Lili. The obstacles which separated us were, at bottom, by no means insuperable, and yet she was lost to me." And there is no manner of doubt why she was lost to him. Lili was lost to Goethe because he could not endure at that time the prospect of the domestic fetters which marriage would impose, and because he lusted after the personal freedom and ambition of the Court life to which he was bound. Professor Blackie may be as eloquent as he pleases, he will never convince the present writer, who has studied the facts,—and we believe that he would hardly have convinced Goethe himself,—that Goethe approaches at all near to the moral standard of a great, good man. A great man intellectually, Goethe was. Morally, he stood very much below many who were vastly his intellectual inferiors.

But of Professor Blackie's selection we can speak much more favourably than of the memoir he has prefixed to it. It is full of weighty sayings, sayings weighty with centuries of illustration. Take this, for instance, on "freedom," and consider in how remarkable a way the history of Athens, of Rome, of France, of England, and of the United States,—to say nothing of any other national life,—illustrated its depth:—

"Freedom.

The moment men obtain perfect freedom, that moment they erect a stage for the manifestation of their faults. The strong characters begin to go wrong by excess of energy; the weak by remissness in action."

Or take this, on self-limitation:—

"Self-limitation.

The smallest man may be complete, if he confine his activity within the natural range of his capacities and dexterities; but even superior talents will be obscured, defeated, and destroyed, if this indispensable instinct of self-limitation is wanting. Mistakes arising from this defect will come more and more to the front in modern times; for who shall be able to satisfy the demands of an age, living under the stimulus of a constant high pressure, and the excitement of a hot-spurred progression?"

Or take this still finer saying, on "Truth," which reminds one of Lord Bacon, though given in the modern manner, and not in Lord Bacon's sententious style:—

"Truth.

Truth is a torch, but a terrible one; oftentimes so terrible that the natural instinct of us all is to give a side-glance with a blinking eye, lest, looking it fairly in the face, the strong glare might blind us."

Or this, again, on the function of the prophet in relation to the past,—one of his functions too often left out of sight. It might have been written to bring out the true strength of Carlyle, though Goethe, by the way, never lived to see Carlyle's true strength illustrated:—

"The Prophet.

Not the Future alone; the Past is the realm of the prophet;
Often, how often, their past reads like a riddle to men!
Whoso knows the Past may divine the Future: the present Binds with a perfecting bond link unto link of the years."

We thank Professor Blackie heartily for his specimens or Goethe's wisdom, while entirely repudiating his estimate of the greatness of his hero's moral character. Goethe was a glorious man of the world. But into the spiritual and ethical life which Christianity has held up to us, he had glimpses through his fine-imagination rather than through his own voluntary experience.

A NEW NATURAL HISTORY.*

IN his preface, the editor of these beautifully got-up volumes asserts that more interest is usually taken in natural history early in life than later on, and there are indications in the body of the work that this notion has exercised some influence upon the plan and execution of portions of it. The notion, of which we believe the popularity to be on the wane, involves, in our opinion, a conception of natural history sufficient, perhaps, in Goldsmith's time, but altogether inadequate at the present day. A natural history of animals not written mainly upon biological lines would be simply another Animated Nature, and would appeal principally to a youthful public. Despite the preface, the editor seems to have felt this to some extent, and the result is that the treatment of the subject is often almost purely scientific, while it is occasionally popular, even to triviality, and one cannot resist the suspicion that in some instances the letterpress has rather been intended to explain the woodcuts, than these to illustrate the text. The ideal natural history would be such a work as a Bronn, a Brehm, and a Darwin might combine to write; not merely a description of the more obvious characteristics of animals, and of the salient peculiarities of their modes of life, but an account which, without being recondite or overcharged with detail, should be philosophic and adequate, of the wonderful adaptations of means to ends displayed by their structure, of their blood relationships, of their geographical distribution, and of their psychology. In fact, the boundary-line between a zoological treatise and a natural history is by no means easy to draw, and the chief distinction, perhaps, ought to be simply in the greater prominence given in the latter to what we may term animal portraiture and biography.

The monkeys and lemurs occupy nearly five-sevenths of the first volume, an amount of space that seems disproportionate. The gorilla alone has forty pages to himself, many of which are taken up with extracts. Some of the space thus used might, we think, have been reserved with advantage for a fuller description of the classes Pisces, Mollusca, and Insecta, especially of the more interesting British genera and species of these classes. Further, the treatment of the various divisions of the subject is not based upon any uniform plan; and lastly, the whole work is, so to speak, written backwards. Instead of leading the student—and more or less of a student every reader of the book must be—from a consideration of the simpler forms of life to a comprehension of more complicated organisms, the contrary process is adopted, with the result that the difficulty of gaining clear and connected conceptions of animal life as a whole, and of the typical forms of life exhibited by species, genera, and orders, respectively, is unnecessarily increased. Upon the method pursued, at all events, the description of the primates should have been prefaced by a brief account of the principal member of the order,—man. He is the criterion or standard to which the various forms and phenomena of vertebrate existence are referred, and without some knowledge of his structure an adequate comprehension of the scientific aspects of the class is not easy of attainment. The osteology of the Vertebrata, especially of the skull and limbs, is well described and admirably illustrated throughout. The internal anatomy is less attended to save in the case of the birds, the account of which, by Mr. Bowdler Sharpe, is in every respect a model, both in plan and method, of what, in our opinion, a natural history should be. Mr. Sharpe, whose extraordinary knowledge of his subject we need hardly advert to, prefaces his description by a general view of the structure and relations of the class which is as clear as it is interesting. He then proceeds, in language which hits the exact mean between rigidly scientific accuracy of terminology and popular phraseology, to exhibit, with the aid of excellent illustrations, the anatomy of man's "feathered favourites," showing in sufficient detail how their various organs and structures are specially adapted to the aerial lives they lead. We regret that the opportunity was not seized to give a brief explanation of the development of the chick, some knowledge of which process, or of some like episode in the life-history of animals—though not usually furnished by natural histories—is absolutely necessary to understand the unity of the animal world, and the significance and scope of Darwin's great discovery. Lastly, the division of existing birds into those with a keeled sternum or breast-bone, affording a greater purchase to the powerful muscles by which the wings are made to beat against the air, and those with a flat breast-bone, is considered before the systematic description of the class is proceeded with. To many readers, the latter portion of the subject will prove the most attractive; and so full and interesting is the account given of the migrations, instincts, and habits of the most universally admired of all the classes of the animal kingdom, that the pages of the third and fourth volumes will probably be turned over more frequently than those of any others of the series. We wish, however, Mr. Sharpe had given some description of the song of birds. It would have been well if the method of treatment applied to this class had been followed with the other vertebrates. Their zoology and anatomy can, it is true, be gathered with fair sufficiency from the chapters devoted to them; but the details must be sought out and pieced together, which none but ardent students are likely to take the trouble to do.

The sixth and last volume, as a whole, is the most satisfactory one of the series. It is more of a zoology and less of a mere natural history, in the popular acceptation of the term, than any of the preceding volumes; and, as we have already hinted, the distinction between the two is becoming less obvious with every advance of science, which now neglects no fact connected with the life, habits, or actions of animals. Of the Arachnida, Mr. Dallas contributes an excellent survey. Had he had more space at his disposal, we cannot doubt he would have given us a fuller account of the spiders, the curious habits of many of which have been so ably investigated by the late Mr. Moggridge. Mr. Woodward's description of the Crustacea is especially valuable, and exhibits the same orderly and exhaustive method we have already noticed in Mr. Sharpe's history of the birds. The principal points in the anatomy of the class are admirably explained and equally well illustrated; the engravings of the different kinds of lobsters are, indeed, magnificent examples of the artistic talent the scientific naturalist now has at his command. Equal praise must be accorded to Professor Sollas' treatment of the difficult group of the Spongiæ, the more important points in the life-history of which are explained in a manner as interesting as instructive. Here, again, as throughout these volumes, the publishers have been lavish of illustrations, many of which are of exquisite beauty. The Infusoria are excellently handled by the editor, but the subject is too vast to be capable of anything like adequate treatment—even for the purposes of a natural history—in a score of pages. The concise bibliography which Professor Duncan has appended is a most valuable aid, and a similar assistance to the reader might well have been furnished throughout the work.

On the whole, we must confess to some disappointment with these volumes taken together. The interest in natural history increases every year with the spread and improvement of education in natural science. Professor Duncan and his eminent collaborators might well have aimed throughout at meeting the wants of an older and more instructed public than they appear to have had in view when they began their task. As it is, much of the book is beyond youth, and portions of it will be unattractive to real lovers of the subject. It is to the plan and method rather than to the matter of the work that we have ventured to take exception,—for the character and accuracy of the scientific element in it the names of the contributors afford a sufficient guarantee; and despite its defects of method, it is considerably in advance of any natural history hitherto published in this country.

AT FAULT.*

CAPTAIN HAWLEY SMART is a capital story-teller. We use the expression advisedly; for in these days of many-mouthed criticism, a novelist is nothing unless he has his species in the genus. "Many men, as many minds,"—is truer of novel-readers than of most classes, and their name is legion. Some like melodrama to form the basis of the work, while it is caviare to others, who prefer a study of character without a plot; and still-life pictures have admirers as warm as moving narrators of fire and murder. There never was more of a melodramatist than Walter Scott, and never less of one than Miss Austen, and Miss Austen and Sir Walter were great novelists both. Charles Dickens began with taking the fortunes of some individual being, after whom he christened his book, and letting those fortunes lead hero and reader whithersoever they would. In later days he followed the stage-bent which was so strong in him, and constructed elaborate plots leading up to the end from the first. Mr. Ward, his latest biographer and critic in the Morley series, thinks the latter work very superior to the first; and the present reviewer, following his individual taste, takes a directly opposite view; whence arises food for reflection, and much suggestion of modesty in the propounding of opinions. It has struck us more than once, with some inward amusement, that authors are generally far less sure of their own work than some of their critics are of their opinions about it. This critical cocksureness would seem to be greatly on the increase, and certainly the posthumous form it has recently so much assumed, in the shape of essences of biography, promises to add a new terror to individual fame. Fancy being told after you are dead, as Macaulay has lately been informed by Mr. Cotter Morison, that you ought not to have been so frivolous as to recite Homer to yourself when sea-sick on the way to Dublin, instead of "thinking out" the Irish problem. A certain Homeric laughter possessed us as we read and amused ourselves by reflecting how Macaulay himself, in his Montgomery mood, would have pulverised this funny and modest critic of his greatness. Mr. Morison is very angry with Macaulay for wanting to write history which young ladies could read with pleasure, holding that the dignity of history has too much of the big "H" about it to allow that it should be in a tongue understood of young ladies. We have not yet quite reached that point with novels; though, alas! there are signs abroad, in the quick-march of so-called information, that soon we shall. In the wide-spreading field which, as we have said, they occupy, it might have been said a short time ago of novels, at all events, that for them, "tout genre est permis, hors le genre ennuyeux." The exception hardly holds good now, we fear, for we can think of certain latter-day works of fiction whose success is due more, apparently, to their powers of mental exhaustion than anything else. Nobody enjoys them, but it looks so clever to say you do. The hypocrisy, parent or child of Matthew Arnold's "want of lucidity," which a wise man once said was the chief characteristic of the British nation, is assuredly not on the decrease in the fields of literature. Whatever may be the case with the average reader, to be "lucid" in a writer is rapidly becoming a crime.

Now Captain Smart, whom we have kept waiting too long, is a very lucid writer indeed; and we say so at once to attract the young ladies for whom Macaulay sang, for whose suffrages so many of us have yet a sneaking and ill-informed desire. We as frankly warn off the wise, which category, let Mr. Morison reassure himself, includes now-a-days a large proportion of young ladies, of whom Macaulay dreamed not. The present reviewer,—who may at least pretend to this much of wisdom, that he finds the great majority of novels quite unreadable,—galloped straight and without skipping through At Fault, from cover to cover of its three volumes; and he hopes that the simile may not be inappropriate to the well-known characteristics of the novels of the author, who has been long recognised as Whyte-Melville's bright and legitimate successor. In this instance, to our surprise we discovered, Captain Smart has deserted the racing and riding world altogether, except where, just within sight of the "finis" winning-post, his private version of Uncle Dick's memorial (which all men carry about with them in some shape or another) suddenly breaks out in one irrepressible allusion to the "great annual spring riddle on Epsom Downs." We can assure all readers, for the benefit both of those whom the assurance will attract and those whom it will repel, that there is practically no Thought in the tale, scarcely more than in Macaulay when he was so reprehensibly sea-sick. Yet, after all, a good deal of thinking of some kind must have been spent upon the ingenious mystery which forms the basis of the plot of At Fault; and we are apt to believe that there is a growing class of men now-a-days who are fond of depreciating all forms of the many-sided process of thinking, which do not happen to be that in which they are themselves given to indulge. Nor is there much elaboration of character in Captain Smart's novel, though there is plenty of suggestion of it. The detective is the most complete; but the detective of fiction has an inevitable sameness about him, from Inspector Bucket onwards, which makes him more of a stage type than a reality. The two pairs of lovers, Philip and Bessie, and Herbert and Nid, are simple and delightful, with no more character about them than lovers ought and used to have; healthy, straightforward young Britons, with a flavour of Kingsley, and without any suggestion of his peculiar preference for the east wind and the Athanasian Creed. The story, in which we can detect no padding from beginning to end, is told with the directness of the old Italian novelettes, which supplied the subjects for such fine dramatic work in the hands of more elaborate masters. It is just this dramatic quality, the life-blood of good story-telling, which attracts us so much, and not for the first time, in Captain Smart's work. We do not mean that this particular novel would make a good play; for the mystery is not of a kind which, as far as we can judge, would lend itself to stage treatment. But it is very dramatically conceived and kept up: and when, at the end of the second volume, its solution is suddenly flashed upon the reader, the effect is considerable, as it is well contrived. It is much to the author's credit that, after the secret is guessed, the interest in working it out is, nevertheless, well kept up, and the book laid down with a sense of satisfied completeness. The story, moreover, is quite possible enough to be probable; the only fault which we have to find with its probabilities being that we do not think that, under the peculiar circumstances of the trial to which the story leads up, any judge would have charged for murder, or a jury have found the prisoner guilty of it. Not only the absence of motive, which is properly dwelt upon, but the absolute presence of strong motive the other way, would bring the crime on which the trial runs into the category of manslaughter.

We have avoided anything like quotation, or even the usual abstract of the plot, because in novels of this class anything like the latter is unfair to the author, and only spoils the reader's pleasure. Nor is there anything very salient to quote, from a writer whose sound and straightforward style is now so well known, especially as in this instance he has deserted the field in which he is a passed master, and given us none of the Turf intrigues which he excels in describing. But Captain Smart is a shrewd and amused observer of life in more forms than one, and his minor characters show no falling-off in his faculties in that way. The wretched landlord who suddenly finds his inn the scene of a murder and an inquest, and resents it as a personal injury, is very entertaining, and well-contrasted with the provincial busybody who has a vaulting ambition in the way of local boards, and regards the cause célèbre with which he is accidentally connected as a sort of possession of his own. The youthful clerk who helps Serjeant Usher in his inquiries, and is promptly snubbed when he presumes too much—as a young gentleman whose only chance of not becoming a thief lies, in the serjeant's opinion, in turning detective as soon as possible—is the means of introducing another amusing episode. In days when there is so much talk about the want of dramatists—talk with the usual proportions of truth and falsehood in it—it is a pity that the system of collaboration, which has produced such successful results in France, is not more generally and carefully studied. Captain Smart appears to us to have just the qualities which, in combination with others which a skilled playwright could supply, would produce some good English plays. As it is, we owe him our thanks for a well-conceived and well-written story, which it must have been a pleasure to write, as it is to read.

MEXICO TO-DAY.*

SINCE the publication of Madame Calderon de la Barca's life-like sketches of Mexico, forty years ago, no work has appeared which gives such vivid pictures, combined with so much solid information as to the resources of the country, as are to be found in Mr. Brocklehurst's "Mexico To-day." It is, of course, impossible that in a visit extending only over seven months he could acquire so thorough an insight into the habits and customs of the people, into their ways of thinking and acting, and into their domestic and every-day life, as was attained during a residence of two years by the observant and accomplished Scotch wife of the first Spanish Minister to the Republic; yet the author has succeeded not only in reproducing, for the benefit of those who have not been there, those impressions which the aspect of a country comparatively so little known must make on every traveller, but he has also done good service, both to his own countrymen and to his late hosts, by calling attention to the magnificent capabilities and the rapidly developing resources of a country which can exhibit within the radius of a few miles every production, whether of the temperate or of the torrid zone.

* Mexico To-day: a Country with a Great Future; and a Glance at the Prehistoric Remains and Antiquities of the Montezumas. By Thomas Unett Brocklehurst, with Coloured Plates and Illustrations from Sketches by the Author. London: John Murray.

It is interesting to compare these two pictures, taken at an interval of forty years, and to note the differences which the increased facilities of communication have made between them. When Madame Calderon de la Barca wrote, Mexico was perhaps the most isolated of the civilised countries of the world; its intercourse with the world outside may be said, indeed, to have been then restricted to the single port of Vera Cruz; harbour it had none, nor even land communication with its neighbours north and south, for its frontiers, both with Guatemala and with the United States, were undefined, and infested by hostile Indians, who practically intercepted and prevented all commerce; the Panama Railway had not been made, gold had not been discovered in California (which then formed part of Mexico), Japan was still closed to foreigners, so there was little or no trade with the Pacific ports. The capital lay at a distance of over 250 miles from Vera Cruz, which distance took passengers three days' hard travelling in a diligence to accomplish; and merchandise was, under favourable circumstances, a fortnight on the road, and during the rainy season, i.e., nearly half the year, usually occupied about six weeks. The communication with Europe was restricted to one packet a month, and even that was occasionally unable to land her letters for some days, when the "Norte" blew straight into the open roadstead of Vera Cruz. The internal communications were hardly better; even between the capital and the coast, the roads which had been made by the Spaniards in the old colonial days had been allowed to fall into such a state of disrepair, that the diligences as frequently went across the open fields as along what had once been a well-paved chaussée; while the passengers, who always went well armed, were not unfrequently stopped and plundered even of their clothes by a few half-armed robbers, whom it was not considered etiquette to resist. At one time the diligence was regularly stopped at a point near Orizaba, and black mail was levied by a band which consisted of a woman armed with a blunderbuss and her boy with a stick; and it was a common joke in the city of Mexico that the passengers of the incoming diligence were unwilling to alight in the crowded courtyard of the Iturbide Hotel, because the robbers had left them nothing but the latest intelligence in the form of newspapers to dispose as gracefully as they could about their persons. This state of isolation was maintained for twenty years—up to the time of the French intervention—indeed, it was not until after the French had, on the termination of the Civil War in the United States, received notice to quit from Mr. Seward, and had in consequence deserted Maximilian and left the country, that the first railway, that between the city of Mexico and Vera Cruz, was completed. At the present moment there are over a thousand miles of railway open, and Mr. Brocklehurst states that in less than two years travellers will be able "to board the train at New York, and reach the halls of the Montezumas within five days."

Twenty years ago, there was not such a thing as a bank-note in the country; the currency was entirely specie, consisting mainly of the well-known silver dollar, which circulates all over the coasts of China and Japan, and of a small amount of the old gold "onzas,"—handsome, broad pieces, worth $16 each. It was a curious sight at the gambling-tables and cockpits at the annual fair of San Angel to see the piles of these ounces which changed hands on the turn of a card or the thrust of a spur; and it was no easy matter to pay a debt of any large amount, when even in gold a sum of $5,000 was as heavy as you would care to carry for any distance. Mr. Brocklehurst found bank-notes of two banks in the capital in common use, and the Government were about to issue nickel coin, to relieve the scarcity of small change.

Another point in which very great progress has been made is that of religious toleration. It is not too much to say that until 1860, nearly half of the city of Mexico and of Puebla and other large towns, as well as a very large proportion of the richest "haciendas" (or farms) in the country, belonged to some religious corporation or other. The power of the Church was broken by the nationalisation of ecclesiastical property by Juarez and the Liberal party in that year, a measure which the return to power of the Church party under Miramon and Almonte shortly after was unable to repeal. It was under the auspices of this latter party that the unfortunate Maximilian was summoned from Miramar; but, at heart a Liberal, he soon found himself out of sympathy with his nominal supporters, while at the same time, chiefly owing to the double-dealing of Marshal Bazaine, he was unable to attract to his standard that Liberal element by whose support he would have gladly ruled. He thus fell between two stools; he had alienated the Clericals, without attaching to himself the Liberals, and when the French withdrew he had no following of his own to fall back upon. By the Constitutional Edict issued by Maximilian, freedom of worship and toleration of all religions were proclaimed as the law of the land, though practically, from lack of sufficient Protestants or other denominationalists to form a congregation, these principles were not put to the test. Maximilian, however, evinced his readiness to carry them out in practice, by granting a disused convent in Mexico to the Freemasons as their headquarters, by whom it was used as such without provoking any opposition or complaint, though, perhaps, this may be due to the comparative obscurity in which they worked. In one corner of the country the presence of a Protestant clergyman must certainly be welcome. There has for many years existed a considerable English colony in the mining district of Real del Monte, chiefly Cornishmen, many of whom have their wives and families with them; they were warmly attached to their Protestant faith, and sufficient in number even twenty years ago to compose a congregation of seventy or eighty, to whom the English "Administrador," or Resident Manager, of the Company used to read service in his own house on Sunday morning. This gentleman, however, hardly felt himself equal to celebrating the Marriage Service, which was occasionally demanded in the community. The Mexican priests would not bless the union of heretics, and there was no Protestant clergyman within a thousand miles. What was to be done? On one of these occasions it chanced that the captain of an English ship was on a visit to the place, and he was persuaded by several anxious couples into stretching his authority, which admittedly on board his own ship extended to the exercise of certain clerical functions in the absence of a chaplain, so far as to perform the wedding service for his own countrymen at an elevation of 8,000 feet above the sea in the interior of Mexico. The matter was in course of time reported home by her Majesty's Minister, and under the circumstances it was considered right to condone this assumption of the binding power, and a special Act of Parliament was passed to legitimatise the issue of the marriages which had been thus in perfect good-faith, if somewhat irregularly celebrated. Such a necessity no longer exists, for if there be not a clergyman resident at Real del Monte, the English miners there are, at any rate, within reach of the capital, where Mr. Brocklehurst found four different Protestant congregations, under their respective pastors, who had developed the usual ecclesiastical prejudices and animosities, thereby, as he points out, affording to the Catholic priests an opportunity of cautioning their flocks against joining a body which was so divided against itself. He paid special attention to the work and operation of Missions, in the course of a journey round the world, and came to the conclusion that in many instances positive harm was being done, and that the money would be better spent in our crowded cities at home.

In two respects Mr. Brocklehurst would appear to have been led away by what he heard and saw into adopting too roseate a view of the condition of Mexico, namely, as to its financial position and the stability of its political institutions. He avers that the old habit of resorting to a "pronunciamiento" is at an end, owing to the influence of the iron road and telegraph. Considering that the present President, Gonzalez, came into power little more than two years ago in consequence of a revolution which overthrew his predecessor, Porfirio Diaz, this seems a somewhat hazardous assertion; and the author's incidental mention of the fact that on starting from Vera Cruz it was necessary for the rear carriage of the train to be occupied by an officer and fifty men as a guard against robbers, is a curious commentary on the assumption that the railroad has done away with the old state of things. With regard to her finances, Mr. Brocklehurst maintains that Mexico, so far from being, as is generally supposed, a hopeless bankrupt, "has the resources to even increase her Debt and pay every penny of it;" and yet on the same page he admits that she has repudiated her Debt to France, and has not paid that due to England. Do not these statements, taken together, make her out to be something very like a fraudulent bankrupt? He is mistaken in saying that since the recall of Mr. Ashton Forbes, in December, 1861, we have never renewed diplomatic relations, the fact being that Mr. Ashton Forbes never represented Great Britain in Mexico at all. Sir Charles Wyke resided there as her Majesty's Minister till December, 1861, when he and General Prim withdrew from the tripartite convention with the French, on the latter making it manifest that they intended to interfere in the internal affairs of the country; and, further, on the establishment of the Empire, Mr. Scarlett was accredited to Maximilian, and our Legation was not withdrawn until after the execution of the Emperor, in June, 1867. Mr. Brocklehurst deprecates the absence of any British Representative, and assures us, on the faith of the Mexican Minister for Foreign Affairs, that the latter's Government have in no way repudiated their debts to England, but have simply been unable to meet them. Surely, if Mexico desires to renew relations, the first advances should come from her, and should be accompanied by a frank statement of what she intends to do towards fulfilling obligations contracted long anterior to the French intervention, and recognised by successive Governments of the Republic. Two-thirds of the foreign trade of Mexico are with the United States; the average of imports of British produce into Mexico during the ten years 1871-80 is under a million, while that of exports to Great Britain is but little over half that sum, so there cannot on commercial grounds be any very pressing necessity for renewing British representation in that country.

Space fails to do more than give a word of praise to the excellent manner in which the book is got up; the illustrations of scenery are, most of them, faithful representations, though in some, notably in the frontispiece, the outlines of the mountains, and in Plate xxii., the angle of the Pyramids of Teotihuacan, have been much exaggerated. The plates of Mexican antiquities are especially valuable, as they have never been figured before in any popular work, and most of them have never been figured at all. It is curious, by the way, that the author should not have remarked that the so-called Greek fret is a very common ornament on the clay whorls and other articles of pottery; and he seems to be unaware of the existence of the Aztec obsidian mines, deep and very narrow shafts in the mountains near Real del Monte. A little more care in the spelling of Spanish words would have been desirable; "zarepa," for "zarape;" "macheta," for "machete;" and "Plaza Mayo," for "Mayor," are all errors in words of every-day use that might have been avoided; and no book is complete without an index. Still, these are slight defects in a work which cannot fail to give both pleasure and information to any reader who does not know the country; while to one who does, it recalls half-forgotten memories, and induces a longing to visit again one of the most attractive regions and the finest climate on the face of God's earth.

MR. MOZLEY'S LECTURES.*

Dr. MOZLEY's literary remains would have been well worth publishing, if it were only for the sake of giving to the world his very remarkable essay—the third in the volume—on "The Jewish and Heathen Conceptions of a Future State." The interest of this paper is not by any means confined to the author's treatment of the immediate question it deals with, but consists as much or more in his exposition of principles of religious knowledge never, perhaps, of more practical importance than at the present crisis in the history of the world. In days like these, when religion is watered-down to mere sentiment, and a belief in the supernatural is readily ascribed to the force of habit or inclination, or to the credulousness of a disordered fancy—parallel to a child's fear, when left alone in a dark room, that there may be a ghost in it—it becomes of the highest importance to draw a sharp, a well-defined line between mere feeling and imagination, which, as such, are purely subjective, and tell of no truth beyond themselves, and those deep instincts of our moral nature—the sense of sin and reverence for virtue, the yearning after what is noble and outside the range of our sensual needs—which point to something beyond themselves; which are, as it were, the shadow of the Divinity, and the first indications to our minds of His presence in the world. Dr. Mozley was, we think, singularly happy in the suggestions he made on this subject, and his essay has the advantage of treating of it in connection with concrete historical facts. Whether or no his principles fully and truly explain these facts, we shall not inquire. They undoubtedly do so to some extent, but the importance of his remarks goes, as we have said, far beyond the theme which he is immediately engaged in discussing. This theme is stated broadly in the following passage :—

"It has been remarked, by those who have wished to derogate from the value and rank of the Jewish dispensation, that the Jews were worse-off than the Pagans in one important point,—namely, that they were without a doctrine of a future state, whereas Paganism taught that doctrine. This is a question, then, not only of speculative interest, but of great moment, considering that the estimate of a divine dispensation is affected by it. But in order to decide it, we must first have before us with some accuracy what the Pagan doctrine was, and what the Jewish absence of doctrine was; for we must know both of these conditions of thought, in order to compare them together, and judge whether the positive conception of the Pagan was, being compared with the absence of definite conception in Judaism, a ground of superiority to him. Again, we cannot estimate the Jewish attitude towards a Future State without a reference to the Christian conception of a Future State, for which the condition of the Jew was a preparation."

In this passage, Dr. Mozley lays down the lines on which he is to proceed. He goes on to show how different were the various forms of the Pagan doctrine—whether in its popular shape, or as taught in the philosophical schools—from the Christian idea of eternal life. The continuance of personal identity is at the root of the Christian conception, and this disappears entirely in metempsychosis, and in the doctrine, so common among ancient philosophers, of the absorption of the soul in God after death; while it is attenuated to an unreal shadow of self, in the poetical accounts of the state of the dead. "It has been remarked, indeed," he adds, "by an acute writer [Archbishop Whately] that the shadowy character which the ancients attributed to existence after death was a mode of betraying their own want of true belief in that existence." And here we have the first indication of the line of argument which the author works out afterwards in detail. The notion of immortality prevalent among the Pagans was not a real belief, he holds, but the offspring of an impatient curiosity. They longed to penetrate behind the veil, and to solve the awful mystery suggested by the phenomenon of death, which was so constantly before their eyes. They were not, Dr. Mozley holds, in a state in which reason could tell them anything on the subject, and consequently, to obtain relief, to free themselves from the pain of suspended judgment, they filled their minds with theories of their own construction, not seriously believed, but dwelt upon for the sake of the immediate satisfaction they afforded to the imaginative mind. But why, we ask, could they not see by the light of reason a truth which Dr. Mozley holds to be within the grasp of the intellect of a Christian? This leads us to his treatment of the Jewish absence of conception of any future state. The doctrine of eternal life, Dr. Mozley argues in effect, is far above and beyond the requirements of human nature in its primâ facie aspect. Both heaven and hell appear to be beyond the deserts of mortal man. Most of our acquaintance seem, at first-sight, "o'er gude for banning, and o'er bad for blessing." It is only after the spiritual element in man's nature has been fostered and developed, and his dependence on God and awful responsibilities in this world fully realised, that he is able to know his own greatness, and to see the fitness, nay, the necessity, of an eternal life, to complete the divine scheme in his creation. And this raising of human nature, this development of its noblest instincts, was, Dr. Mozley contends, the work of the Jewish law :—

"To build up, then, the Christian doctrine of everlasting life, so incredible to human nature, a new foundation was necessary, and that foundation was a moral one. And it was this moral foundation which was laid in the Jewish law. It is as a moral being that man feels his value; that he feels himself not a creature made for this life only, but for another; that he feels even everlasting life, sublime and transcendent thought as it is, not unsuitable or unfit for him. The law was a schoolmaster that gave man a knowledge of himself, that awakened his conscience, enlightened his perceptions, and revealed him to himself; acquainted him with the moral purpose of his creation, and with his own moral nature and capabilities. The law was thus a preparation, an education, and a discipline for the revelation of this truth, and introduced man to the designs of God for him."

But, Dr. Mozley pertinently asks, if the law raised his conception of his own nature, and pointed to the fitness of a great and eternal destiny for him, how came it that the Jew never rose to a clear and explicit belief, such as the Gospel enjoins, in life everlasting? The answer is that, although occasionally, as in the Book of Job, the truth may have flashed more or less distinctly across individual minds, yet, on the whole, it was a part of the temper of mind enjoined on the Jews by their law-givers to refrain from speculation, and to be content with a calm and patient trust in God, conscious that all would be well with them, so long as they remained faithful to Him. "The whole religion was in its very nature expectant, acknowledging in itself its own want of finality." Attention to duty and obedience to the law being the very key-note of the life of a pious Jew, he refrained, as he was bid, from carrying his knowledge of his own lofty destiny to its legitimate outcome, being content with that general confidence that God would be with him to the end which is implied in such texts as, "Let me die the death of the righteous," or, "The end of that man is in peace."

"It was his trial to restrain curiosity and fancy, and submit quietly to a midway position. It was a trial to the imagination analogous to that which Butler lays upon the intellect in a particular case. The impulse of a sceptical mind is to total disbelief as the decision of, and relief from, doubt. The impulse of the imagination is to the very contrary, not to illegitimate demolition, but to illegitimate construction; but the motive is the same, namely, that of obtaining decision and relief. The false repose of the arbitrary settlement of a question, and having done with it without regard to the evidence, is the same in either case; and the discipline of resisting either impulse, namely, the restraining of impatience, is the same."

The contrast between the two pictures is, to our mind, very striking, and places in most prominent relief the wide difference between two states of mind which religious sceptics love to identify. On the one side, there is the curiosity of an imaginative mind, credulous but flippant in its beliefs, unchecked by the sense of duty or responsibility, little impressed by the sacredness of the claims of truth; and, doubtless, such a temper of mind will readily lead to the wildest and grossest superstition. On the other side, there is the sense of law, the perception of the great possibilities of human nature, consciousness of dependence on God and of duties towards Him, and, at the same time, great fear of error, and caution in speculation; while, nevertheless, the sense that there is a truth to be known in connection with the mysterious and deep aspirations to which so much attention has been given becomes ever stronger, and must lead in the long-run to its attainment.

SOME MAGAZINES.

THE Nineteenth Century is readable, though amidst the crowd of contributions we notice nothing of unusual importance. Mr. Matthew Arnold finishes and does not improve his monograph on Isaiah, descending in this second part to the style of the modern commentator who is so anxious about authorship, and interpolations, and dates. That is useful work in its way, but not the work we expect of Mr. Arnold, who in doing it is forced to rely on second-hand knowledge, and can gain no aid from his peculiar genius. When he tells us that the source of the tragic impressiveness of these prophecies is the ground-tone of inexorableness which pervades them, we listen impressed, for the writer is a great critic of poetry, and his opinion on such a point is of itself evidence; but when he discourses of Lowth's emendations and the proper divisions of Isaiah, we turn unsatisfied to the Hebraists, and ask if they have no sense of intrusion into their kingdom. We hope, when Mr. Arnold publishes this essay by itself, he will give us a little more criticism and a little less dissertation, and, above all, include in his volume Isaiah printed as it should be according to his theory. Earl Cowper, in spite of the jerky and as it were lazy style in which it pleases him to express himself, gives us, in "Desultory Reflections of a Whig," a paper of some real value, if only from its author's point of view. He evidently cares little for abstract ideas, and tries questions by the test of political expediency. Upon that ground he maintains that the Whigs are right as yet in adhering to the Radicals, who, so far, are not encouraging Revolution by their innovations, but by removing grievances rendering the Revolution less probable. He quotes the Irish Land Act as a wise measure, because a measure dictated by political necessity, and utterly rejects the notion that it will be a precedent. There is nothing very new in what he says, but it is interesting, because he is no Radical, has no wish except to govern well, and brings everything to the test of a rather hard common-sense. He sees as yet no sign of Revolutionary passion in Great Britain. Sir Julian Goldsmid is as coldly sensible in discussing the "Questions of the Day in India," which he has recently visited. He is entirely in favour of Lord Ripon's ideas of local self-government, which, as he shows, have already succeeded in the Central Provinces under Mr. Morris, but he holds Mr. Ilbert's Bill for increasing the authority of native magistrates over Europeans uncalled for. The privilege of the Europeans should be swept away when all are made equal before the law, not now, when a thousand natives in Calcutta alone are exempt from the obligation to give evidence in the ordinary way. They can require to be examined at home by a special commission. To take away their right would raise an insurrection; and why take away that of the Europeans, of which, till the question was raised, the majority of the people were unconscious? Sir Julian's impression of the administration of India as now conducted is, on the whole, most favourable; though, like every other visitor, he lays too much stress on the material improvements we have introduced. They are very great, but we doubt whether new roads, or even new cultivations, have ever much conciliated a people, and the experience of the Mutiny showed that our even-handed justice had impressed the Indians much more than our material improvements. They asked their new rulers to continue "the English laws," not the English engineering works, which, after all, hardly rival their own. Mr. Froude, in his two papers on "An Unsolved Historical Riddle," has been rather wasting his time, the riddle being only whether Philip II. of Spain murdered a troublesome subject, or ordered him to be secretly executed for reasons of State. The latter appears to be the truth, but the point was hardly worth clearing up. The puzzle to us is not that, but why a man like Philip, who had outraged so many peoples and families, remained so safe from the dagger of the assassin. Mr. E. Kay Robinson's queer speculation on "The Man of the Future" we have noticed elsewhere, and need here only call attention to Mr. S. Smith's paper on "Social Reform." The Member for Liverpool is one of those who believe that the mass of poverty and suffering in our great cities constitutes a terrible social danger, and who have a definite plan for mitigating it. His notion—and his immense experience gives him a right to speak—is, that we must attack the evil at its source, deal with the million and a quarter of nearly destitute children, who ought to be wards of the State, enforce parental obligations much more rigidly, and commence a vast, steady, State-aided system of transferring such children to the Colonies. The plan does not commend itself to us, except as one of several, but the thought at the bottom of it does. It is in the improvement of the children that the chance lies, and to seize it we must give up one or two of our notions of exclusive parental responsibility. After all, the whole community, if it can only do it, has as much right to see that the child has a chance of a career as to see that he is kept alive and taught the rudiments of learning. The American States are already adopting this principle, and are sanctioning laws under which destitute or degraded children are rescued by force, and turned into decent citizens; and in Liverpool, private persons, among whom Mr. Smith is not the least eminent, are working out the same idea. They have saved, Mr. Smith says, 1,200 children already, all of whom would have become criminals or paupers.

The most interesting paper in the Contemporary is Mrs. Oliphant's account of Mrs. Carlyle, touched on elsewhere this week in our columns; and the most brilliant "The Responsibilities of Unbelief," by "Vernon Lee." If this name really conceals, as is rumoured, a very young lady, we venture to predict that we shall soon see another female novelist of the first rank. The slightness and accuracy of the touches with which the character of Rheinhardt, the Voltairian of her dialogue, are made manifest are really extraordinary. Her object is to show that in teaching others, and especially their children, the responsibility of unbelievers is as great as that of Christians. They have no right to conceal the light they think they have obtained, in order to secure easier lives for their children, or to avoid distressing their wives. This is sound enough, provided the unbeliever unbelieves as sincerely and certainly as the believer believes; but the attraction of the article is the brilliant cynicism of Rheinhardt, who prefers Catholicism to Protestantism because dissidents from Catholicism give up the supernatural, while Protestants only surrender such beliefs as seem to them to endanger faith by too great a demand upon credulity. "The Reformation," remarks Rheinhardt, incidentally, "was a piece of intellectual socialism. It consisted in dividing truth so that each man might have a little scrap of it for himself, and in preventing all increase by abolishing all large intellectual capital." Sir William Palmer describes clearly the part taken by himself in the early history of the "Oxford Movement," a part greater than this generation recollects, and adds one more testimony to the wonderful influence of Cardinal Newman,—a testimony the more remarkable because he strongly disagreed with Mr. Newman's desire that each man who desired to forward the movement should do it in his own way. Sir W. Palmer hungered for more corporate action. Mr. Baxter writes on "The Business of the House of Commons" a paper principally remarkable for his advocacy of a stronger Closure, and his belief that a reduction in the number of the House would be directly beneficial. We shall, perhaps, hear more of that last idea before the discussion ceases. Mr. Haweis sends a sympathetic sketch of the late J. R. Green, the historian, asserting his strong Liberalism in matters of belief; and Sir Arthur Gordon a most interesting account of the self-governing system of the native Fijians, now carried on through District Councils, Provincial Councils, and a Chief Council, which, after debate, recommends measures to the Governor. Most of these recommendations have become law, and Sir Arthur bears emphatic testimony to the excellent working of the whole system, especially through the complete ventilation of native grievances. Great care was taken, whenever the native suggestion was in itself reasonable, not to supersede it by a better one, it being found that the natives were more hearty in carrying out their own plan, a point which constitutionalists too often forget. The following speech by an hereditary chief will show that oratorical ability is not wanting in Fiji. The question was, who was liable to replant the trees? Roko Tui Bua rose, and said:—

"Do you think they will send us yams and bananas and sugar-canes from England? Is the Government to plant our trees for us? If we are men we have to live; we have hands; our fathers planted and we too must plant, and our children after us. In many parts where there was formerly much water, there is none to-day. It is because the timber is cut down the land is bare and the water dry. We listen to the idle words of every stray white man who says that this and the other is not done in the white man's land. But if we make inquiry, we find that after all it is much the same here as there; that the man who is industrious in the white man's land becomes wealthy, and the slothful does not. I hear some say, 'Who ever heard of planting forest trees?' I have heard of it. I have seen it done. I know of trees that have been preserved for years. Many will say, 'What folly! do these trees bear fruit?' Well! what about your house? Is that built of fruit or of wood?"

Mr. O'Donnell's article on "Fenianism" contains little that is new, except his account of the hope entertained in Ireland in 1865 that the Irish soldiers trained in the American war would land in the island, and set it free. This plan seems to have been seriously entertained, but the soldiers did not come, and the movement failed. Mr. O'Donnell complains bitterly of the sentences of penal servitude passed upon the Fenian leaders, as cruel, and it certainly seems to be true that the old system of honourable execution for treason by the axe left less bitter memories than the modern system of penal servitude.

Lord Randolph Churchill, in the Fortnightly Review, under the title of "Elijah's Mantle," continues his bitter attacks upon Sir Stafford Northcote, whom he considers wanting in force of character, genius, and courage. He maintains that the tactics of Opposition, as illustrated by Mr. Disraeli, may be summed up thus:—"Take office only when it suits you, but put the Government in a minority whenever you decently can,"—principle being obviously of no importance. Lord Randolph is strongly in favour of a Premier in the Lords, declaring, with refreshing frankness, that "the nucleus of the Tory Party is in the House of Lords," and that everything which exalts that body will strengthen the party. This is especially the case when the party is in a minority in the Commons; at such times the lead in the Lords is everything, and the leader there is only unwisely hampered by a co-ordinate leader in the Commons. As permanent power resides in the Commons, and a leader fit for office must be found there, Lord Randolph Churchill's ideas will hardly meet with general acceptance. The number contains two excellent biographical sketches, one on Mr. Green, describing mainly his earnest work in East London; and another on Mr. H. J. S. Smith, intended to describe his unequalled rank as a mathematician, a rank of which his most intimate friends scarcely knew. He never spoke of his researches, and they were far better known on the Continent than at home. This story has an intellectual interest:—

"Only three months before his death, referring to the opinion (expressed by a speaker at the Balfour Memorial Meeting at Cambridge) that a man's most original ideas came to him before he was thirty, he said that in his own case he was certain that not only had his power of seeing and understanding things uninterruptedly increased all through his life, but that his thoughts and ideas and 'invention' had undergone a corresponding progression and development. A glance through his note-books affords striking evidence of this, for the later entries are especially rich in suggestions for future researches, and in 'guesses' at what the results may be found to be."

The controversy is as old as man, and we suspect that every individual would give a separate answer, and also that there is a radical confusion in many minds between energy and insight. The mind loses its capacity for effort long before it loses its power of perceiving, even if it ever does, while in health, lose it at all. The old in particular "understand" the proportions of things to each other far better than the young do. Professor Jebb puts in an able plea for a British School of Classical Studies to be established in Athens, and to be in most respects a consulate for travelling students, with a director, who would act as consul, direct studies, and give assistance, a library and a house. He thinks the school could be established for £18,000, and is sanguine that such a sum could be raised by subscription. So are we, or double the money, provided Mr. Jebb will show some tangible quid pro quo, in the shape, let us say, of annual reports on Greek archaeology, from the director. The subscribers will want to see something, such as the subscribers to the different Palestinian funds do see. Without that, he must trust to individual liberality; but there ought to be a cultivated millionaire or two in England ready to do the work. Mr. Auberon Herbert's second paper, "A Politician in Trouble about his Soul," grows a little tedious. After all, he is only asking at great length the old question whether leaders derive their ideas from themselves, or from those they lead, the answer to which is,—from both, in proportions that no mind can discern, because the mixture must be to a large extent unconscious. A man may be perfectly sincere, yet convinced of the wisdom of a course originally suggested to him by observation of the public mind. Father Matthew would probably never have moved, had he not become aware through observation of a craving desire in his particular public for "help agin the dhrink;" yet he was a leader, and a sincere one, too. The remaining papers, on explosives, by Colonel Majendie, on the "Political Condition of Italy," and on "Local Government in Counties," are all very instructive, and perhaps a little dull. The Italian writer, however, forwards some valuable statistics of the new Chamber, from which it appears that the Government has a fairly steady majority, and that when supported by the Right, which is now only a collection of eminent individualities, it can count on 400 Members in a House of 514.

The grand temptation of modern Tories, the craving desire to attack Mr. Gladstone personally, has been too strong for the National Review, and under the title "The Prime Minister's Dilemma," Mr. Austin indulges in a kind of prolonged "yah." He declares Mr. Gladstone incapable of fortitude in adversity. In the view of this historian, he gave up the lead of the Liberal Party in 1875 out of mortification, in 1876 he "snatched at power with grataitous eagerness," and in 1883 he desires, "in a situation of bewilderment bordering on despair," to retire again, but cannot, because to do so would be discreditable. Mr. Austin contrasts this conduct with the "sweet patience" of Lord Beaconsfield in 1880, who utterly refused to believe that the Liberal victory was due to bribery, and attributed it to vituperation and the general distress in the country. Lord Beaconsfield had patience in plenty, but to attribute a grand defeat at the polls to abuse is hardly an illustration of it. Usually, when a man attributes his losses to "vituperation," he is raging with secret anger. We need not add that Mr. Gladstone's Administration, in Mr. Austin's judgment, has been a failure from beginning to end; or that under it the Queen "has been degraded into a Suzerain," a wonderful climax of humiliation. The article contains an anecdote or two of Lord Beaconsfield of some interest, but as a specimen of political swearing it is not effective. Lord Pembroke sends a thoughtful paper on "Liberty and Socialism," in which he denies that any "principle" can be found which will regulate the degree of State interference permissible in a well-organised society. Life, he believes, has become too complex, and he traces much of the present hesitation in the national temper to the new perception of that complexity,—a remark showing much insight. Lord Pembroke contends that the degree of State interference must be regulated by a comparison of expediences, and points out with really crushing effect that the doctrine of negative regulation or "absolute freedom, limited only by the like freedom for all," would be fatal to the law of marriage:—"It is the clearest case of positive regulation; and it is not aimed directly at the securing of freedom. The State does not content itself with enforcing such contracts as men and women are pleased to make. It prescribes the contract. I think we have a right to ask those who tell us this is an infallible practical rule, whether they are prepared to adhere to it in this instance." This is much the best paper in the magazine, which for the rest contains nothing striking, unless it be "John Hodge's" notion of the Essex dialect.

The older magazines present nothing for remark, except the stories, which are in all cases good; as is also, in Longman's, Mr. Stevenson's "Treasure of Franchard." That is full of originality.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Moorish Lotos-leaves. By George D. Cowan and R. L. N. Johnston. (Tinsley Brothers.)—A residence of some standing at Mogador has given to the authors of this volume considerable advantages over the ordinary traveller. They know the ways of the country, have acquired a large circle of acquaintances, and can dispense, wherever Arabic will suffice, with the services of an interpreter. The longest of the six papers which the book contains is entitled, "A Ride to Maraksh by a Round-about Route." (Maraksh is the town which is commonly marked in the atlases as "Marocco.") It is as pleasant a narrative of travel as we have seen for some time. It is disfigured, here and there, as, indeed, all the papers are, with a jocosity which fails to be humorous, but it is lively and picturesque. The Berbers seem to have made the most favourable impression on the minds of the travellers; of the general condition of the country, their report agrees with the unanimous testimony borne by all who visit regions under Mahomedan Government. About slavery they are particularly emphatic. Where European influence reaches, the slaves are well treated; beyond this, they may be said to have no human rights. The writers who sit comfortably at home, and evolve an ideal Islam out of their consciousness, might profitably spend an hour or two over Moorish Lotos-leaves. Here is a pleasing account of Moorish integrity:—"Every reference to future events is coupled with Inshallah, twice or thrice repeated. Let not the guileless Christian imagine that a verbal promise to pay 'in three months, Inshallah,' represents the debtor's intentions, for non-payment at the appointed time becomes Ma-shallah—what God has pleased—and the Moslim conscience is at rest. A story is told of a Moor visiting Gibraltar in quest of credit, who on being shown some Manchester goods, asked the price. 'Eight-and-six the price in sixty days,' was the reply. 'Ah!' murmured the true believer, 'eight-and-six, sixty days, Inshallah.' Quoth the merchant, who had acquired an expensive experience of the native commercial morality, 'No. Sixty days, eight-and-six; but sixty days, Inshallah, ten shillings.'" "Canoe Rambles in Mogador Bay" is a tantalising description of climate and scenery, with hints of sport. Something of a corrective is supplied by the chapter on "Moorish Gastronomy." The other papers are "Boar-shooting in Siadma," "Notes on Agadir and Messah," and a "A March by Moonlight with the Army." This volume will furnish by the way no bad test of the comparative merits of recent atlases.

Record of the University Boat-race, 1829-1880. Compiled by G. G. T. Treherne and J. H. D. Goldie. (Bickers and Son.)—In 1881 a great boating festival was held, at which some two hundred "Old Blues"—i.e., oarsmen and coxswains who have taken part in the University contests—attended. The total number on the list was, at that time, 485. Out of these, 404 survived. These statistics suggest the fact that rowing does not seem to shorten life. "Old Blues," indeed, appear to realise more than the average "expectations of life." To be a coxswain, indeed, seems to conduce strongly to longevity; only four out of forty-eight of these gentlemen are marked as "deceased." The earliest race represented at the festival was that rowed at Henley in 1829. Of that contest, Bishop Wordsworth, of St. Andrew's (who was represented by his jersey, as the Queen is sometimes by her robes), was the hero. Besides achieving numerous academical honours, he played in the University eleven; and we are told that he never lost a race or a match. The crews contained not a few other men who were to achieve distinction. Oxford was steered by a future dean (Fremantle), and a future bishop (Selwyn, of Lichfield), and a dean (Merivale) rowed for Cambridge. Distinctions have not been wanting to these great oarsmen. At Oxford they have achieved an average, and at Cambridge more than an average of honours. And in after-life they seem to have done well. Some, as Lord Justice Brett and Justices Chitty and Denman, have risen to high place, and very few, much fewer than an average proportion of University men, are "missing." Any one who wishes to see what sort of character this "bodily exercise" (which is of a kind that does "profit" something) helps to develop in a fine and kindly nature, should read the account (pp. 119-120) of the late W. R. B. Jacobson. He died in his prime, unknown to the world ("Opere in medio defixa reliquit aratra," as the epitaph, chosen by himself, puts it), but the East End, in whose service he spent himself, loved him. This volume is not a mere record of athletic feats. It gives, indeed, every detail of the contests which it commemorates, and it suggests a good deal more.

NOVELS AND TALES.—In the Flower of Her Youth. By Mabel Collins. 3 vols. (F. White and Co.)—No one who compares this novel with what we have had before from Miss Collins's pen will doubt but that the literary quality of her work is much improved. She writes with vigour and correctness, not unfrequently with eloquence. But we wish that she would choose a subject less distasteful. She tells the story of a woman who marries for love in her extreme youth, finds after a few years that her husband wearies of her, in the presence of some more potent attraction, and seeks to set him free by a disappearance, which he supposes to be death. The associations of her old life naturally reappear in the new, and her troubles break her heart. We do not injure the interest of the story by this brief epitome, for Miss Collins is one of the authors who make little of plot, and much of the study of character. And much of this study is good. The most vigorously drawn of the dramatis personæ is evidently drawn from life, and reproduces, with something, perhaps, of the flattering touch of affection, the likeness of one whom the author had the best opportunities of knowing. But the heroine is also a vigorous portrait, and the same praise may be given to Adelaide Mainwaring and her mother. It seems scarcely likely that a man so profoundly attached to his wife as was Charles Newman should have become utterly indifferent. If a man protected by such a safeguard is liable to be carried away by a sudden passion, the data on which human conduct is founded are sadly wrong, and we might have to consider seriously Miss Collins's dangerous ideas about divorce. A genuine affection between husband and wife is supposed to be durable. Miss Collins thinks that even where it is most genuine it is absolutely, insecure. As it is, we prefer what is here called the "iron hold which the law keeps on the innocent," to the licence which no law, or a law seriously relaxed, would give to the guilty.—

A Modern Ulysses. By Joseph Hatton. 3 vols. (Chapman and Hall.)—Mr. Hatton is very severe upon the critics, but we shall not be deterred by his severity from expressing a candid opinion that the "modern Ulysses" is a much less entertaining personage than the ancient hero. The man-eating savages, for instance, among whom he falls, are less impressive than the Laestrygonians (who, by the way did not live, as Mr. Hatton seems to think, in a country called Laestrygon), and to come to more modern travellers, are far less effectively described than the Malays whom Mr. St. John has recently portrayed. Mr. Hatton is, indeed, more hazy about his classical allusions than he who writes about a Ulysses, whether modern or ancient, should be. Why is Nausicaa travestied into "Nausicaa," and Artemisia and Mausolus into "Artemisia and Mausolus"? And why are Seneca and Paulina, Orpheus and Eurydice, Arria and Paetus, Artemisia and Mausolus, singled out as "examples of uninterrupted felicity and increasing happiness"? They were, surely, rather unlucky examples, than otherwise. We shall further take the liberty of pointing out to Mr. Hatton that "who I at first compared to Circe" is not good grammar; and as he is a student of manners, that widows do not have bridesmaids when they are married. There are some entertaining chapters in the book, though it is constructed out of very slender materials; and once, in the scene where George Harmer is tried for passing bad money,—the writer reaches real dramatic force.

—Only a Black Box; or, a Passage in the Life of a Curate. By Greville Phillimore. (Blackwood and Sons.)—Mr. Phillimore writes with good-feeling, good-sense, and refinement. His characters always interest us; one of them, who is the hero of the episode, Alfred Eames, the curate, is peculiarly pleasing. There is a good deal of skill in the way in which the reader is made to like him. It looks, in fact, like a sketch from life, sufficiently idealised to make it safe from recognition. But for the story itself, little can be said. The mysteries are too transparent, the surprises come to nothing; there is nothing but what the simplest novel-reader can guess with ease. In short, such plot as there is rather mars than makes the work. Mr. Phillimore may comfort himself with reflecting that some of the most favoured novels of the day do not aim at being anything more than subtle analysis of feeling. For this kind of work, Mr. Phillimore has some qualifications.—

What Hast Thou Done? By J. Fitzgerald Molloy. Three vols. (Hurst and Blackett.)—Mr. Molloy's novel is not put together with much art, but it has merits of its own. If there is nothing to interest us very strongly in the story, we always read the descriptions and the dialogue with pleasure. The humour, perhaps, is better than the sentiment; but we always recognise the work of a facile and practised pen. The least successful character in the book is the one which the author probably considers to be his masterpiece,—Purcell, the successful novelist. We see few traces of genius in him, except, indeed, it be a love of paradox, which leads him to say, among other strange things, that "the maxims which men and women preach in their pages are exactly the opposite of what they practise in their lives." Nor do we perceive what there was in him which won the heart of the heroine. Fitzmaurice, the adventurer, is more finely drawn. The writer, however, seems to get tired of him, and finishes the account of him with about as rapid a conversion to honour and good principles as we have heard of. What, by the way, are "fratres pirati?"—Darkened at Noontide. By Mrs. George Elliott Kent. (S. Swan Sonnenschein and Co.)—It is a pity that Mrs. Kent has not, with other intellectual gifts that she may possess, a little sense of the ridiculous; or, if that is too much to expect, that she has not learnt, as part of what an author should know, the things that people do actually laugh at. How is it possible for any one to live at all near the world of letters, and not know that it is absurd to speak of breakfast as a "matutinal meal;" and that such sentiment as, "so a stately ship plied its way down the sacred Ganges, freighted with a rare and costly cargo,—gems, gold-dust, and ivory, but what was their value, in comparison with the one true woman's heart?" is just a little trite? The story is of the most common-place kind. Margaret St. Osbert is left penniless, for her father has "mortgaged his estate for twenty years." A young soldier courts her—in a ruined chapel, wearing his sword, by the way—but he is bound to marry a wealthy bride. The wealthy bride in course of time elopes, and Margaret goes to take care of his house and child, a questionable arrangement, even though its "lord" is absent." Of course, he returns. The wealthy bride is conveniently removed, and the life that is darkened at noontide has as bright an afternoon as marriage with a widower can give. It is an absurd story, told in absurd language.

—A White Child. Written and illustrated by Mrs. Francis Rye. (Remington.)—This is a fairy-story, written in a rambling way, but not without merit. The idea of the village where the people have their childish wishes fulfilled against their will, when they come to years of discretion, is a happy one. So, in another way, is that of the maidens who cannot help weaving their own thoughts and natures into the texture of the wedding dress which they have to make. Mrs. Rye wants the art of construction, but she has the merit of having something to put together.

POETRY.—Heart Harmonies: Poems, Songs, and Sonnets. By Edward Croasdale. (Elliot Stock.)—This volume of verse belongs to the class of books—their number is legion—which cannot possibly afford any gratification, except to their authors, and those household readers who may be presumed to know all about their contents before they are published. Nice little rhymes upon pretty little topics whereon everybody whose capacity for stringing verses together surpasses that of Mr. Toots, has exercised his or her ingenuity, but devoid of all claim to be called poetry, form its contents. In a sonnet to Charles Kingsley, we find the line, "I move my spluttering pen in feeble rhyme." Out of his own mouth Mr. Croasdale is condemned.—Poem and Hymns. By George T. Coster. (T. Fisher Unwin.)—This is a welcome little book. The poems on the ever-sympathetic subjects of love, bereavement, and the blessed hope of everlasting life, are simple, unpretending, and harmonious. The hymns are not very successful; it takes a saint or a genius to write a hymn that will live. Among the "pieces," "The Healing of King Pharaoh's Daughter" and "Miriam" are of remarkable merit.—

Hereafter. By A. F. Heaton, B.A., Senior Curate of Worktop Abbey. (Provost and Co.)—We do not admire the novelty that is presented by the printing of the lines of this poem in large type along, instead of across the page. This method makes the book awkward to hold. Of the poem, there is neither more nor less to be said than is almost always suggested by the attempt to render in human speech a mortal's conception of those things "which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive,"—that it fails to kindle imagination, or to gratify taste.

—Songs of a Lost World. By a New Hand. (Allen and Co.)—We were in hopes that the imitators of Mr. Swinburne had ceased from their superfluous naughtiness, and that the oblivion into which the masters of the fleshly school are sinking, to the satisfaction of clean-minded people, would deter their puny disciples. Songs of a Lost World teach us, by reviving the old, nauseous nonsense, that such hopes are presumptuous. The "new hand" is no better, and not much worse, except that he is appreciably more silly, than the old hands, when he babbles, in a poem called "Pausanias," about "the silver of a saying in my ear," addresses Here, in "The Passion of Ixion" as a "Goddess-woman with brow-binding hair, Brighter than a lily's burning heart;"

and goes on as follows,—

"Thy motion is the swaying of a reed;
Thy stature a desire and a despair;

[these two lines, we submit, might figure in a competition of nonsense verses]

Thy words mellifluous wisdom thick with breath
Kissed from the cores of roses; thy fresh mouth,
A bud that blossoms in a passing smile,
Then is a bud again; thy dove-like breasts
Throb at their prisoning zone; thy lithe, round limbs
Garments express but to a sweeter grace.

Dove-like breasts, and limbs that are expressed by garments, would surely carry off a prize for foolish maltreatment of language; yet are they not the uttermost samples of nonsense to be found in this volume, for we find Ixion addressing to Here the following amazing prayer:—

"Take my soul,
And set it in the tjar of thy brow,
Or clasp it on the swelling of thy zone:
Dissolve me in the amber haze of dew
That clothe thee round."

The italics in the above quotation are our own, and we willingly acknowledge that it is the first time, in our long experience of poets, that we have encountered an aspiration on the part of a lover's soul to act as a brooch.—Poems of Life and Nature. By Mary Clemmer. (Trübner and Co., London; Osgood and Co., Boston.)—If to strike all those chords of the human heart which give out sweet and solemn harmonies with a gentle and tender hand is to be a poet, Mary Clemmer may fairly claim that coveted title. Deep feeling, good-taste, and refined fancy mark these Poems of Life and Nature, and although they are not remarkable for strength, they bear an impress of individuality, and reveal a pious and lofty mind.

ROWLANDS'

ODONTO.

Has been celebrated for more than half a century as the best, purest, and most fragrant preparation for the teeth ever made; it whitens and preserves the teeth, imparts to them a pearl-like whiteness, strengthens the gums, and gives a pleasing fragrance to the breath. Health depends in a great measure upon the soundness of the teeth, and all dentists will allow that neither washes nor paste can possibly be as efficacious for polishing the teeth, and keeping them sound and white as a pure and non-gritty tooth powder; such Rowlands' Odonto has always proved itself to be. SPECTACLES V. BLINDNESS.

"Spectacles can only be perfectly adjusted by those having a thorough knowledge of the anatomy of the eye, combined with optical experience."

WE have the highest Medical Authorities, confirmed by daily experience, that imperfect glasses, together with the haphazard plan of selection generally employed by the mere vendor, is the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Sir JULIUS BENEDICT writes:—"I have tried the principal Opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have adapted suit admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." The Rev. Prof. W. A. Hale, M.A. Cantab., 3 Minford Gardens, West Kensington Park, writes:—"The Spectacles are perfect, and a most decided boon. I had occasion on Monday to write to Lord —, and took the opportunity to mention your name, and the wonderful power of your Spectacles." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age (82). I can now read the smallest type, although suffering from cataract on the right eye." Testimonials from Earl and Countess Lindsay; F. D. The popularity Pepsine has acquired as almost a specific for chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, &c., is due to the fact that it is the nearest possible production of the active principle of the gastric juice of the stomach. Unfortunately, like all other inventions of a like nature, Pepsine has been not slightly discredited by the spurious manufactures that have been issued from time to time; it is therefore necessary, as a guarantee of its efficacy to see that each bottle bears the maker's name.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

LORD SALISBURY and Sir Stafford Northcote spoke at a banquet in the Riding School of Knightsbridge Barracks on Wednesday,—the same place where Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Salisbury were fêted when they brought back "peace with honour" from Berlin,—to celebrate the acquisition of the new Beaconsfield Club in Pall Mall. The Marquis of Salisbury fiercely attacked Mr. Gladstone for laying at the door of the Tories the responsibility for the troubles in the Transvaal, declaring that, when the Transvaal was annexed, the vast majority of its inhabitants wished for annexation,—not, indeed, the majority of the Boers, who were a mere handful, but of the native tribes inhabiting the same province. Lord Salisbury entirely ignored the true danger,—the danger of uniting the whole Dutch population of South Africa against us,—and preferred to speak of the native populations as if all Governments should, in the first place, secure their interests, and place the interests of immigrant Europeans and their descendants quite in the second place. It is remarkable enough that, in relation to our policy in India, his views are precisely inverted, and that he denounces the Indian Government for not securing the interests of Anglo-Indians first and thinking of native interests only afterwards.

Sir Stafford Northcote was very bland and frank. He regarded the fact that fresh primroses are frequently laid at the base of Lord Beaconsfield's statue as absolute proof of the profound love of Londoners for that statesman's memory. He attributed Mr. Gladstone's triumph at the poll to Mr. Gladstone's ability and unscrupulousness, by which he had produced on the mind of the people an impression as strong as it was "utterly false." He pretended to be quite unable to understand how a Government that has spent five and a half millions more than its predecessor, though it has employed (say) fifteen millions more than its predecessor in the payment of debt, could be said to have been thriftier than its predecessor; and he confided to his Conservative friends his belief that Parliamentary obstruction, under proper circumstances, is no very great sin. He compared, indeed, his own party's obstructiveness to the obstructiveness of Leonidas and his Spartans at Thermopylæ,—a comparison which assumes that a constitutional majority, returned deliberately by the nation, ought to be regarded as an alien host of foreign invaders. Sir Stafford Northcote will not soon hear the end of these frank admissions. He seems to have quite thrown off on Wednesday the disguise of moderation.

The man Kelly, accused of a direct share in the murders in the Phoenix Park, about whom two juries in succession have disagreed, has been tried a third time, and convicted. He was the man selected to "make sure," while Brady made the first attack upon the victims. Out of thirty-six jurymen who in the three trials heard the evidence, only three doubted his guilt, and in the third of them the Judge pronounced the evidence irresistible. It was, moreover, supported by the confession of Delaney, made after he had been found guilty, and without hope of reward. On hearing his sentence, which was, of course, death, Kelly declared himself innocent of murder, probably from a belief that the man he stabbed was already dead, and there seems no doubt that he is one of those in whom national hatred has disordered the conscience till he does not think the assassination of the alien a crime. He is asserted on all hands to have lived a respectable life. Owing to his youth and good looks, his case has excited much more sympathy than Brady's, and the foreman of the Jury has been already threatened with death; but even for Brady, there is much feeling. It is said that on Whit-Monday, the day originally fixed for his execution, the excursions universal in Ireland will be avoided, in order to show respect for the assassin.

It is clear that the proceedings of the Dynamitens are exciting the anger of Americans. The Pennsylvanians have a terrible experience of Irish secret societies, the struggle with the Molly Maguires having been carried on in the mining district of their own State, and consequently the State Senate has passed a Bill prohibiting the manufacture and sale of explosives under severe penalties. It has been sent down to the Lower House. General Grant, also, who represents an immense party, has made a speech directly menacing the Irish. He condemns "adopted citizens of the Union" for refusing to feel the obligations placed upon them by their citizenship, and for claiming immunities not accorded to the native born, who, it must not be forgotten, by the latest census constitute 82 per cent. of the population of the Union. The greater journals are all favourable to extradition if murder is proved, and even General Butler, who has been elected Governor of Massachusetts by the Irish vote only, asks that the immigration of paupers shall be stopped. He does not venture in the face of public feeling to demand that the use of dynamite against the foreign friends of the Union shall be deemed praiseworthy, or even be protected. It is stated that the party of violence are convinced that they have traitors in their midst, and are profoundly alarmed by the intimate knowledge which the British Government possesses of their plots. They suspect treachery, probably with justice, in very high quarters in their organisation.

The Government Bill for securing compensation to agricultural tenants was brought forward on Thursday, but not till after one o'clock. Mr. Dodson, therefore, who has charge of the Bill, made only a descriptive speech, and there was no discussion, though Mr. Howard and Mr. Barclay contrived to intimate their disappointment with the measure. It is by no means a revolutionary one. The right of distraint is not abolished, but only limited to one year's rent. The tenants gain an absolute right to compensation for permanent improvements, if made with the landlord's consent, and for temporary improvements even without it; and can, if the landlord refuses to do necessary drainage, perform the work themselves, obtaining compensation on quitting the holding. But, as we understand the Bill, a new tenant can agree on entering his farm to any compensation for future improvements he pleases; and if he does, he writes himself out of the Act. In prosperous years, this will be done, though not in such times as the present; and the tenants, who have all along asked for compulsion, will not, therefore, be content. Still, they gain one grand point. Under the old Act, the landlord could abrogate the right of compensation. Under the new one, that power passes to the tenant, who, if he chooses, may insist on the full benefit of the law. We should imagine the Bill would pass, and be frequently quoted hereafter as a "settlement" which it is unfair to disturb.

Yesterday week, the Speaker read a letter from Mr. Brad-laugh, claiming to be called up to the table to take the oath, and asking that if there were any difficulty in following that course, he himself might be heard at the Bar of the House in support of it. Sir Stafford Northcote at once explained that he should ask the House to prohibit Mr. Bradlaugh from going through the form of repeating the words of the oath, but should not object to allowing Mr. Bradlaugh to be heard at the Bar of the House. Mr. Bradlaugh accordingly was heard at the Bar, and spoke with great effect, absolutely denying that he had ever paraded his atheistic opinions in the House, though he had asked to be allowed to affirm, as being one entitled to affirm in Courts of Justice,—a title which by no means necessarily implied that he was an atheist, since others besides atheists are entitled to avail themselves of that Act. So far from having paraded his opinions, they were extracted from him by the Special Committee which examined him,—he never for a moment supposing that his honourable frankness under the pressure of the Committee's questions, would afterwards be used against him as proving that he flaunted those opinions in the face of the House. He asked the House if they would not admit him to take the oath, either to declare his seat vacant at once, or to introduce a Bill to deprive him of all his civil rights, and to render him incapable of sitting for any constituency. While he had his full civil rights, he claimed the right to use them, and he claimed for his constituency that he, their duly-elected Member, should be accorded by the House the full representative position of such a Member. The law gave him the seat, and in the name of the law, he asked for it.

Mr. Labouchere raised the issue against Sir Stafford Northcote's motion by moving the previous question, which Mr. Gladstone personally supported, though he expressed his opinion that there was very little use in trying conclusions with the opposite party again, on a less advantageous issue. After a fierce outcry from Mr. O'Donnell, who professed to see in this step of Mr. Gladstone's a discreditable manoeuvre intended to snatch a victory by a surprise, and who, adopting that tone of graceful courtesy which distinguishes his speeches, described Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Bradlaugh as "the two heads of the Liberal Party," the House divided, when there voted for Sir Stafford Northcote's resolution 271, and for the previous question only 165; majority, 106.

On Monday, Lord Randolph Churchill gave notice of a motion,—to which he can give effect only by making of it a Standing Order,—to prevent Mr. Bradlaugh (if elected) from being called to the table to take the oath within three weeks of the return of any new Parliament. Lord Randolph is not satisfied with the temporary fame which the House has conferred on Mr. Bradlaugh; he is endeavouring to make it durable, if not permanent.

Prince Bismarck's star is not in the ascendant. On Sunday the Select Committee on the Accident Insurance Bill, which was specially recommended by the Emperor in his recent Message, struck out the clause granting a State subvention, and has thus destroyed the scheme without rejecting it. On Monday, Herr Richter proposed that the Budget for 1884-1885, instead of being passed as Prince Bismarck proposed, should be referred to a select committee, which will understand quite well that its mission is delay, and will not even report on this side of Christmas. And finally, on Tuesday, the Reichstag rejected, by a vote of 177 to 150, the Bill for an increase in the import duties on timber. The latter defeat was the more striking, because the Centre voted with the Government, and because the Progressists, to their great delight, were able to argue that the Bill would be oppressive to the poor, who would have to pay higher prices for their wood. Prince Bismarck is said to be furious at this opposition, but does not threaten either to resign or to dissolve. He thinks he can get along quite comfortably for the present, even if his Bills are thrown out. The Reichstag can only affect him by refusing the supplies, and we have stated elsewhere the reasons for believing that the majority will do nothing extreme. They cannot touch the Army, they are afraid to make Prince Bismarck resign while French affairs are unsettled, and they are unwilling to begin a contest with an Emperor of eighty-six, to whom the German Parliament owes its own existence.

M. C. Brun, the French Minister of Marine, has made a most serious statement to the Committee on Tonquin. He told the members that the Government intended to compel the Emperor of Anam to consent to the occupation of the province of Tonquin, to acknowledge a French protectorate over the rest of the country, to entrust all power to French officials, and to make over all revenue, receiving in return a French guarantee, and one-third of the net receipts for himself. The whole of Anam, a kingdom larger than Great Britain, stretching from Saigon to China, with a population of 5,000,000, is, in fact, to be annexed at once, and governed on the Tunisian system, the revenue of £1,200,000 being divided into three parts. One will be left to the native Sovereign, one will be spent on public works, and one will be used for administrative purposes. The country is to be garrisoned by marines, and by 6,000 Tonquinese militia to do fatigue duty. M. Brun admitted that the Chinese Government had already despatched 2,000 men to Tonquin, but thought the presence of French troops would overawe them, and that there would be no complications. The Committee agreed with him, and will report in favour of a credit of £220,000 for the expedition, but it is still doubtful if the Chamber will assent. The Deputies certainly will not, if they understand that the ruler of Anam can sign no such cession of his kingdom, he being tributary to Peking, and that the result will be a dangerous war with China. France can defeat China, but not with a handful of marines operating 1,600 miles from Peking.

The French are furious under an idea that the British Government is favouring the construction of a British Canal through the Isthmus of Suez. They think the credit of their great engineering feat will be smirched, and that they will lose dividends, and a Frenchman hurt at once in his vanity and his pocket can be very angry. The wrath is, this time, not reasonable. It is a certainty that the traffic has outgrown the Canal, that the blocks are very frequent, that the demurrage is double what it used to be, and that British shipowners, who supply 80 per cent. of the traffic, are heavily fined. It is also most probable that all these evils will increase, until the Canal has lost much of its utility. There must, therefore, be a second canal, and, under present circumstances, that canal must be under British control. But there is no reason whatever why France, as she showed the way, should not take credit for both, or why the French shareholders in the present Canal should not be allowed a preferential right to purchase half the new canal shares. That would comfort them greatly, and in no way interrupt the new project, which appears to have been seriously taken up by very considerable capitalists and shipowners. M. de Lesseps deserves all honour, but the commerce of the world cannot pause for fear his amour-propre should be hurt.

If the Times' correspondent in Paris is right, the Government of M. Jules Ferry has proposed a law on seditious displays which can only be described as savage. To take part in an "outdoor demonstration" is made punishable with six months' imprisonment; while the sale, exhibition, or wearing of seditious emblems, the singing of seditious songs, or the utterance of seditious cries will bring upon the offender from a fortnight's to two years' imprisonment. The offenders are, it is true, to be tried by a jury; but that is not much security in France. It is, we suppose, necessary to prohibit mass "demonstrations," as, owing to the traditions of Paris, they are apt to end in a rush upon the Legislature or the Municipality, but songs, cries, and emblems might surely be let alone, or punished with fines only.

The Government sustained an annoying defeat on Thursday. The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed that, in the English towns, the collection of Income-tax, now confided to collectors appointed by the local assessors, should, as vacancies occurred, be entrusted to the collectors of Inland Revenue. He showed that the saving would ultimately amount to £30,000 a year, and believed that the change would be popular, as under the existing system one tradesman could learn facts about another's affairs. The change, though reasonable, was, however, greatly disliked by the Boroughs, and Mr. Slagg, a very able Member, who does not come to the front often enough, showed that the prospect of saving was by no means certain. Mr. W. H. Smith, in a very moderate speech, also resisted the change; first, on the Conservative ground that it was a change, and secondly, because the officers of the Inland Revenue would be more rigorous as to the time of payment. Several Liberals had been strongly pressed by their constituents on the subject, and on a division the vote was rejected by 168 to 161. The matter is of small moment, but a majority which will not support a purely administrative measure recommended by a Chancellor of the Exchequer ceases to be quite trustworthy. The defeat on the Affirmation Bill has helped, we fear, to relax the bonds of discipline among Liberals, though as yet not seriously.

The Royal Academy Dinner, last Saturday, was distinguished chiefly by the extreme skill and elaboration of Sir Frederick Leighton's numerous speeches, of which we have said enough elsewhere. Lord Granville may, perhaps, have been understood by some of the guests as reflecting ironically on the too artistic manipulation of the ceremony, when he described Sir Frederick Leighton as descending into the arena of public speaking as an amateur, and "putting completely out of the field us poor professionals, who, some for a quarter, and others, I am afraid, for nearly half a century, have been hired and paid for this particular work." Mr. John Morley, in answering for "Literature," aptly observed that the growing love of pictorial art had, perhaps, injured literature, by inducing literary writers to make their style more pictorial than language can ever be made with advantage; and Professor Huxley, answering for "Science," made an amusing attack on some imaginary Perseus of the Press, clad in the cap of invisibility, and armed with the Medusa head of vituperation, who is always striving to deliver the Andromeda of Art from the jaws of the Dragon of Science. We do not know who "the Perseus of the Press" aimed at may be, and quite agree with Professor Huxley that towards the Andromeda of Art the Dragon of Science shows himself a very debonair monster, and quite devoid of any blood-thirsty intent. Probably they not only understand each other very well, but are friendly enough with Perseus, too.

Lord Granville gave away the diplomas, medals, prizes, and certificates of the London University on Wednesday. He referred to the death of Sir George Jessel, the late Vice-Chancellor, with due warmth of feeling, intimating gracefully his satisfaction that on the advice of the Prime Minister,—advice, no doubt, suggested by himself,—the Queen had at once conferred a baronetcy on Sir George Jessel's eldest son, and so gracefully acknowledged to the son the national services rendered by the late Master of the Rolls to the nation at large. Lord Granville went on to refer to the remarkable success of a lady graduate in medicine, who had not only obtained the medal in obstetric medicine, but a third place in the honour examination in surgery, thereby showing herself admirably fitted for her profession as a physician among the native women in the Presidency of Madras. His remarks on this subject were somewhat spoiled by a conventional compliment to the lady, which was as much out of place in a University as would have been a remark of the same kind on the appearance of one of the other sex. Sir John Lubbock, in an interesting speech on the modern system of education, told a good story of a public-school man, who, when asked the meaning of a theodolite, said he believed a theodolite to mean one who hates God,—his imagination, no doubt, running on the Foote and Bradlaugh controversies; after which Sir James Paget, the new Vice-Chancellor, closed the meeting by a few sentences of almost Baconian strength and dignity, on the immeasurable perspective of the intellectual field.

The College of Music was opened on Monday by the Prince of Wales, amidst a great concourse of persons eminent in the musical world. It was stated by the Director, Dr. G. Grove, who, like almost everybody else, has been knighted, that, exclusive of the cost of the buildings, which have been given by Sir C. F. Freake, £110,000 have been collected. With part of this money, fifty scholarships have been founded, thirty-five of which secure a free musical education of the highest order, and fifteen that education and free maintenance besides. The competition for these scholarships was extraordinary. It was stated that no less than 1,588 candidates came forward from the United Kingdom, who were winnowed down by severe examination to 480. These were again examined in London, and, according to the Prince of Wales, who made a much better and more human speech than usual, fifty were selected,—twelve from London, twenty-eight from fourteen different counties in England, five from Ireland, only two from Scotland, one from Wales, and one from Jersey. No attention was paid to condition. One scholar is the daughter of a brick-maker, another the son of a blacksmith, while the best violin-player is the son of a farm hand. The Council of the College intend all examinations to be most strict, for they are invested by their charter with some University privileges, being authorised to grant the degrees of Bachelor of Music, Master of Music, and Doctor of Music, we presume to both sexes. There seems little doubt that the College will become the centre of hope to all poor musical ability, and should therefore succeed.

In the House of Lords, on Tuesday, Lord Dunraven moved a resolution in favour of opening the picture galleries and the British Museum on Sundays. The discussion chiefly turned on a side-issue, the question, namely, whether the working-classes really are desirous of access to places of innocent amusement on Sunday, or are so fearful of the result of relaxing the restraints on Sunday labour that they do not urge any such wish,—an issue of merely temporary importance, since it is evident that any change in the view of the working-classes as to the amount of serious risk involved in thus extending Sunday recreations would at once change their view on the question of expediency. Lord Shaftesbury and Lord Cairns fought the resolution under the pretext of defending the Sunday immunities of labour, though they were, of course, more influenced by their Sabbatarian views than by their fear for the infringement of the Sunday holiday. Lord Granville pointed out that the majorities in the Commons against this extension of the Sunday recreations had been steadily diminishing, and that there was no distinction in principle between the opening of Kew Gardens and Hampton Court, and the opening of the picture galleries and the Museum, after which Lord Dunraven's resolution was rejected by a majority of twenty-four (ninety-one against sixty-seven). Not a single Bishop voted for the resolution, while the Archbishop of Canterbury and thirteen Bishops (among whom we regret to find the Bishop of Winchester and the Bishop of Durham) voted against it.

The Archbishop of Canterbury says he has been living in a dream ever since he accepted the Archbishopric, and we are not very much surprised at that; but we think it is time he should be waking-up, and his speech at the dinner given to him by his old schoolfellows at King Edward's School, Birmingham, on Thursday, does not look much like waking-up. The Standard reports him as having said that he could not adequately convey to his old schoolfellows the feelings with which he found himself "in the chair of the martyred Laud," and, further, that he hoped "worthily to follow in the footsteps of Archbishop Tait." Now, is there not a good deal of evidence of internal vacillation, of his not having made up his mind which leg to stand upon, in that? If he is going to follow "worthily in the footsteps of Archbishop Tait," it is surely a great pity to talk about "the martyred Laud." Laud's execution was not a step which any reasonable historian would now approve, but still it was not exactly a martyrdom. He did not die for a cause which any one not a fanatic would call wholly divine. Dr. Benson, we trust, will follow worthily in the footsteps of Archbishop Tait, especially his later footsteps, but he is not doing so in talking of "the martyred Laud." Archbishop Tait would have been almost as likely to use that expression as he would have been to live for five months in a dream.

The Pall Mall of Saturday last attributes to our "strange love of far-fetched explanations" our belief that the English constituencies have been much moved by an impulse against Mr. Bradlaugh which they cannot justify on principle; and remarks:—"Imagine Sir Edward Watkin or the Fitzwilliams as the product of the impulsiveness of English constituencies!" But we never attributed the action of the deserters to any capricious impulse; we only attributed that feeling in the constituencies which makes such desertion safe, to capricious impulse; and it seems to us simply childish to argue that thirteen Liberals would have absented themselves from the division without pairing, and that nine more would have voted against the Government, had not many of them believed, and believed on plausible grounds, that their constituencies would not be gravely displeased by that act of disloyalty to their principles and their party. As Mr. Rowlandson undoubtedly lost his election for the North-West Riding chiefly by the unpopularity of the Liberal view of the Bradlaugh question, why should not the Hon. W. H. W. Fitzwilliam have regarded his seat for the South-West Riding as safe, in spite of his desertion to the Tories on that same question?

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE'S THERMOPYLÆ.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL is making a tardy convert of his leader. Little by little, he is screwing up that leader's courage to the sticking-point at which men do not fail to accomplish the evil deed which has been suggested to them by the darker powers. The success achieved on the Affirmation Bill has mounted into Sir Stafford's head. He is like Macbeth when made Thane of Cawdor, and so convinced that the witches had had a real insight into the future. The higher promise, "All hail, Macbeth, that shall be king hereafter!" begins to work already, on what we should, till now, have called Sir Stafford's frigid imagination, and like a yeast of the spirit, throws his calm mind into a mass of fermentation. His speech at the Knightsbridge Riding School on Wednesday was the speech of a changed man, of a man in whom the tempter had conquered.

The peculiarity of Sir Stafford Northcote's speech was the open favour with which, for the first time, he treated Obstruction, a favour the more remarkable that he followed Lord Salisbury, who had been taking pains to deny that the Conservatives had favoured obstruction at all,—just as if, of the eleven nights' debate on the Address, the Conservatives had not taken a goodly share, and almost rivalled the Irishmen themselves. Lord Salisbury, however, was anxious to disavow obstruction for the Conservative party. But the more moderate in this way Lord Salisbury became, the more did Sir Stafford Northcote's soul incline towards the policy which Lord Salisbury disavowed; and after mildly remarking, what was certainly erroneous, that the charge of obstruction is not made in the House of Commons against the Conservatives, Sir Stafford went on to vindicate the policy of obstruction in a very remarkable passage, the emphasis of which is most significant, the passage in which he claims the right for the Conservative party to detain the Liberal party in the passes of Thermopylæ, while the unready nation is girding up its energies to meet the invading army. The metaphor is a meaning one, in several ways. It suggests, and was, we suppose, intended to suggest, that Sir Stafford Northcote looks upon the Liberals not as Sparta looked upon Athens, but as Sparta looked upon the Persian host,—that is, as a foreign invader, bringing new and inferior habits and customs, as well as an arrogant horde of unintelligible depredators, to the attack. It implies also, of course, that the struggle with the Liberals is to be a mortal one, in which not only victory, but delay, is to be secured at any cost. And it implies, lastly, that Sir Stafford Northcote sees a prospect, if he will but adopt the policy of "thorough," of achieving a glorious success,—a Marathon for the Conservatives against the Liberal invaders. Here are his words:—"Really, gentlemen, if you are in the habit of reading the debates in the House of Commons—I do not know whether you are—I am afraid a great many people find them extremely uninviting; but if any one were to study them, and to look at the whole conduct of business during the Session which is now proceeding, he would see that there might be some other reasons besides the obstructiveness of the Opposition for the very slow progress of the Government. I do not know that we ought altogether to confess that obstruction, under proper circumstances, is a very great sin. We have heard of examples of obstruction which, I think, have been very much honoured in the history of mankind. Leonidas, and his 300 Spartans, were uncommonly obstructive. I have not the least doubt that the newspapers circulated in the Persian camp denounced them in the most unmeasured language. But if we have a position to defend, and if we are in a minority, we know that, given a little time for the country to recover, and for the people to understand what they are about, we shall succeed in defeating the machinations and the evil designs of our opponents. I say we ought to make a stand, and not to be frightened out of our position by being told that we are Obstructives." That, we take it, involves an absolute surrender to the evil suggestions of Lord Randolph Churchill and his friends. Sir Stafford Northcote means that the Liberal measures are to be obstructed till a dissolution is forced, on the plea that the country will declare against the Liberal measures, so soon as it is challenged to do so. Considering that the country declared in favour of them three years ago, though the course of events and the obstruction of the Irish and Tory parties have prevented them from being embodied in our law, that comes exactly to this,—that if, after a great election, the defeated party can stave off the policy accepted by the people for a year or two, at the end of that year or two, the minority will have secured their right to treat the majority as having lost the confidence of the country, and to stop legislation by any tricks at their disposal, in order to force a new appeal to the constituencies, on the very same points on which the old appeal had been made. As Sir Stafford Northcote very well knows, there is nothing new, nothing that it is possible to speak of as a surprise, which the Liberal party is now urging forward. The measures which we want to carry are the measures whose principle was approved in hundreds of constituencies three years ago. The only events which have since happened are either events affecting our foreign and colonial policy, or affecting the Irish policy of the Government. None of these modify in any way the English measures to which the Government are pledged and to which, after much inevitable delay, they are now addressing themselves. And yet Sir Stafford Northcote treats those measures as new designs of evil, for which the country is quite unprepared, and of the character of which it ought to be warned at any cost.

Well, we suppose the die is cast, and that Sir Stafford Northcote has made up his rather halting mind to go forward with the extreme section of his Party. But whether, in determining on this policy, vaulting ambition has not overleaped itself, seems to us more than doubtful. An appeal to the country on this issue would be the very appeal for which the Liberals most wish, an appeal on Obstruction itself. The great effort made by the Government in the autumn to pass a moderate reform of the Procedure of the House of Commons, and to make that moderate reform do, has already been seen to have been inadequate. It was right, perhaps, to try the moderate policy first, in order to cut away all ground of excuse. But the constituencies are already more than half aware that the moderate policy has failed, and Sir Stafford Northcote's new departure in openly advocating an active policy of obstruction will awaken them fully to the true character of the situation. There is no question on which we would sooner see a formal appeal made to the country than on that of legislative obstruction. If the policy now announced by the Conservative leader results in paralysing Parliament for all legislative purposes, rather than submit we had far better adopt Triennial Parliaments at once, and let it be known that it is the Conservative, not the Liberal Party, which has forced on the country the policy of a triennial dissolution. Let it be granted that after three years no legislation, however fully sanctioned by the country, is to be acquiesced in by the Opposition if it sees any chance of defeating the Government at the next General Election, and it becomes obvious at once that an appeal to the country at the end of three years is absolutely necessary for all purposes of efficient legislation. It would be strange enough if the Conservatives, and not the Liberals, had been the prime agents in breaking down Septennial Parliaments, and compelling the Democracy to renew its lease of power every three years.

In truth, however, it would not be on the durability of Parliaments alone that a General Election forced on us by Conservative obstruction would turn. The question for the country would be no less than this,—Ought not any Administration placed in power by the vote of the nation to have full responsible disposal of much the greater part of the time of Parliament? Must not the Administration have the right to lay out all the Government days on its own responsibility, to exclude from those days the innumerable questions with which private Members now waste the time needed for deliberation, to consider how many days' debate is reasonable for each issue presented to the House, and to insist on taking a division at the end of the time fixed? Without regulations of this peremptory kind, the legislative power, even if it were to be renewed every three years, will soon cease to be a legislative power at all, for it is impossible to avoid seeing that the encroachments of private caprice and of party malice are sweeping away steadily and even rapidly all the old safeguards of legislative efficiency. There is nothing we would sooner desire to see placed gravely before the Constituencies of Great Britain than the absolute necessity for a great revolution in procedure, and a revolution of this kind, a revolution which would not only give us the true Closure by a majority, but the Closure by a majority at the instance and on the responsibility of the Government, as the guardian and dispenser of parliamentary time.

Sir Stafford Northcote has, we suppose, taken his resolve, or he would never have made his Thermopylæ speech. If he is not going to seize the passes with his three hundred or his two hundred and forty-four heroes, he is very silly to have talked about it, for he will only increase his own reputation for vacillation. If he is going to seize the passes, then he will force a dissolution on the very point on which we believe that the constituencies are best prepared to give back a decisive answer, and a decisive answer in the Liberal sense. Apparently at least, the victory of last week has given Sir Stafford Northcote a foretaste of the delights which Lord Randolph Churchill promised him if he would but obstruct successfully, and his virtue is not equal to the strain put upon it. The visions flashed before his imagination by the witches of the Fourth Party are too much for him. But will they not lead him, as those other witches led Macbeth, to temporary triumph indeed, but final ruin? The witch that had "the pilot's thumb, wreck'd as homeward he did come," was probably the same who promised Macbeth his throne. If Sir Stafford Northcote acts on the advice of such weird sisters,—and he evidently inclines in that direction,—let him remember that he is more likely to win for himself, by doing so, not the eternal glory of Leonidas, who fought against a foreign foe, but the rout and disgrace which fall upon the usurper who will not fight a fair civil fight, but is led by his ambition to call one section of his own people to arms against the rest.

THE TENANTS' COMPENSATION BILL.

AS usual, now-a-days, time was wasted in the House of Commons on Thursday, till the Premier was obliged to threaten that the new Bill granting Compensation to Tenants should be brought forward, however late the hour might be. This had its effect; but the hour was so late (1.5 a.m.) that Mr. Dodson was compelled to make an inadequate speech, or rather a speech so condensed that it is possible to misapprehend its meaning. We write, therefore, with all reserve; but as we, on a first glance, understand the new measure, it is one erring, if at all, on the side of moderation. We have never been able on the subject of tenant-right to keep step with the Farmers' Alliance. We entirely understand the immense social gain which might arise from an extreme measure, authorising a tenant, on payment of compensation to the landlord, to become a copyholder beyond eviction while his dues are paid, for we see that such a law might create a new agricultural middle-class as independent as the old freeholders; but we do not see either the utility or the justice of leaving the owner his full authority, yet refusing him the right of picking his tenants. Free sale, in fact, seems to us inconsistent with the whole English system, which, if altered, should be altered in a much larger way. But certainly, if we understand the Government Bill, we would go further than it does. It is moderate to timidity. The newest clause, for example, limiting the right of distress for rent to one year's rent, will, we fear, hurt instead of benefiting the farmer. The objections to distress from his point of view are that the landlord's right limits his credit with his banker, who can only recover his loan after the landlord has swept away everything to satisfy his rent, and that it tempts the owner to trust insolvent applicants who offer high rent and mean to cheat everybody but the landlord. The reduction of the right does not remove, though it lessens, those objections. The landlord will still be first creditor, though only for one year's rent, and will be almost compelled, therefore, to refuse any credit beyond that period for fear of losing his rent. He will be made harder than before, while the tenant's gain in credit will be inappreciable. The right of distress, which is radically unjust—the landlord hiring out his land just as the banker hires out his money, or the engine-maker his machines—ought to be abolished altogether, not whittled away till it seems unimportant to the landlord, yet continues grievously to fetter the tenant.

The remainder of the Bill is much more valuable, but the provisions are unexpectedly moderate. The tenant can ask for permanent improvements, and if the landlord consents can make them, and if he makes them will recover at the end of his tenancy their full value, estimated according to their value to the incoming tenant. That is simple justice, and an immense improvement on the existing law, under which a tenant might build a barn with his landlord's consent, and then be evicted next year in favour of a speculator who offered more rent, without compensation for his barn. But we do not understand that the right to compensation could not be given up, and in years of competition for farms it would be given up by agreement. Mr. Dodson said, in the plainest way:—"For these and other permanent improvements, in order to obtain compensation under the Act, the consent of the landlord must be obtained. The consent might be given either unconditionally or upon such terms as to compensation or otherwise as might be agreed upon between the landlord and the tenant. In the event of any agreement being made between the landlord and the tenant, the compensation payable under it would be substituted for the compensation under the Act." The landlord, therefore, could, with the tenant's consent, fix compensation at one farthing,—that is, contract himself out of the law altogether. The tenantry hoped, we fancy, for a clause allowing them, if the landlord proved unreasonable, to apply to a court and obtain an order; but this is not conceded, except as to drainage, which the tenant, after giving due notice to the landlord and receiving a refusal, can do for himself, and obtain full compensation. That is a substantial advantage, but it is not so much as tenants hoped for; and we do not quite see why, if it is fair to compel drainage, it is not fair to compel irrigation, and allow for it as an improvement.

Temporary improvements are guaranteed much more thoroughly. The landlord must pay their full value, estimated by the amount of their value to the incoming tenant, a very good and satisfactory principle already adopted on all well-managed estates. But even here, though the landlord cannot contract himself out of his obligation, he can apparently whittle it away to nothing. Mr. Dodson says:—"The tenant would be entitled to make these improvements and to claim compensation for them without obtaining the consent of or giving notice to the landlord. If there were an agreement under a new contract of tenancy, then the compensation under the agreement would be substituted for the compensation under the Act." The effect of that is surely that present tenants are safe, but that new tenants, if they agree to accept sixpence an acre in compensation for all temporary improvements, will have no more security than they have now. That system is quite intelligible and quite just, and is the system on which all house property is held; but we understand the tenants to ask far more. Their contention is that owing to certain circumstances, and especially to the fact that land is limited in quantity, they are not quite free; that it is exceptionally advantageous to the community that they should be free; and that, consequently, they should be forbidden by law to submit to over-hard terms. Unless we misunderstand Mr. Dodson, they are not forbidden under this Bill, and will, therefore, not be satisfied. His words, indeed, are unmistakable, and our only doubt is whether, as both parties are forbidden to contract themselves out of the Act, a visibly inadequate compensation arranged by agreement might not be held to be a colourable evasion of the law. We fear, however, that is not the case, and if not, new tenants gain under the Bill valuable rights in the absence of agreement, but are liable to be asked to agree to terms which, except for drainage works, leave them no more security than before. The compulsory principle is introduced, but is not applied in the thorough way for which, as we conceive, the tenant-farmers of England and Scotland have been agitating. The Bill, of course, may be strengthened in Committee, but if the Tories oppose, so many landlords will join them, that change will be nearly hopeless. The question will, therefore, be left open, and though we are not ourselves sorry for that, thinking that the best compromise between full proprietorship and tenant-right has not been found, we fear the agricultural tenantry will remain discontented. They obtain much security against their landlords, but they asked also for security against themselves.

WHERE WERE THE BISHOPS?

"EPISCOPI Anglicani semper pavidī!" a Bishop was heard to mutter, as he took up the Times on Wednesday morning, and found that not a single one of the rulers of the Church had opened his lips on a subject on which, as one would have supposed, they were especially called upon to guide the opinion of the nation, the subject of Sunday recreation. In the presence of Lord Shaftesbury, it seemed, they dared not approve of extending the range of Sunday recreations; but how, as rational beings, and without taking refuge behind the rather ignominious shelter of the imaginary labour difficulty—which is encountered and somehow surmounted in various cases of outdoor, and one of partially indoor, amusement already—were they seriously to oppose it? So they neither approved nor opposed it, except so far as their votes were concerned, all of which were given for opposition. We can hardly imagine a more striking illustration of what we ventured to say last week as to the absolute inefficiency of the Bishops as Life-

Peers. We only remarked then that they are almost useless as Life-Peers, because they will not attend at all to any questions except those which specially interest them either as Conservatives or as Ecclesiastics. But here was a question which should have interested some of them as Conservatives, and all of them as Ecclesiastics, and yet not one opened his lips. We do not pretend to be seriously at fault as to the reason. The reason is very simple, that there are no really sound arguments of principle against the extension of sober Sunday recreations,—recreations of a kind not inconsistent with the more spiritual life to which the various religious services of the day are intended to lead the mind,—and that the more thoughtful of the Bishops see this plainly, but fear to lose the influence they exert, or suppose themselves to exert, over religious people by saying plainly what they think. Certainly nothing could better illustrate the criticism so long ago passed on English Bishops that they are always timid. And in this case we sincerely believe them to have been timid without excuse. We are well aware of the extraordinarily superstitious character of the old Puritanical feeling about Sunday occupations, a feeling which, in Scotland at least, as everybody knows, is not seriously offended by the day being spent in private drinking, while it is most seriously offended by anything which partakes of the character of innocent cheerfulness publicly displayed. But surely the time has come for a deliberate attack on that superstitious feeling. Surely, if there were any leading power in our spiritual leaders, that conception of public cheerfulness as a sin against the God of the Sabbath, is in the last stages of senile decay, and might well have received its death-blow from a great master of oratory,—such as the Bishop of Peterborough, for instance, whose name we looked for eagerly, and missed with surprise from the debate,—and might then be left amongst the utterly dead superstitions of the past to which it would never again be possible to return. What opportunity could have been nobler for a delineation of the true day of rest, a day in which no mind should be strained except towards the Source of all power, and not over-strained even towards that, a day in which there should be no other excitement of a nature to unfit the spirit for the high and serious excitement which it needs so much, but in which that high and serious excitement should be alternated with every mild and lively pleasure which comes most naturally after the passionate business and competitive labour of the week? It strikes us with something like amazement that the Prelates of the Church should leave it to men of the world to plead for something like “sweet reasonableness” on this subject. It ought not to be men of the world who should best understand the danger of making the day of religion a day of unrelieved gloom,—or who should most clearly see that even that necessary and universal element in all true religion which, because it involves true contrition, is not, and cannot, be free from pain that must be steadily faced, will only be caricatured into hypochondriac affectation, or positive hypocrisy, if it is to give the whole colouring to one day in seven, and to make of the contemplation of the highest life an occasion for putting on the air of unmanly dejection. We cannot understand the timidity which leaves it to men of the world to plead for the genial cheerfulness of Sunday. Surely no one knows so well as the Bishops that genial Sundays have done a great deal more to win the irreligious to true religion than sanctimonious Sundays,—that it is not by pulling long faces that men are ever best persuaded to face the deadly weakness and insincerities of their own hearts, much less to rise to the Source of all strength and all sincerity. We must say frankly that the abstention of the Bishops from such a debate as that of Tuesday night, under the dread of losing influence with good but narrow people of Evangelical views, only shows that spiritual avocations do not strengthen the spiritual nerve, and that no set of men live more in dread of that gelatinous compost called “Public Opinion” than the men who should most despise it because they are so often forced to contemplate how public opinion has been changed by one breath of divine inspiration.

It seems to us all the stranger, and all the less creditable to the Bishops, that they showed this extreme fear of what is called the public opinion of the religious world, that the religious world itself, as represented by Lord Shaftesbury and Lord Cairns, showed an equal fear of the world of common-sense. Neither of them ventured to base his opposition on principle; both of them took refuge under the rather ignominious shelter of those working-men who fear that any further infringement of the Sunday may result in depriving the working-classes of their day of rest. In other words, while the friends of sober recreation are frightened out of their wits lest the religious world should pronounce them unholy, that religious world itself is just as frightened lest the world of common-sense should condemn its sanctimonious gloom. Such is that Public Opinion which is held in ignominious reverence,—a confused conglomerate of timidities, playing a game of hide-and-seek with each other, and of ignoble timidities which not even our spiritual leaders dare to unmask, to reprove, or to uproot.

PRINCE BISMARCK'S DEFEATS.

THE Parliamentary situation in Germany at this moment is, perhaps, more interesting to the speculative observer than to the newsmonger. Probably nothing will happen in consequence of Prince Bismarck's defeats, for the problem is soluble only by time, and Germans possess in an eminent degree a capacity for waiting till they are ready, which is sometimes a long while. Nevertheless, to all who are interested in representative government, the position of affairs is singularly striking. We have in Germany a spectacle entirely without precedent in constitutional history, namely, that immensely powerful instrument, a Council elected by universal suffrage, contented to exert its powers only by way of veto. The Reichstag exerts this right continuously, courageously, we might say, even pitilessly; but it stops short with the exertion, insists on no initiative, and does not demand the dismissal of the Government, whose proposals it nevertheless rejects. The abstinence of the Reichstag from any strong initiative is, no doubt, intelligible. Not to mention the immense difficulty which the Liberal leaders would find, in the present situation of parties, in securing a majority willing to commence large reforms, or to enter in any way upon a struggle with the Throne, there is always the sense that any Bill passed in defiance of the Imperial Government would be sterile. As we long ago pointed out, Prince Bismarck, when he framed the Constitution, devised the strongest Upper House in Europe, a Federal Council, representing Princes who cannot be set aside without revolution, and who have a historic hold upon their States. There is no provision enabling the Reichstag to compel the Bundesrath to agree with it, and in the Bundesrath the Emperor and his Chancellor are still sure of a majority. The Reichstag, however, though it has voted away for seven years its power of altering the Military Budget, still possesses much financial control,—can, for instance, refuse any civil estimate, can reject any scheme involving new outlay, and can refuse to grant any new tax. Moreover, it uses these powers. A year or two ago it refused to vote the salary of an Ambassador to the Vatican; it has declined recently to assent to the Workmen's Insurance Bills, and will decline again, for the Committee has reported against them; and on Tuesday it rejected a Protectionist Bill to increase the timber duties. It has, moreover, thrown out every proposition for an increased Tobacco-tax, it is known to intend to reject a Beer Bill, if presented, and although it has not formally rejected the request for a prospective Budget, it has accepted a resolution submitted by Herr Richter hopelessly at variance with that project. In fact, the Reichstag not only possesses, but exercises, a complete financial veto, with a steadiness and vigour which should, to all outward appearance, lead to a change of Government. Nevertheless, it does not lead to it. Prince Bismarck, it is affirmed, probably with truth, is irritated by the votes; but he does not intend either to resign or to dissolve, but to pass on as if the Reichstag had no existence. He does not attend its debates, he receives any resolution with a cold rebuke—last week, for example, he answered one on military affairs with a note saying that the Reichstag was exceeding its rights, which appears to have been true—and he goes on quietly governing, quarrelling with his colleagues, and proposing his schemes again and again. He is apparently confident that the Reichstag, however resolute not to take his advice or obey his orders, will take no action to lock the machine, by refusing supplies or otherwise, so as to compel his resignation, and he has probably good reason for his confidence.

The majority in the Reichstag, besides being divided into five groups, and singularly poor in leaders who could claim, or even accept, office, has three definite reasons for not entering upon a struggle with the Throne. In the first place, it might not win. Nothing in the least degree approaching violent agitation could, of course, be attempted, for it would be suppressed at once by the Army, who have been trained to regard the Emperor as their legal head, and obedience to their officers as their first duty. An order to arrest the Reichstag would be obeyed like any other. The Reichstag must confine itself to its strictest legal rights, and those rights are not fully operative. The Emperor has not forgotten that for three years—from 1863 to 1866—he dispensed with a legal budget, raising and expending the revenue without sanction, and that Parliament not only forgave, but by formal statute absolved his action. He would do it again, on very slight provocation, and all the more readily because he could proclaim that Parliament had shown itself specially indisposed to accept his proposals for conferring additional security on the poor. The people could not rise in the teeth of that Army, and would, however annoyed, do as they did before, quietly await the issue. The Liberals dread a contest of that kind which they lost in the Prussian Parliament, which takes a long time, and which while it lasts reduces Parliament to a debating club. They see, moreover, no reason for it. Germans are not in a hurry, they have not the confidence in Parliaments felt in England, and they remember, what we often forget, the vast age of the Emperor, so far greater than the average life of man, and the certainty that with him a régime will end. The German Empire is not Russia, but the power of the Sovereigns who first made Prussia and then Germany, who are the objects of devotion in the Army, and who have repeatedly shown themselves competent to govern, is still so great, that a new reign has many of the characteristics of a new cycle. New ideas prevail, new men come to the front; there springs up a new way of looking at all great affairs. No one understands the Crown Prince, but, at all events, there may be great changes, and to the German mind it seems far better to wait and see what they will be like. This tendency to quiescence is increased by an indisposition to harass the Emperor himself, who has done such great things, who is personally so imposing a figure, the head of an ancient dynasty, with the halo of success still round him, and who bears unfalteringly such a weight of years, and latterly, of troubles. And finally, the Reichstag is not quite certain in its inner mind what it does want. Almost every man in it has been a soldier, all were of mature age in the great war, and all are painfully aware of military dangers, which they may exaggerate, but which impress men with the nerve of Prince Bismarck and the German Generals. A doubt whether they could do without the Chancellor—whether, if he departed, peace might not depart, too, whether a Parliament could direct a difficult foreign policy or control an Army necessarily always vast—weighs on every German mind, and makes the men who might be leaders hesitate to push anything to extremes. This generation does not wish to endanger unity or risk invasion, even to secure self-government, and half doubts whether, in such a camp as Central Europe now is—a camp with a million of men actually in barracks—representative bodies are strong enough to govern. Events may prove that the hesitation was only on the surface, but for the present it exists, and would defeat any proposal for vigorous action, say, for example, an address to the Crown praying for a new Chancellor. If, indeed, the Parliament had to bear, instead of to wait, the course of the majority might be different, but that is not the case. The Parliamentary veto is as strong as the Parliamentary initiative is feeble. Prince Bismarck himself once stated in the House that, high as he held the Royal Prerogative, it did not extend to the imposition of a new tax; and when a non-financial measure has been defeated he fumes and thunders, but does nothing. The Parliament can prevent new action, and that prevents despair. The whole situation, in fact, greatly resembles that of England in Elizabeth's time, when also the Sovereign governed, and Parliament remonstrated or forbade, but did not nominate or dismiss the Sovereign's counsellors. The oddity is, and it is one well worth observation, that such a situation should exist, when the "Parliament" is practically a body of representatives freely elected by universal suffrage. The prevalent theory, that this system, with all its faults, at least evolves irresistible force, requires reconsideration.

THE INDIAN EXCHEQUER.

THE debate of Tuesday night in the Commons on Indian Expenditure was a very sound and instructive one, though, as usual, very dull to read. In every such discussion the principal speakers are naturally anxious to prove their statements, and produce a quantity of figures, amid which the two secrets of Indian expenditure escape general recognition. The first of these, though patent to all Anglo-Indians, is hidden from almost all Englishmen. Alone among the great States of the world—and remember, India is, at lowest, the eighth Power—the Indian Empire is administered by men who have no interest in its future. The greatest officials, the Viceroy, the Governors, the Chief Commissioners, the Commanders-in-Chief, the Members of all Councils, intend after five years of office to depart to a distant land, where their achievements or their blunders are alike unknown, where they are lost in the crowd, and where, amidst the movement of a more vivid and intellectual civilisation, they half forget the affairs of the secluded and monotonous peninsula they have helped to govern. They are, for the most part at all events, laborious, able, and well-principled men; but they cannot, if they would, think of the future or of far-reaching policies as statesmen do who will feel their effects for life, and know that they will be felt also by their children. A scheme, for example, of Terminable Annuities to be operative fifty years hence has and can have no interest for them. They learn, unconsciously, to live for the year, and to plan for the term of office. If they can but leave their "mark," they are satisfied, and no "mark" can be left without expenditure. Upon men thus situated there falls a pressure towards outlay almost unexampled in Europe, or paralleled only by the pressure now experienced by the Republican Government of France. The whole world around Indian statesmen is asking them to improve things,—to build more railways, to cut more canals, to construct more roads, to give more education, to establish more Courts, to give better and more civilised administration. The Services amid which they live, and which evolve almost the only effective public opinion, ask not indeed for more pay, which they know they would not get, but for more help, which means more officers, more "leave"—which means, again, more officers—and more pension, which means not only more outlay, but more loss by exchange. The requests are endless, the reasons often sound, the retarding criticism usually non-existent. The European journalists in India to a man must support "liberalism," or lose their audience, and the few native journalists who are influential either attend to other matters or fight for an increase of allowances, often well deserved, to the huge Native establishments, the scale and pay of which may be imagined from Mr. Kynaston Cross's statement that there are 151,000 Policemen in India, maintained at an average cost of £16 a head per annum. Naturally, the tendency of expenditure, especially upon great public works which glorify the rulers in English eyes, is towards incessant increase; and, so far from wondering, with Mr. E. Stanhope, that outlay has increased by three and a half millions since 1879, we only wonder the addition has not been three times the amount. But for a certain dread of deficits, it would have been. We know nothing of the secrets of the present Administration, but we venture to say with certainty that the defensible proposals placed before the Government of India in any one year would raise the immediate expenditure by ten millions sterling.

There is, we are convinced, but one final remedy for this tendency. The Government of India, reluctant, as it is, to "cut down," will do it with a strong hand, rather than face deficits. Those make too much fuss at home, influence the loan market too directly, and vex the local statesmen—who, remember, are at bottom men of high public spirit—too keenly to be endured. If, therefore, Parliament orders that the charge for Debt shall always be calculated, as in England, at four millions, or even two millions, in excess of the fact, and that the difference shall be expended in buying up the bonds payable in England, expenditure will be adjusted to that new demand. Nothing short of that order will have the slightest permanent effect, but that would be obeyed, would keep down Debt, and would give India in a few years a heavy Reserve Fund against calamity or unexpected war. To niggle at details is waste of power, and breaks the heart of the Local Governments till they let all things drift. What is wanted is a broad principle of public policy made so legal and compulsory that the Commissioners of the Indian Debt should have a right of suit if their money were not forthcoming, and that a Viceroy would feel the discharge of Debt to be a law, and not an administrative order. It was to a policy like this that we believe Mr. Gladstone to have pointed in the speech of 1879, quoted by Mr. E. Stanhope, in which he maintained that Indian finance could not be made solid without a reduction of four millions a year. That is substantially the exact truth, and we are farther from realising that dream than when the great master of finance spoke.

The second secret of Indian finance is the vastness of the sum to be provided at home. It is supposed popularly that this sum, or a huge cantle of it, is wasted in Home Establishments, but that is a mere illusion. India pays for her entire governing apparatus in England half a farthing a head of her people, a sum—it is only £127,000—less than might fairly be assigned to her Sovereign for a Civil List, less by four-fifths than the personal expenditure of the Great Mogul. That is a drop in the bucket, the real burden being elsewhere. India, with the third best credit in the world, is in the position of a Spanish-American State. She has to remit huge sums to London for her loans, State loans, railway loans, loans for public works. She has also to remit huge sums for military stores, for officers' pay on leave, and for pensions,—the Civil dead-weight alone exceeding two millions a year—and has in all to send home eighteen millions a year, a sum equal to half her net revenue, and one increasing, in spite of desperate efforts, year by year. Much of the money is interest on capital profitably invested. Much is paid because it is fancied that loans can most easily be raised here. Much could not be touched without breach of faith. Still, the burden is the one which presses on and disorders the Indian Exchequer, and should be studied seriously and by financiers of the first rank, with a resolution to sweep part of it away. It is not a subject for a Parliamentary Commission, but we do not believe that if a Royal Commission, consisting of Mr. Goschen, Mr. Courtney, and Mr. Baring, were appointed to investigate and report on "Indian Remittances," the present condition of affairs would be allowed to continue. It must be possible to pay Indian charges in India, as Austria, for example, pays all demands in Austria. We will not venture to suggest, but we believe that some changes are ultimately possible which would go to the root of the matter. We see no reason why, in future, Railway dividends should be remitted by the State, instead of by the Companies. All pensions should be paid in India, and not here, to a Pension Trustee, who should remit, like any other banker to private clients, without Government intervention. All future pensions should be abolished for every grade and class, and a deduction of 5 per cent. from salaries—on the Civil-Service system—be paid to the same Trustee, a home annuity equal to the sum saved being purchased for the officer on his resignation. All loans should be raised in India, and the subscribers left to themselves, as was formerly the case, to get their interest home. And, finally, a huge slice of the sums to be remitted should be sent in produce, such as wheat and tobacco for the French Government, the largest buyer in the world, not to make a profit, but to extinguish the losses by exchange. Any one of these ideas may be proved by experts to be unsound, but that the burden can be reduced by wiser men than ourselves to endurable limits we are convinced. Whether the attempt will be made is a different matter, but the experience of thirty years has not made us sanguine. While the Indian Exchequer, though groaning and fretting, can still pay its way as punctually as the British, the statesmen shrink from incurring the odium which a radical reform would involve; and in petty reforms there is no hope, because the necessity for making them is not strong enough to overcome the permanent tendencies of the Government of India, both in Simla and in Downing Street. In both places, the permanent passion is to introduce European completeness into the administration of a State which has Asiatic distances, Asiatic poverty, and Asiatic revenue. To govern India as many among us wish to govern her would take a European average of revenue, say £2 a head, or £500,000,000 a year. Deducting the dead-weight, we have less than a tenth of that to spend, and no more is obtainable.

CROWN PROPERTY.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS came in for some hard words on Tuesday. He is a Radical of Radicals, and in that character he has been a chief denouncer of Obstruction, and foremost among those who have urged the Government to adopt a very short way with it. Yet, on Tuesday, Mr. Collings availed himself of a right which, though it has only been a little time in existence, has already become famous as a means of taking up time. He asked leave, when the questions were exhausted, to move the adjournment of the House, "on a matter of definite public importance," and more than forty Members rose in their places to signify their wish that leave should be given. The spectacle was too much for Colonel Alexander's patience. He waited until the grievances of a "wretched watering-place in Lancashire" had been discussed for an hour and a half, and then the fire kindled, and at the last he spake with his tongue. The majority of Members, he said, had come down to listen to matters of real importance, and they could not stomach Mr. Collings's audacity in inflicting on them the particulars of a purely local question like the Southport foreshore. The fact that Mr. Collings was the gentleman who the other day pressed Mr. Gladstone to consider the propriety of keeping Parliament sitting until all the measures mentioned in the Queen's Speech had been passed made his conduct worse, since it showed that he cared as little about his own consistency as about the public time. As far as consistency goes, Mr. Collings's conscience is probably untroubled. A man may think it inexpedient that a particular practice should be allowed, and yet be quite ready to avail himself of it, so long as it is allowed. The House of Commons has determined that whenever forty Members wish that a certain motion shall be made, leave shall be given to make it. Those who question the wisdom of such a permission are not bound to forego the use of it, since, if they did, the only result would be that the points which they hold to be specially deserving of the attention of Ministers would be the points least pressed on them. Nor is the fact that the question raised had only local interest, any reason why the time of the House of Commons should not be given to it. It might be a reason for setting up some other kind of tribunal to deal with local questions, but so long as the House of Commons continues to be charged with them, it is quite right that they should from time to time be brought before it. Until County Courts were established, the Superior Courts had sometimes to busy themselves with the recovery of very small debts. Mr. Collings had a perfect right to move the adjournment of the House, in order to call attention to the grievances of a "wretched watering-place in Lancashire," provided that the grievance when produced turned out to call for redress.

We are of opinion that Mr. Collings was materially as well as formally justified in what he did,—that he not only used a discretion which no one is entitled to challenge, but that the use he made of it was in itself a wise one. The question raised by his motion was not merely a local question of importance, but was nothing less than the method and end of the administration of Crown Property. The Duchy of Lancaster has lately disposed of the Foreshore of the town of Southport to a private purchaser. There is no doubt that the Duchy has a perfectly legal right to sell what it sold, or that on the principle on which Crown property has customarily been managed, it was a very proper bargain to conclude. It is precisely such a sale as a careful trustee might have made on behalf of a minor. The land disposed of was of no value to the Crown, and brought in nothing. It was of value to the landowners who bought it, and they were willing to pay handsomely for it. The trustee thought only of the balance-sheet of his ward's estate, and sold the foreshore. Mr. Collings, however, contends that there was another ward in the business, and that in thinking of the abstract entity, the Crown, the Duchy forgot that very concrete entity, the people of Southport. He does not say that the Crown ought to have made them a present of the foreshore, all he insists on is that their right of pre-emption should have been recognised. If this had been done, the Corporation of Southport were seemingly willing to give the Government anything they asked. As long ago as October, 1880, the Corporation had proposed to buy the foreshore, and the Duchy had sent a surveyor to value it. When this had been done, it appeared that the right of the Crown to the foreshore was not undisputed, and that if the Corporation bought it, they might turn out to have bought a lawsuit with it. Even with this prospect, the Corporation, as it now appears, wished to go on dealing; and, as a matter of fact, they did go on. But they thought, not unnaturally, that the possible defect in title ought to be considered in fixing the price, and down to February 21st, 1882, negotiations, chiefly verbal, went on between the Town Clerk and the Solicitor to the Corporation. On that day a letter was written, to which the Corporation and the authorities of the Duchy attach different meanings. The Corporation hold that it was merely a link in a long correspondence, of no more importance than any other link; the authorities of the Duchy hold that it amounted to a notice that the Corporation no longer wished to buy the foreshore. In this belief, the Chancellor listened favourably to an application from the two riparian owners who contested the Crown's right to the foreshore to extinguish their claims, and bar future litigation by a sale of the foreshore to them. On the 9th of last month, the Corporation heard accidentally that this sale had actually been made. Since that time, they have been vainly seeking to set it aside; and, failing in this, they appealed to the House of Commons, by the mouth of Mr. Jesse Collings.

It is admitted that neither the Chancellor of the Duchy nor his subordinates have meant to deal unfairly by the Corporation of Southport. They thought, rightly or wrongly, that the Corporation were not prepared to pay the price asked for the foreshore, and they thereupon did what was best for the Duchy, and sold it to those who would give it. It is a dilemma in which the Government are constantly placed when selling Crown property, and hitherto they have usually, if not always, dealt with it in the same way. The question they ask themselves is,—What will bring in most money to the Crown, and as “the Crown” is now only another word for “the nation,” they think that they are only doing their duty in looking at every proposal exclusively from this point. Until recently, nobody doubted that they were right in thinking so. The nation, through the Crown, holds certain lands, and the method of management which makes these lands most profitable was assumed to be the proper method. But of late years more attention has been paid to local needs and national interests, and it has been realised that a transaction which puts a few thousand pounds into the Exchequer at the cost of an irreparable injury to a populous neighbourhood or to a whole class of persons may, after all, be a bad bargain for the public. This was Mr. Collings’s argument on Tuesday. Here, he said, is a town of 45,000 people, which in twenty years has doubled its numbers twice over, and may, perhaps, repeat the process during the next twenty. Between these 45,000 people and the sea is a foreshore, which by the act of the Crown has now become the property of two landowners, without whose consent the inhabitants cannot even walk upon the beach in front of their houses. Perhaps the next act of these landowners will be to sell the beach to a railway company, and so spoil altogether the sea-front of the town. Is this a proper use to which to turn Crown property? May the Government consult the infinitesimal interest of the nation in having a few thousand pounds added to the Chancellor of the Exchequer’s surplus next year, and so deprive Southport of that access to the sea which constitutes the solitary charm of a Lancashire watering-place?

As a matter of what ought to be, rather than of what is, Mr. Collings’s contention is perfectly sound, and he ought to have gone a great deal further. Even Southport ought not to have been allowed to purchase the foreshore. The Crown should have held it for ever, allowing the Corporation the usufruct, but retaining the right to prevent them from selling or doing any injury to the general interest. Even if we grant all that Mr. Dodson and Mr. Gladstone asked for—that the authorities of the Duchy had only done what it has till now been supposed that they are bound to do, and that the negotiation with the riparian landowners has gone too far to be rescinded—it does not follow that the system hitherto pursued is a good one. The nation would benefit, so far as money goes, if the Crown were to let the whole of the Regent’s Park on building leases; and the New Forest, if divided among the neighbouring proprietors, might bring in a larger profit than now, when it is kept in the hands of the Crown. But in the first case Londoners, and in the second every Englishman who is ever able to get a holiday, however short, in the finest tract of forest land in the country, would lose far more than the nation would gain; and the same thing may be said with regard to the inhabitants of Southport and their foreshore. For the future, either some new instructions ought to be given by Parliament to the Managers of Crown Property; or notice of each separate sale ought to be given to the House of Commons.

THE PROMISE OF SPRING.

A SUDDEN and delightful change came over the country at the end of April, when a late spell of winter gave way to refreshing showers and a more genial temperature. Fields, pastures, orchards, and gardens burst into full, verdant life, as if by magic. Everything was backward, kept in durance by the cold hand of frost and the terror of the biting blast, but only waiting for an opportunity to put forth its reserve of force, to exercise its accumulated vitality. The opportunity came, and vegetation literally rushed into growth with a suddenness rare in our slowly-maturing climate. When such quick bursts of vegetable life occur early in the season, they are sources of anxiety to the experienced observer, and rarely fail to be followed by disastrous results; but at the end of April “more haste” does not necessarily imply “less speed,” for the time has then come when it is scarcely possible for lost time to be too quickly made up. A check such as we had during last week is very likely to follow, but not to do serious injury. Sharp frosts in May unfortunately are not uncommon; but they are not often numerous. From observations taken during the years up to the end of 1881, in the neighbourhood of London, it appears that the average number of frosts in the air was two; in 1877 there were five, and in 1872, 1875, and 1878, none at all. The average number of frosts on the ground was eight; in 1874 there were fourteen, and in 1878 only one. But these frosts were not all sufficiently severe to be very dangerous to vegetation, the average number of injurious ground-frosts being only four. Moreover, when field crops are as backward as they are this year, serious damage is to be apprehended in the garden and orchard, rather than on the farm. There will be scarcely any wheat and no barley or oats sufficiently advanced during the present month to be in danger of anything beyond the cutting off of the blade, which is undesirable, but not irrecoverable, as the seed-heads will not have emerged from their protective sheathing, and we shall look in vain for the proverbial May wheat-ear. Winter beans, now coming into blossom, would suffer from a sharp frost, potatoes would be injured more or less, and early-feeding crops would be diminished in bulk; but in other respects the lateness of the farmer’s produce will prove a great safeguard against the climatic vicissitudes of fickle May. There were two or three night frosts last week, which did a little damage to wall-fruit not protected, and to cherries and other orchard fruit in the South of England, where an unusual abundance of blossom had appeared. The bitter east and north-east winds that blew so persistently were also unpropitious to all kinds of field and garden produce. This unseasonable weather, however, has had little effect on the farmer’s crops, beyond checking the progress which had so beneficially commenced a week previously; and in orchards and gardens the damage appears to be comparatively small. The present week set in with more sunshine and a higher temperature, although, as the wind was still in a cold quarter, the change was not all that could be desired. The hardy field crops, however, quickly showed signs of recovering from the check they had suffered, and to-day there is reason for congratulating farmers and the public generally upon the prospect of a good harvest.

In such a climate as ours, crops are never safe till they are under cover, and in speaking of the promise of Spring, we must always be conscious of the possibility of the brightest of hopes being doomed to disappointment. Yet when we contrast the Agricultural outlook at the present time with appearances at the opening of the year, it would be hard, indeed, if we were precluded from the expression of a natural feeling of congratulation. In January, comparatively little wheat had been sown, and less was up sufficiently thick in plant to show any promise of a fair yield. Ploughing was greatly in arrear, there had been no frost to pulverise the land, and the prospect of a good seed-bed for spring corn was anything but hopeful. Suspense on this score was prolonged through February, a month of rain and floods, so that the hope of sowing spring wheat to make up for the deficiency of the autumn-sown varieties seemed to have passed away. The wintry weather of March still further delayed farming operations, but the sharp frosts did work that millions of harrowings could not have performed so effectually; and by working in the afternoon, when the sun had thawed the ground, a considerable quantity of spring wheat was sown, as well as some barley and oats. April was perfect, from a farmer’s point of view, in relation to the state of work, and the rapidity with which sowing was proceeded with had never been exceeded in the history of British husbandry. The land literally “worked like a garden,” and spring crops were put in with a minimum of labour, and under the most advantageous conditions. Just when farmers in all but the late districts of the country had finished sowing, excepting on turnip land, always necessarily left over, the gentle rain and genial temperature which came with the closing days of April formed a climax to the advantages already described. Winter wheat, which had been making good root-growth and tillering nicely above ground, quickly showed a strong vitality, and is now generally thick enough for a fair crop, though there are many fields in which the plant is still gappy; while spring corn of all sorts is almost universally abundant and vigorous in plant. Mangolds have been for the most part sown under the most favourable conditions, and the weather has been excellent for preparing the land for turnips.

Walking over the fields to-day, the skilled observer sees much to assure him, and very little to cause apprehension. He notices that wheat is dark in colour, and hugs the ground; that the early barley has that curly formation of the blade which denotes an almost frisky vigour; that winter beans are very strong and healthy; and that spring beans and peas are thick in plant. That everything is backward is no matter for regret, on the whole. Peas and oats have both been tried by the drought and east wind of April, but have grown fairly since the rain came; and the same remarks apply to vetches, clovers, and pastures. That feed is late is the most unsatisfactory feature of the agricultural outlook, so that, for the first time for many years, farmers whose holdings are pastoral or chiefly so have the worst of it, just now. But although the owners of live-stock must be seriously short of keep for their herds and flocks for a few weeks, genial and showery weather would speedily bring them abundance, especially where they have a few fields of clover, which is almost universally very thick and healthy this season. They have lately had much loss and inconvenience to put up with on account of the existence of foot-and-mouth disease; but, fortunately, this very troublesome complaint is rapidly subsiding, and the veto against lamb has been removed, so that they have relief from fears that recently oppressed them. Nor should we neglect to mention that the lambing season, which started unfavourably in many parts of the country, closed under much happier auspices, the general result being a crop of lambs but little, if at all, under average, taking the country, as a whole, into consideration. A review of agricultural prospects all round, then, at least with respect to England, shows cause for rejoicing, and for trusting that the long lane of agricultural adversity is taking a turn for the better at last.

In the orchard and garden, the lateness of the season is only in some respects a subject for congratulation. Growers of early vegetables have had a bad time of it, and where they are not fruit-growers also their losses can scarcely be made up to them this season. Flowers and shrubs, too, have suffered from the spells of wintry weather. But if everything had not been kept back by cold weather in the early spring, the recent frosts would have been disastrous. At present there is some doubt as to the extent of damage done to cherries and wall-fruit—almost invariably sufferers more or less from frost—and it has already been intimated that other fruits may have received some injury in early districts; but apples, pears, and bush fruits have probably escaped serious damage. It is a treat to walk through the fruit-growing districts of Kent, and to enjoy the beauty of the apple-blossom now covering the trees in unusual abundance. It is premature, however, to speak of fruit prospects, as a single sharp frost may destroy the fairest of promises. All that can safely be said is that to-day, in the orchard, as on the farm, the promise of Spring is golden.

MUSIC AS OCCUPATION.

THE Prince of Wales on Monday opened the Royal College of Music, in the presence of a representative audience, and to indicate the opinion of the Court, three persons eminent in the musical world—Professor Macfarren, Mr. A. Sullivan, and Dr. G. Grove—were announced in his speech as having received the honour of Knighthood. That distinction will not, perhaps, do them much good just now, when every third man about is becoming Sir Somebody Something; but the honour is in accordance with English ways, and is unobjectionable, as was also the Baronetcy bestowed a little earlier upon Mr. C. Freake, the builder, for presenting the needful buildings for a College, nominally to the Prince of Wales, but really to the nation. The cultivation of Music is evidently to be made fashionable, and we have not a word to say, except that we wish the work could be done with a little less of sentimental exaggeration in the talk about it. Music is an excellent thing, and an enjoyable thing, as also are poetry, and oratory, and histrionic power; but it is not the unqualified and celestial good which its advocates assert it to be. Owing, we imagine, to the Western fancy that making music is an inevitable occupation in Heaven—think how bored poor Dr. Johnson must be, if that is true!—those who enjoy music always claim for it a sort of special sanctity and holiness, a sort of grace in itself and by itself; and the Archbishop of Canterbury actually embodied that idea in his opening prayer, and prayed, “God, the only author of order and beauty,” to “perfect science and skill in his pure gift of Music.” Why is music so “pure” a gift? All other gifts of God are so given that their use or misuse depends on human free-will, and why is music purer than poetry or oratory? Does Dr. Benson, perchance, believe that there are two Musics, and that Offenbach got his gift from the Devil; or does he forget that if there is one music of St. Cecilia, there is another of Thérèse? Music is neither good nor bad, any more than poetry or eloquence, but is a method of expression which to many organisations is capable of conveying higher, more delicate, and, above all, more exact meanings than any other. But it can convey any meaning, and does very often convey a sensual one. If all that is said of its purifying and elevating influence were true, we should not find that great musicians, composers occasionally, and instrumentalists very often, were men of most irregular lives, or that musical amateurs were not infrequently among the worst of mankind. Nero was not exactly purified or elevated by his devotion to music, nor have the patrons of the art among the little Princes of Germany been nobler than those who, from some defect of organisation, probably connected with the structure of the tympanum, had no sympathy for sweet sounds. Charles II. was not exactly the superior of William III. It is not clear that the Neapolitan, who is so often born famaticco, is higher in character than the dull Saxon, so often sensible only to the rhythm of music; nor are the races among which musical capacity is indigenous so much purer than those among whom it must be cultivated with assiduity, not to say coddled. Mr. Disraeli always said, and we believe truly, that the gift of music had been bestowed in largest measure upon the Children of Israel; but great as their services both to religion and to thought have been, they are not, as a race, the least earthy of mankind.

To give to an inarticulate and sad race like Englishmen, who have almost ceased to feel joy, and are dropping the word “gladness” out of the language, a new means of expression and of enjoyment, is, however, excellent work, the true meaning of which is only hidden by conventional exaggeration. Music is capable of misuse, as poetry is; but the gain from the study of music is great, and more especially the gain to the overworked sections of the people. The power of acquiring musical skill seems independent of situation in life, and even of mental capacity, for though great composers have been usually as intellectually gifted as poets, that has not always been the case with great singers or instrumentalists; while the faculty of musical apprehension is, apparently, the most culturable of all, more culturable than the power of criticism, and the man who succeeds even a little in the study gains much of happiness. He has not only obtained something of the creative faculty, like a poet or a painter, but he has found one of the best of earthly weapons against trouble, a secondary occupation which interests and absorbs like work, yet is not work. Englishmen, possibly because of the strenuousness with which they labour, and the respect, perhaps the undue respect, with which they regard toil—at least, we do not find that the admirable industry of the Chinaman makes him a specially lofty being—are singularly deficient in secondary occupations. They take them if they come, but they do not seek them as distinct helps in the art of living. A few draw, a few paint, a few grow flowers, a few betake themselves earnestly to science. So few are they among the working-classes that those who do it are pointed out as remarkable, and in the middle-class the proportion is not much higher. The man in commerce or in a profession who can do something else, do it heartily and not perfunctorily, is far happier than his neighbour, so much so as to be an object of avowed envy among his acquaintance; yet the number of those who can do it is comparatively very few, and the complaint of tedious evenings is one with which thousands sympathise. Englishmen do not go out so readily as Continentals, they do not, except in rare cases, enjoy conversation so much—in this respect workmen are far better off than their social superiors—and they are consciously dull; yet unless drawn by some pronounced and, in its way, irresistible taste, they rarely strive to give themselves a secondary occupation. If they can read, they are safe, imperfect as the English system of distributing books is, but the literary class would be astonished if they knew to how few reading is at once a secondary occupation and a recreation. The majority feel time a burden, with no true relief but sleep, a state of affairs all the more noteworthy because this majority not only works, but enjoys work. Any secondary occupation which could interest them would add directly to the pleasure of life, and to those who can appreciate it, or are even without the dislike of it which in many natures is almost unintelligibly strong, there is no such occupation quite equal to music. It is a sensuous pleasure, a spiritual pleasure, and a thoughtful pleasure, all in one, and unlike so many other occupations, makes no continuous demand upon time. To attain excellence, it is true, even with the flute—that melancholy instrument of so many Britons, who will not see that it is of all others the one in which imperfection is most trying—continuous devotion is indispensable; but far less than excellence can on many instruments give pleasure, and to the comprehension of music devoted study is not indispensable. The power is one of the few which does not decline with each intermission. There is no occupation which can be so taken up at intervals, none so cheap, none in which intermittent absorption can be so readily attained. A man may be genuinely devoted to music, yet neglect no duty of life, and provided he does not torture unwilling ears, need not be selfish, not even so much so as the devouring reader, whose occupation, though the modern world has conspired to praise it, is consistent with a most selfish self-absorption. The gain from such an occupation is endless, and the taste for it may be diffused to an almost inexplicable degree. Why it should, among people capable of it, remain latent, we cannot explain; but that it is so, is as certain as that the same peoples have displayed it in widely different degrees at different times. Fifty competent musicians, such as the Royal College will train from among those who accept its bursaries, will develop in fifty circles a musical taste which must have been there before, but found no spontaneous expression. That is well, for though we grow impatient of exaggeration till we have half seemed, in the beginning of this article, to depreciate music, we have no intention of denying its charm or of refusing to it this exceptional merit,—that it is impossible to acquire the power of apprehending the lower music without attaining the power of comprehending the higher. There is bad music, as we said, as well as good; but you cannot gain the capacity of understanding one, and remain dense as before to the other. The devotee of Offenbach perceives, as the un instructed do not, what St. Cecilia's music means; and in that new capacity there must be, though not elevation, a potentiality at least of being elevated.

ELABORATENESS.

THERE is one quality which artistic culture tends, we fear, to develop amongst us, as a great number of facts,—the Royal Academy dinners, for instance, among others,—testify more and more every year, which we do not think it is possible to regard with unmixed satisfaction, and that is, elaborateness. No one understands how either to speak or to paint elaborately, and how to speak and paint admirably in the elaborate style, better than Sir Frederick Leighton; but it cannot be denied that it is in an elaborate style,—a very elaborate style,—that his best performances both in painting and in speaking are achieved. His speeches at the Royal Academy dinners are models in that style. For courtly grace, for picturesque compliment, for his almost dramatic abdication before the most honoured of the speakers, for skill in proportioning his language to the expectations of his hearers, for artistic delineations of war, and for poetic tributes to heroism, it would be hard to find the equal of Sir Frederick Leighton's series of speeches. In proposing "The Army and Navy," for instance, he said—"It is not a human foe alone who tests the mettle of a man; in the flames of an African sky, in the shifting furnace of the desert sands, and in the ambush of putrid waters, may lurk a foe more deadly than the foe who broke before our arms at Tel-al-Maschuta or Tel-el-Kebir;" or again, in praising Lord Alcester and Lord Wolseley,—"Of Lord Alcester, then, what may I say? That alike in the long-forbearing pause before the day of action, on that day when at last, from Pharos to Marabout, he poured on the long, low line of forts the simultaneous thunder of his fleet, and in the swift and sudden seizure of the waterway to Suez, those qualities of tact, celerity, resource, and resolution which have made the seamen of England famous were conspicuously shown in this brilliant English sailor. Of Lord Wolseley, I may venture to say that both in its conception and in its carrying-out, his masterly campaign in Egypt has set forth in fresh distinctness that happy blending of breadth of view with precision of knowledge and that wise balance of restraint and daring, which belong only to the strong, and through which he has risen to so wide a fame." Or take the art with which he introduced Lord Granville, abdicating almost dramatically, as it were, in his favour:—"Well knowing that he" who precedes so great a master of happy words cannot too soon make way for him, I hasten to be silent." How swiftly he passed over the merits of the Lord Mayor, and how deftly he acknowledged the meridian fame of Professor Huxley and the rising sun of Mr. John Morley! But, like a true student of proportion, he reserved his most elaborate art for his reply to the toast of the evening, and especially for his delineation of the two great deceased artists who attracted so much attention in the winter exhibition of the Royal Academy. His picture of Linnell was almost blank verse:—"Him the tumult of white clouds delighted, and the blue riot of rolling hills, the red-ripe corn, and slopes brown and burnished, and the green forest's gloom. On his canvas the drowsy reaper nods beneath the sheaf, the shepherd pipes and watches, the new-felled timber strews the ground or strains the waggon's aching wheel." Of Rossetti, his portrait was hardly less ornate:—"A recluse, and yet a leader, so kindling and so contagious a fervour glowed within him, that to the intimate among his friends, who, now that he lies in death, live on in an after-glow of loving memory, it is scarcely yet given to gauge him and his work in the light of a dispassionate vision. To Rossetti's pencil, the outer inanimate world, unless, perhaps, it be the world of flowers, seemed to have little charm. But the contemplation of the soul's inner world, and of the storms and passions of the human heart and the workings of an imagination steeped in mysticism to the lips, these filled and absorbed him, and, be it in burning words or in burning colours, compelled expression on the canvas or on the written page." Well, all this shows, with a completeness which it would be difficult to surpass, that the President of the Royal Academy is as great a master of elaboration in speech as he is of elaboration in form and colour. But in the former Sir Frederick Leighton does not stand alone. Of the greatest poet and the greatest novelist of our generation,—Tennyson and George Eliot,—precisely the same might be said. Tennyson, with his own exquisite delicacy, has hinted to us how much it was his habit,—a habit he deprecated,—"to add and alter many times, till all be ripe and rotten;" and whatever else may be said of his poems, alike of the "Idylls of the King" and of the delicate little lyrics of sweet and tender regret in which he most excels, it may safely be said that they have a perfect elaboration about them which is often in the highest sense satisfying where elaboration seems to be in keeping with the feeling of the poem, but which sometimes produces the effect of a superfine touch and of a drawing-room atmosphere, where it is not. With George Eliot this applies rather to her reflective and analytic moods, than to her masterly pictures of homely character; but in the former you often see elaboration carried to an exhaustive point, and sink under the artificial analysis, irony, or melancholy, till you feel almost as if you were under the receiver of an air-pump. And in the great writers on Art,—even in Mr. Ruskin, with all his genius,—you feel the same note predominant, the note of elaboration. As for Mr. Rossetti and the votaries of passion to whom Sir Frederick Leighton referred, one may fairly say that though there is no manner of doubt about the passion, there is also no manner of doubt about the artificially self-conscious manner in which the passion is expressed. And this is what we find so oppressive about the atmosphere which Art prefers,—Art in the sense of composition, as distinguished from the love of beauty,—that it has a tendency to exorcise nature, and to make all men's thoughts and actions cohere in a purpose which, whether it be good or evil, affects us as painfully stiff, and as thoroughly ill-suited to such a creature as man, in whom set purpose, however wise, is a very poor equivalent for the abounding nature of the earlier world.

It seems to us that, though it is very well to have an art in life, in the sense of setting before us great objects which we pursue earnestly, so far as we pursue definite objects at all, it is a serious mistake to suppose that the whole of life can or ought to be reduced within the bounds of these set limits and purposes. Indeed, the more completely a man succeeds in elaborating his whole life to suit set purposes, the more completely he is likely to prove that he has had no purpose really worth elaborating at all. Nor is this, in reality, a paradox. We do not, in the least, mean to make light of great lives in which one high object seems a sort of inspiration,—such lives as Arnold's, or Maurice's, or Newman's, or Livingstone's. But then these lives are not lives elaborated by art at all, they are all governed by those imperious instincts or affections which are not elaborating, but rather inspiring agencies. The life elaborated by art is a totally different affair. Perhaps Goethe's is the most perfect type of it. In his life—especially after middle-age—almost every course of action was brought under the magnifying-glass of a self-conscious purpose, and worked-up into the most perfect and conscious keeping with those of his powers by which he set most store. We do not for a moment mean that Goethe, who was one of the greatest of the great, was an artificial talker or thinker. His mind was far too clear, far too keen, far too wide, for that. He was a poet by nature. And the thorough naturalism of his poetry was of the kind best suited to keep his mind free from anything partaking, however distantly, of affectation of thought. But in relation to the ordering of his life, he certainly brought what we may call the elaboration of self-culture into more prominence than any other teacher of our day, for he alone had the distinction requisite to give that elaboration a certain dignity.

"For he pursued a lonely round,
His eyes on Nature's plan;
Neither made man too much a God,
Nor God too much a man,"

says one of his greatest admirers amongst ourselves,—not very truly, we think, for Goethe undoubtedly made man too much a God, and especially made too much of a God of Johann Wolfgang Goethe. But Goethe certainly initiated the praise of a kind of artificial elaboration of culture and life, which has grown more and more into vogue in our modern days, a plan of trying to bring the whole of human thought and action into a great, harmonious whole of self-conscious purpose, a plan which is, in our opinion, pretty sure to banish nature effectually, without substituting for it anything half as healthy or half as safe. The truth is, that over-elaborateness is by no means suited to a being a great part of whose best actions are in some measure instinctive,—due, that is, to the instinct of genius, or the instinct of morality, or the instinct of love. In all these directions alike, over-elaborateness spoils instead of improving. The efforts of the highest genius are not artistically arranged. Carlyle was right about that. The truest morality is not reasoned out to its very foundations, and is sure to exhale in the process, even if a George Eliot attempt it. The noblest love is not self-conscious, and the more self-conscious love becomes, the more it tends to rottenness, as Rossetti's poetry proves. Art is good in its way, but it is a small way; and the fear for our generation is that it is every day encroaching on the proper sphere of genius, of conscience, and of affection.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

MR. BRIGHT ON THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In his latest deliverance on the Church of England, after a historical retrospect of former evil deeds almost antiquarian in its character, and marked by the spirit and temper familiar to us all, Mr. Bright addresses himself to the immediate present, and from the aspect of the Church to-day selects two points for special condemnation, on neither of which, oddly enough, does the Spectator say a word, in its interesting comment on the speech in question. These two are,—first, the form of thanksgiving recommended by the Ecclesiastical authorities after our successes in Egypt; and, next, the hostile attitude of the Church toward the threatened invasion of the law of marriage.

Now, as to the first point. After dwelling with his own unrivalled power on the horrors, the unutterable miseries of war, and of that particular war, Mr. Bright proceeds to pour out his indignation,—on whom? On the authors or kindlers of the war? On the Liberal Ministry? No; on the Church of England, whose only connection with the whole thing was the usual (almost formal) suggestion of the acknowledgment of divine goodness in the successful termination of hostilities; and success was unspeakably better than failure, at any rate! To any one not blinded by party passion, the attitude of Mr. Bright is a strange thing to contemplate. He asserts—let this be noted well—that the war was unnecessary. If so, it was an unspeakably wicked thing. All who provoked it, stirred it up, kept it up—above all, Mr. Gladstone and the Government—are steeped to the lips in "bloodguiltiness," and deserve the execration of every true man. But of all this, not a word. Not one syllable of blame for the authors of the war; but censure, keen and bitter, for those whose only offence was that they thanked God when the war was over.

Of the only other count in the indictment (surely a strangely light one!) it is only necessary to say that the fact is simply as stated by Mr. Bright. The overwhelming majority of English Church people do most certainly view the threatened permission to marry two sisters with disgust and dismay. But at this point it is to the article in the Spectator that one turns with some surprise. Passing over this portion of Mr. Bright's speech, as I observed, sub silentio, what you say, in a general way, is this:—The "speech on the Establishment proves to demonstration that the Church of England is not, and has never been, a reforming influence in the State." Do you mean this to apply to the instance specially selected by Mr. Bright,—that the proposed law on marriage is a reform, that the Church is wrong to resist it? If not—if, on the contrary, you share this feeling of repugnance and dread, if you feel that here, at least, the Church is wholly right—why not say so? But not only do you not say so, but the whole article is dreary and disappointing to a Churchman,—disappointing, on account of its cold tone and low level. For I venture to say that while all of us Anglicans agree in admiration of Mr. Bright's great gifts—and some of us sympathise with his political aims—yet not one of us cares one brass farthing for his opinions on the Church of England; whereas, we do care for the opinions of the Spectator.

With respect to the Conservative tendency which you attribute, and with reason, to the Church, this may be traced to one important cause, among others, on which, however, I do not venture to trouble you at present. But, in so far as this tendency is connected with its Episcopalian form of order and government, as you suggest, it may naturally be pleaded that a Church which is Episcopal must of necessity have Bishops.—I am, Sir, &c., H. J. V.

[Our view on the law against marriage with a deceased wife's sister has been often expressed. We believe that it is not a case in which the State ought to interfere, and that in many instances, especially among the poor, it does incalculable mischief by interfering. There is certainly no teaching of revelation on the subject, and this even the most candid of the opponents of the change admit. Whatever the more delicate social sentiments may suggest—and we have no doubt that natural and spontaneous feelings do exist which are averse to such marriages—the right rule is non-interference except on the plainest moral grounds, where so much serious evil is caused as is caused by the prohibition of such marriages.—Ed. Spectator.]

THE POLITICAL EFFECT OF DISESTABLISHMENT.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your article on Mr. Bright's recent speech on Disestablishment, you express the opinion that "the Episcopal Church, even if it were disestablished to-morrow, would in both its sections—its High-Church as well as its Evangelical section—remain, on the whole, a distinctly Conservative force."

May I suggest that you have forgotten a very material fact, viz., that, even supposing your view to be correct, the political power of the Bishops and the Clergy must of necessity be diminished by the loss of their present privileged position and legal powers, to say nothing of pecuniary resources derived from public endowments? And, in addition, it must surely be the case that the desire to retain all these, supplies a powerful stimulus to political activity, which would be wanting after the Church had been disestablished.—I am, Sir, &c.,

GEORGE ELIOT'S EXPRESSION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your correspondent's tribute to George Eliot's capacity of affection towards the individual is probably not exaggerated. Still, there was at times a something in her expression which, if it would not justify, might yet account for Miss Blind's description.

George Eliot's eye had usually a tranquil depth of garnered observation, but occasionally this positive expression passed away, and gave place to a look which could only be described as stony. This may have been no more than the retreat of the royal intellect within itself, and the severance, for the time, of its relations with the outer world. But I can well imagine that some who saw this look might have interpreted it to signify the coldness of cruelty. Cold, marble-cold, it certainly was, and taken in conjunction with the weariness of the face, it might have made even an acute observer doubt whether there were not moments in which human life in the aggregate seemed to her so little worth the living, that she might hardly have cared to take any active part to secure its continuance. And in this quality of mind there is, perhaps, what might be called the passive element of what, in its more active form, men call cruelty.

Of this feeling, there are surely traces in her writings. As you yourself say, when she was most herself her style was laboured,—it became then the painful reflection of the deep-seated, moral weariness which lay at the bottom of her nature; and it was only when she threw herself into some fictitious character that she could rise on the wings of fancy into a lighter and more loveable style. Whoever holds as a fundamental truth that human life is little better than a vast waste-heap of blighted possibilities will, however tender he may be towards the objects of specialised affection, yet naturally fail in that keenness of love towards all living which is the only certain safeguard against the subtler forms of cruelty. No one, it is true, enforced more uniformly than George Eliot the truth of duty to the race; but that this was a part of her philosophy, rather than of her nature, her own private history would seem to prove. Beneath her philosophy lay a heart feminine when stirred to tenderness towards the individual, but hopeless, and therefore, in a way, merciless, towards the race. The atmosphere of her works is the leaden atmosphere of fate, in which human frailty meets no mercy, and human longing can find no hope.

Her countenance was certainly of the type we associate with Dante. And who can read the works of the great Florentine without recognising the fact that there was in him, too, a certain impassiveness towards human suffering? A tenderer genius would have shrunk back appalled from the hideous scenes of the "Inferno," and the light of his poetry would have grown dim with horror. But Dante bears it all, not, indeed, without a passing shudder, but still with an inexorable steadfastness of purpose which proves the hardness of his moral fibre. No pang is spared, no nicety of torture is pretermitted; the whole ghastly catalogue of woes is gone through, to the last iota. Nay, and this is most significant, it is here that Dante, as a poet, is at his highest.

Such natures are objective; and all objective natures are, if not cruel, at least inexorable. For they look at things from the outside; life in the aggregate is to them interesting rather than loveable; the throb of human hearts is a scientific phenomenon; pity is but a mode of waste of power,—in a word, they may be sweetly, tenderly human towards their chosen loved ones, but they are extra-human as regards the race. Of such sort were Dante, Goethe, and George Eliot.—I am, Sir, &c.,

"SLAY AND EAT."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

"He that drinks the heavenly cup
Loveth downward, and not up."—EMERSON.

SIR,—Is it too late to say a few words on the Manichean interpretation which Mr. Footman puts on the command, which he calls divine, "Slay and eat"? If I accepted his interpretation, I should consider that I was imputing divinity, not to the Father, whom Jesus revealed to his followers by his own parental care of them, but rather to Moloch, or to "the crew of the 'Nancy' brig," or perhaps Antichrist would be a more appropriate title. For a being that fed on its children would be diametrically opposed to one who gave his life to sustain his children. Mr. Footman's grace before meat must be rather a stern and sad one if, when he sits down to carve a hare and to eat it, he says to himself, "That miserable object and its present visible fate is an emblem of me and my fate, which is to yield up my life, with the little stores it has accumulated, to enrich and nourish some higher life, that seeks not to draw it to itself by the cords of humanity, but to absorb it into itself." Both these religions, that of Christ and this of Antichrist, are based on the recognition of the fact that all living things stand in need of one another, and are irresistibly drawn towards a latent harmony, whose traction, acting on all living things, conscious or unconscious, like an unseen magnet, constitutes their living movement.

That traction which I have spoken of, which is incessantly compelling all living things (while they live) towards a closer interdependence, by making them hunger for one another, makes each living man a mere beast of prey towards plants, and towards these animals which have not as yet taken such hold on his sympathies that he would rather hunger than obey the voice that says slay and eat.

It seems to me that God reveals himself to us in his creative power, not in the voice of necessity, which seems to us to say, "Slay and eat." The divine voice, which we in our blindness thus interpret, really says, "Sustain life;" and all living things obey this command, sustain life according to their light. To a blind mollusc, nothing is alive; that is, it feels or sympathises with nothing but its own craving to cling to what yields it comfort. Every creature must be sensitive to its own wants and pains first, before it can sympathise with the pains and wants of others. The mollusc, and every creature in its earliest mollescent state, must be alive first only to itself; by-and-by, it becomes alive to its offspring, and lives in them; and this motherly love, though manifest first as a mere uterine affection, involves in it in embryo that charity which we are told, in the Epistle of St. John, that God is.

There is not a more insensate doctrine, or one more opposed to the spirit of Christianity, though it may seem here and there justified by the letter of it, than the duty of worshipping or deifying a being that either makes or tolerates evil. Plato, whom the world canonises as one of its greatest philosophers, I suppose, forbids us to identify what is necessary with what is admirable. Shakespeare says of life:—

"Thou art not noble,
For all the accommodations that thou bear'st
Are nursed on baseness."

Goethe says of Nature (meaning in that place living nature),—"I am not of opinion that Nature is beautiful in all her creations. Her intentions are always good, but the conditions of existence are not always either good or perfect."

Evil, it is true, may only seem to us so; but while it does seem to us so, it is our duty to fight against it. I grant that in Gloster's sense (Henry V.), "There is a soul of goodness in things evil;" but he did not mean to say that the French army, the evil he alluded to, was good to adore or to bow down to, but good to fight against. Modern infidelity owes what little moral strength it has to its being a reaction against the deification of necessary evils. Space only forbids my anticipating and answering ulterior difficulties.—I am, Sir, &c., G. D. SNOW.

MONACO AND THE BISHOP OF GIBRALTAR.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Permit me to say a word in defence of the Bishop of Gibraltar. He has not, as you suppose, refused to send, or sanction, a mission to call to repentance the gamblers and harlots of Monte Carlo. The promoters of an English Chaplaincy there have quite another object; and it is they, and not the Bishop, who hold that "the end" of the Church is to keep up an unreal "appearance of respectability." They say that vice is so well regulated at Monte Carlo that its decency is quite admirable. All their reasonings show that this outward decency is virtue enough for them; but for the sake of weak brethren, they desire that the vice should be made still more respectable, and so sanctioned, not denounced and attacked, by an English Church and Chaplain. They know, though you, Sir, doubt it, that there are plenty of our countrymen who will consent to ignore the vice with such sanction, but not without it. And then, what is at least one main object of the scheme, the price of land would go up, as in other parts of the Riviera, to a guinea a yard, or even double that. These promoters of English piety at Monte Carlo remind me of the mistress of the brothel who always had family prayers with her household.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE WORSHIP OF RANK.

SIR,—In "The Chimes," by Charles Dickens, are the lines:—

"O let us love our occupations,
Bless the Squire and his relations;
Live upon our daily rations,
And always know our proper stations!"

POETRY.

SONNET.

WHEN Philomel her evening psalm hath ceased,
 Whilst raptured Echo sinks to sleep again,
 And men return to consciousness of pain,—
 On glow-worms doth she solitary feast.*
 E'en so the Poet in his deepest breast
 Seeks for that mystic light which, not in vain
 Bestowed by Him whose wisdom, as his reign,
 Is boundless, leads to everlasting rest;
 And of this gift celestial weaves such charm
 As penetrates the clouds of earthly night,
 Stealing the souls of men from vain alarm,
 And Heav'n discloses to their erring sight,— Song born of light to light is turned at will,
 For poetry is silent music still. C. M. F.

LINES WRITTEN IN THE SOUTH OF FRANCE.

SUGGESTED BY MR. ARNOLD'S POEM, 'THE FORSAKEN MERMAN.'

SWEET singer of the sandy dunes,
 And oozy beaches glistening wet,
 Lo, here, methinks, 'neath Southern moons,
 Thy Merman lingers yet.
 Outstretched above the gleaming waves,
 He watches through the summer night,
 Or stables in the sounding caves
 His wild sea-horses white.
 They foam amid the fretted rocks,
 They toss and chafe and landward roar,
 And shake beneath their thunderous shocks
 The hollow, caverned shore.
 For here an ampler moonlight steeps
 A world of waters rolling white;
 And here the racing billow leaps,
 Sheer pausing on the height.
 And hidden caverns, breathing deep,
 Suck shuddering in the roaring wave;
 Then out again the smoke-wreaths sweep,
 And fountains spout and rave.
 Will nothing win thee, Margaret!
 And must thy Merman ever mourn;
 Nor e'er his mortal love forget,
 Of thy sweet eyes forlorn,—
 Through many a hundred years of life,
 In green, cool depths beneath the wave;
 While thou may'st rest from mortal strife
 Within thy quiet grave,—
 Thy grave upon the windy hill,
 Where all thy kinsfolk sleep, and where
 From the grey kirk sound murmurs still
 Of solemn-chaunted prayer?
 Nay, choose, fair Margaret. Yonder yet
 The foam-white horses plunging wait;
 Sways the green surge—they champ and fret—
 Ah, Margaret, come, though late!
 Oh, listen, listen! "Choose, sweet wife,
 Love, and thy children round thy knees;
 In wide sea-halls a joyous life,
 Untroubled centuries."
 For surely yet in yon white town,
 That strews its lights about the hill,
 Somewhere she stands, and gazes down
 Seaward, and weeps her fill;
 And over moonlit wastes of sea,
 And billowy ridges of the foam,
 Merman, she looks and longs for thee,
 For her dear babes, for home.
 Her sad eyes pierce the purple dark,
 And half enthralled by Ocean's spell,
 She hurries o'er the threshold. Hark,
 A silver-chiming bell!

* There is an old tradition that nightingales are supposed to feed on glow-worms.

From the grey kirk, where sleep the dead,
 Swings out the solemn, midnight sound;
 Shuddering, she sinks, and bows her head,
 Her dim eyes sorrow-drowned.

She lists the ancient call to prayer,
 She clasps the Book, she tells her beads,—
 Turn, Merman, turn, in love's despair,
 Thy wild, unwilling steeds.

They thunder in the echoing caves,
 They toss their manes, they linger yet:
 "Come down, come down, beneath the waves;
 Return, love Margaret!" L. I. L.

ART.

[SECOND NOTICE.]

MANY visitors to this Gallery will pause before Mr. Hale's "Venus and Psyche," and wonder at the artist's temerity in painting in so frankly unconventional a manner a subject of such difficulty, and perhaps danger. Our climate is a little uncertain, for Venuses; the freshness of Italian waters looks out of place in Bond Street. And in the chorus of critical reprobation which has been raised round this daring work, the virtuous, or fancied virtuous, feeling of its impropriety has been singularly manifest. Critics who stood without winking before the nude models whom Mr. Calderon and Mr. Van Haanen exhibit in this same gallery could find no words in which to describe their feelings at the sight of this Venus, who sits above the spectator, with a golden throne casting warm reflections upon her delicate limbs, revelling in the simple consciousness of power and beauty. It had not been worth while to mention this specimen of our critics' powers, were it not that it is rather hard upon the artist (Mr. Matthew Hale) that he should be condemned for what is really one of the merits of his work; harder still that he should be blamed for having sought beauty by its nearest and simplest road, on account of the suggestiveness of his critic's mind. The branding of an artist's work with the name of one of M. Zola's heroines, is a species of blame which is as immoral as the work from which it is drawn, and the insertion of such abuse is just one of those pieces of injustice which prevent artists from feeling any respect, or paying any regard to the critic's words.

Mr. Hale is a young English painter who has studied chiefly in France, under M. Carolus Duran, and has many of the merits and drawbacks of that painter. His work has all the lightness of touch, the ease, and the "chic" of the French school; it has also too much of the audacity, an audacity which verges upon insolence. In this picture he shows both his excellencies and his defects. He tells his story at once too plainly and too crudely, and he has carried his realism at once too far and not far enough. For instance, he has painted carefully the golden hue of the reflections from the throne upon the limbs of Venus, but he has left many details of Psyche's figure (the hair, for example) only just suggested. The result is, that the attention is drawn somewhat unduly to the painting of the nude figure, and that her nakedness somewhat overpowers the rest of the work.

We cannot spare more space to consider this painting, and have only dwelt upon it so long because it is well worthy of careful attention. We have not so many serious efforts at poetical and imaginative art, that we can afford to pass over such a brilliant attempt in that direction as this. Look, for another example of a picture which surrenders nothing to the popular favour, at Mr. George Wilson's "Arcadia" (219), a ring of dancers in a wooded landscape,—a picture, by the way, which merits a better place for its elaborate, delicate work, than that which the directors of the Gallery have been able to afford it. This is at the very opposite pole of Art to Mr. Hale's painting. It disdains method, as much as that artist cherishes it. So far from being done at once, it might fairly be described as never being done at all, for there is no reason why another year or two's work should not be added to that which has already been given. And if it is un-French in its minuteness, and its want of direct impression from Nature, it is no less so, in its aim at fullness of colouring, and in its Greek purity of spirit. In quality it has more resemblance to an old, classical fresco than to anything modern. Mr. Wilson's drawing has great merits and curious faults, but his power of colour is very great, and no less subtle than it is powerful. Portions of the landscape in this composition are singularly beautiful in this respect,—beautiful, too, with a minute, varied intricacy of colour such as is very rare, akin, perhaps, in some ways to the best work of Samuel Palmer, the old water-colour painter who died a year ago.

If we take our reader from Mr. Wilson's "Arcadia," to Mr. Richmond's "Miss Netty Davis," it is only for the sake of another contrast. A young lady in brown velvet is lying in a dully-green landscape, with an open book by her side, and a big dog at her feet. The dog and the landscape are conventionally bad, and may be dismissed at once. The lady, however, deserves careful attention, not alone for her beauty, though the face is a very sweet type of English loveliness, but for the power with which she has been portrayed. The painting is very broadly and powerfully executed, and especially good in its relation of tone, and the composition is treated with certain qualities of style derived from the study of the later Italian painters. It is quite the finest piece of work which Mr. Richmond has done, but it is worthy of notice that the approach to Nature in one way of this artist, is no nearer than that (in another) of Mr. Burne Jones. The colour of the landscape and the girl's flesh herein, is as simply conventional as any type of figure or limb which our pre-Raphaelite artist gives us; and if any of our readers will take the trouble to look first at Mr. Wilson's background to his "Arcadia," and then compare Mr. Richmond's background to Miss Netty Davis, he will see the difference between natural and conventional colouring. Note, too, that, despite its largeness of design, the picture is a little affected in its simplicity,—the whole smacks of get-up. We suspect the stage and the foot-lights.

Mr. Macbeth's "Sheep-shearing" does not show him at his best. The subject is, after all, rather an unpleasant one. A man wiping, with a very realistic fervour the sweat from his forehead, forms the main motive of the picture, and the figures grouped round have little special interest. Nevertheless, it is a strong, clever piece of painting, and, as usual in Mr. Macbeth's work, the figures have a stalwart manliness and womanliness which is refreshing. Contrast, again, with this Mr. Henry Holiday's rendering of "Dante meeting Beatrice" (165). A large picture this, with a view of Florence and the Arno for background, and two or three impossibly anatomical women in the centre of the picture. The figures are well placed in the landscape and carefully painted, but their drawing is singularly bad. The lower limbs of Beatrice are out of all proportion to her body, whilst the absurdity of showing the modelling of the form, as if it were nude, under a thick, red-velvet (or is it cloth?) robe, need hardly be insisted upon. Mr. Holiday means well, and his picture deserves praise for its seriousness of aim—but for little else. Underneath this hangs what is, after Mr. Millais' "Duchess of Westminster" and Burne Jones' "Little Boy," the best portrait work in the exhibition,—Mr. John Collier's triptych of his wife and her sisters. All three of these portraits are only of head and shoulders, painted against a creamy-white background. All are good, well drawn and carefully painted, and very lifelike. Indeed, with no great powers of design, and little appreciation of colour, Mr. Collier is at once the most thorough, and in his way the most skilful, of our young portrait-painters. He is, too, as faithful as a photograph. Those who care to see the painter himself, to study an artist "at home," will do well to look at Mrs. Collier's portrait, entitled, "An Artist at his Work," a picture which, though chiefly delectable to the family circle, is almost absurdly true to its original. The artist has a palette-knife in his hand, and a brush in his mouth, and an expression of "I'm going to have you now, with this lump of paint!" which is irresistibly comic and life-like. We acquit Mrs. Collier of all intention to burlesque her husband, but the result almost verges thereupon. Mr. Burne Jones has, in what is known as the East Gallery, a composition of six figures seated in a row upon a kind of dais, against a mountain background, and entitled, "The Hours." The object of the picture is not very clear, and we notice the work mainly to point out how, from working in the cold, almost monochromatic style of his later pictures, this artist is losing his hold upon real power of colour. The mass of the critics have noted this picture for its splendour of colouring; had they said for its attempted splendour, they would have been right. In truth, the picture aims at the old, gorgeous key, and fails utterly. Examine these women's robes from one end of the picture to the other, and you will not find a single piece of really fine colour, though the rainbow might be said to be well represented. The first robe is a bad blue,—a hard, crude blue, with a tinge of purple in its composition. The crimson next to it has undertones of purple in its shadows, and is poor in its lighter portions—the green is without brilliancy or quality. The reddish-orange and the light buff robes are simply negative, and the grey, which concludes the series, is an absolute and most objectionable lilac. Now, consider that this artist, up to four years ago, was the greatest colourist in England, perhaps in the world, and the pitiable result remains of neglecting a great artistic power which one possesses, in order to cultivate an alien quality.

ITALIAN BYWAYS.*

MR. SYMONDS'S candle is set upon a candlestick, and his light shines before men, so that it invites a closer criticism than would the brilliance of less confessed masters of prose, while the praise we should award to a new writer of his power is superfluous. But in closing his last volume, we feel that we are given a halfpennyworth of bread to an intolerable deal of sack, while we are reminded in every page how admirable is the provender offered to us. His own excellent words in one of these essays supply the text for our observations, at least in part:—

"The logical criticism of art demands that we should not only estimate the technical skill of artists and their faculty for presenting beauty to the æsthetic sense, but that we also ask ourselves what portion of the human spirit he (the artist) has chosen to invest with form, and how he has conceived his subject."

Though the slightest of his hitherto published prose works, this volume shows at once the extent and the limit of the author's power as it has not yet been shown. It proves him a suggestive critic, a keen-witted but near-sighted student of Italian annals, dwelling too lingeringly on their seamy side, and listening chiefly to the obscenities and the blasphemies which were the wild reply, as of fallen angels, to the serene sanctities of mediæval Italy. Admirable is his sketch of Webster's heroine, the "White Devil," Vittoria Accoramboni. The English playwright had, like Mr. Symonds,—

"Gazed long and earnestly into the mirror held up by Italy—that enchantress of the nations. Aghast and fascinated by the sins he saw there flaunting in the light of day—sins on whose pernicious glamour Ascham Greene and Howell have insisted with impressive vehemence—Webster discerned in them the stuff he needed for philosophy and art. Withdrawing from that contemplation, he was like a spirit 'loosed out of Hell to speak of horrors.'"

But the author of Italian Byways can hardly claim to give his readers, as he says Webster does, "the moral impression made by the condition of Italy on a northern imagination," rather he treats the revolting stories of Vittoria and of Lorenzino de' Medici, the "cinque-cento Brutus," as subjects for somewhat dilettante art, likely to interest certain curiosities of our society, and for which he can paint as background, landscapes ostentatiously pagan in sentiment. His is hardly Webster's spirit, when he reiterates examples of crime, selecting with deliberation the fleurs du mal whereof to weave his garland of beautiful phrases. We do not trace in his work the moral revolt of a "northern imagination," though of revolt there is enough. The last sonnet of his latest book of poems is, indeed, in praise of Prometheus. The last sentence in Italian Byways winds up a dream of the Titan with the sentence, "'This is Prometheus,' I whisper to myself, 'and I am alone on Caucasus.'" Yet Mr. Symonds frequently, though unconsciously, reminds us how little he has to do with the agony of Prometheus; rather does he sit as high as he may on Parnassus to be worshipped, determined that we should observe the sunshine on his brow.

In dealing with the mémoires pour servir of Italian personages, Mr. Symonds excels all contemporary artists. His literary appreciations are precious, but he is less agreeable when he condescends to personal narrative. His experiences of gondolier society and Davos amusements are disappointing, but it is when he mounts his Pegasus, and goes forth in ostentatious search of the picturesque and the romantic in landscape, that he is least admirable. What he sees is wonderful, but what he fails to see is yet more wonderful. His former works prepare us for much "invincible ignorance" of the better aspects of Italian history, but we feel a certain shock of surprise that in the very presence of Monte Cassino, St. Benedict's home, he should say :—

"Monasteries are almost invariably disappointing, to one who goes in search of what gives virtue and solidity to human life, and even Monte Cassino was no exception. . . . The atmosphere of operose indolence, prolonged through centuries and centuries, stifles; nor can antiquity and influence impose upon a mind which resents monkery itself as an essential evil."

Yet, that Mr. Symonds feels that his judgment is narrow, we observe, when, immediately after, he exclaims :—

"I longed for the spirit of Montalembert. I longed for what is called historical imagination, for the indiscriminate voracity of those men to whom world-famous sites are in themselves soul-stirring."

When, however, it is a question of gorgeous crime gorgeously housed and of the iridescence of corruption, Mr. Symonds shows no lack of the "historical imagination." Can it be that, great as is his sympathy with beautiful form, his criticism of spiritual phenomena, the mediæval monastic life, for instance, is narrowed by that besetting modern envy described by Théophile Gautier as essentially bourgeois, which decries all splendour not our own, and all judgment that is not "private"? The thoughts that for most men are suggested by many an Italian shrine are as distasteful to Mr. Symonds as to a Puritan would be the Venus of the Louvre, and it would be as wise to take a Puritan's account of the treasures of the Belvedere, as Mr. Symonds's opinion of Benedict or Francis, Philip Neri, or Carlo Borromeo, and the world they created alongside of the world he vividly portrays. Meantime, he is an unsurpassed guide in the palace of Urbino, and to follow him in Umbria, and by the Adriatic and Tyrrhene sea, is to feel somewhat of the Italian spell. Quite lovely passages of rhythmic prose translate adequately the emotions which arise in presence of almost any wide prospect of the Circæan land, as, for instance, when he writes of the view from Monte Pulciano :—

"The charm of this view is composed of so many different elements, so subtly blent, appealing to so many separate sensibilities, the sense of grandeur, the sense of space, the sense of natural beauty, and the sense of human pathos, that deep internal faculty we call historic sense, that it cannot be defined. First comes the immense surrounding space,—a space measured in each arc of the circumference by sections of at least fifty miles, limited by points of exquisitely picturesque beauty, including distant, cloud-like mountain ranges, and crystals of sky-blue Apennines, circumscribing landscapes of refined loveliness in detail, always varied, always marked by objects of peculiar interest where the eye or memory may linger. Next in importance to this immensity of space, so powerfully affecting the imagination by its mere extent, and by the breadth of atmosphere attuning all varieties of form and colour to one harmony beneath illimitable heaven, may be reckoned the episodes of rivers, lakes, hills, cities, with old historic names."

We have not space to give his brilliant catalogue of the towns and castles he saw from thence, but our readers will recognise the beauty of what we have quoted, and in it there is not that excessive luxuriance and almost confusion of colour which are not infrequent in Mr. Symonds's descriptions of landscape. We feel that to many it will seem a literary heresy to question the perfection of his style, but no man may dash his palette full of colours into his reader's face with too impetuous a disregard to the due limitations of prose. By so doing, Mr. Symonds disturbs our enjoyment of his work, and he provokes us to compare his descriptions with those, let us say, by Mr. Ruskin. He obliges us to say that brandish his brushes as he may, strike what Olympian attitude he chooses, he fails when he should not fail to affect us. In this book, at least, his dainty essays appeal to an artificial taste. Critic, but not creator, he does not rouse our sympathy, and we remain unimpressed, as we measure his efforts to remain at the highest level of style. To rank with the monarchs of the pen needs larger knowledge of a healthier humanity than is apparent in Italian Byways.

Though to compare prose with poetry is scarcely fair, we imagine that Mr. Symonds would not shrink from comparison with Wordsworth or Shelley, and even Byron; if we did so compare him, we should note a difference amply justifying severer criticism than ours. We could but regret the airs of superior information which he assumes as he goes to and fro on the spiritual battlefields of Italy, and announces himself as the mouthpiece of the pseudo-Pagan Renaissance, which has just now a certain vogue. We are fascinated by his historical narratives, but when he would gain our friendliness by his records of travel, he should attach us to him by some touch of nature which should make us feel akin, before he startles us by such rhythmic confidences as "we rested well in large, hard beds, with dry, rough sheets," an innocent sentence, but to which is given a touch of bathos by its immediately following the description of a sunset which was "a conflagration of celestial rose upon the saddest purples and cavernous recesses of intensest azure." We do not follow him with any sympathy when, at a table d'hôte, he tells us that he "felt as though he had got into the cabin of the 'Flying Dutchman,' and that all these people had been sitting there at meat a hundred years, through storm and shine, for ever driving onwards over immense waves in an enchanted calm." We cannot think the description of a Duke of Urbino happily expressed :—"He drew a second consort from the convent, and raised up seed unto his line by forethought, but beheld his princeling fade untimely in the bloom of boyhood." Granting the admiration many feel for Mr. Symonds, we hardly think that for the public he should pose as Dante when he begins a chapter of his travels :—"About three in the morning which divides the month of May into two equal parts, I woke and saw the waning moon right opposite my window, stayed in her descent upon the slope of Epomeo."

Shade of Puff, are we to approve such sentences as, "When it was over, he shrugged his shoulders, wrote his magnificent apology with a style of adamant upon a plate of steel?" Are we to think of a boatman as an "animate splendour," and rise with the author into rapture about another, who had been "drinking and eating from a dish of fried fish set upon the coarse, white, linen cloth." "Here for me, at least, the mythopoeism of the Lagoons was humanised; the spirit of the salt-water lakes had appeared to me; the final touch of life emergent from nature had been given. I was satisfied, for I had seen a poem." It is scarcely necessary to observe that Mr. Symonds has little, if any, sense of humour; and to read travels by an eloquent writer without that gift is disappointing, but still his literary instinct might have suggested that only when the reader's emotions are deeply stirred, and hardly even then, could he accept such phrases as the "road plunges at a break-neck pace," or "careering in our sledges down perpendicular snow-fields." We might not have cared to point out the exaggerations which mar that artistic perfection of which Mr. Symonds writes so well, but for the prevalent tendency to admire mannerisms and affectations as such. We are glad to turn from his less good work, and quote an excellent answer to the vexed question of what Art is and should be, when he analyses Cherubino's part at the Scala Theatre, and explains why that pretty page is "the dear, glad angel of the May of love, the nightingale of orient emotion." We entirely agree with and admire the passage with which we conclude :—

"When we think of the really great statues, pictures, poems, music of the world, we find that these are really great because of something more,—and that more is their theme, their presentation of a noble portion of the human soul. Artists and art-students may be satisfied with perfect specimens of a craftsman's skill, independent of his theme, but the mass of men will not be satisfied; and it is as wrong to suppose that art exists for artists and art-students as to talk of art for art's sake. Art exists for humanity. Art transmutes thought and feeling into terms of beautiful form. Art is great and lasting in proportion as it appeals to the human consciousness at large, presenting to it portions of itself in adequate and lovely form."

Mr. Symonds here supplies a canon of taste whereby to judge his Italian Byways.

TWO GOOD NOVELS.*

WE bracket these two novels, because in both there is the same peculiarity. Each must be judged as an intellectual effort, by its author's treatment of a single character. Mr. Trollope's first posthumous novel—we believe there are others to come—differs from the ruck of his novels only in this, that he has endeavoured to use a very singular character as his deus ex machina. "Mr. Scarborough's Family" and their friends are for the most part very ordinary people, less carefully described than was Mr. Trollope's wont; and their adventures, though readable, are described at too great length. Mountjoy Scarborough is a fierce, sullen officer, who thinks a great deal of himself, has a lunatic passion for gambling, and to pay his gambling debts has parted with his reversion to his father's estate, worth £20,000 a year, to the Jews. His brother Augustus is a cool, keen barrister, remarkable mainly for selfishness, which he parades in a way no real personage would do. There is the regular young lady of Mr. Trollope's stories, with little to distinguish her from Lily Dale, except that she is fortunate. There is a hero who knocks a man down, and does very little else. There is a weak, but conscientious lawyer, Mr. Grey, with an elderly daughter, also conscientious, but very strong, who is perhaps the best painted figure in the book. And there is Mr. Scarborough, the deus ex machina, who is, so far as our reading extends, absolutely original. He is a very old man, very rich, but stricken with some terrible internal complaint, for which repeated operations are indispensable. He meets them and all other troubles with that perfect courage which cares nothing for death and very little for pain, and indeed with a nearly complete disregard of self, which is insisted on throughout the book as his grand characteristic. The old man, however, is no Christian, quite the reverse. He has at heart a profound contempt for all authority; admires lying, if it is only skilful; doubts the value of marriage, is little annoyed by any conduct not the evidence of cruel character, and hates mere human laws till it is a delight to him to break them. Finding that his eldest son has sold his reversion, he coolly sets himself to cheat the Jews of their gains; declares his eldest son illegitimate, proves that he was born before the marriage ceremony, and helps his second son, now the heir, to pay off the Jews with the bare money that they had advanced. This done, he finds that the second son is a selfish scoundrel who desires his death, while the elder, though haughty and violent, is furious at the slur thrown upon his mother. Old Mr. Scarborough thinks him, after all, the finer character of the two, and though aware that the passion for play is incurable in him, turns round on the second son, brings forward a certificate of an earlier marriage ceremony, leaves everything to the elder, tells the younger in a burst of hatred of his revenge, and so dies, in Mr. Trollope's opinion, evidently rather a fine character:—

"He had contrived in spite of his great faults to create a respect in the minds of those around him which is itself a great element of love. But there was something in his manner which told of love for others. He was one who could hate to distraction, and on whom no bonds of blood would operate to mitigate his hatred. He would persevere to injure with a terrible persistency. But yet in every phase of his life he had been actuated by love for others. He had never been selfish, thinking always of others rather than of himself. Supremely indifferent he had been to the opinion of the world around him, but he had never run counter to his own conscience. For the conventionalities of the law he entertained a supreme contempt, but he did wish so to arrange matters with which he was himself concerned as to do what justice demanded. Whether he succeeded in the last year of his life the reader may judge. But certainly the three persons who were assembled around his death-bed did respect him, and had been made to love him by what he had done."

The secret of his life was that, despising entails, he had from the first determined to do as he liked with his property, and had persuaded his wife to go through two wedding ceremonials, in order that by producing either certificate, and deceiving everybody, he might divide his fortune between his sons as he would. The sale to the Jews deranged his plans, but he immediately robbed them of all but the cash they had advanced, and went his own wilful way.

We cannot say we think such a character possible. With Mr. Trollope's view of its merits we are not just now concerned, but we cannot think it possible. That an unselfish man might plot against the law of entail, and blind himself to the fact that he was thieving, is, of course, possible, and the robbery of the Jews would to many minds seem no robbery at all; but that an unselfish man with a strong capacity of love in his heart should plot through life for such an end, intending from the first to traduce his wife, merely to have the satisfaction of breaking a law he despised, should then, when he had traduced her, upset his own work, and should finally leave everything to go at Monte Carlo, as it actually does go, is incredible. We have to believe that a man without the most ordinary human feelings is yet hungry for love, that a man persistent enough to plot villainy for thirty years gave up his plot the moment it turned out badly, that a man entirely cynical and defiant was yet guided in his acts mainly by a keen appreciation of the relative goodness of two very bad men, and that, finally, a man always indignant at cruelty, was when provoked, utterly cruel and unforgiving. That is impossible. The description is in parts fine, you catch the impression of a powerful Voltairian personality; but Mr. Trollope had not thought-out his new character fully, and Mr. Scarborough is, therefore, from first to last a mere bundle of discordant qualities, which are hidden a little by the writer's art, but are always there, and always affecting the story in some unexpected way. The portrait, on which the novel depends, though, of course, there is plenty of amusing writing, must be pronounced a failure.

Mr. Norris, on the other hand, has succeeded. His story, No New Thing, is a very curious one. We have great difficulty in doubting that he has studied life for artistic purposes in novels, instead of reality, and has amused himself by taking Dobbin and Amelia from Vanity Fair; Mr. Bennett, with alterations, from Pride and Prejudice; and Tito, from Romola, and placing them in new situations and among new people. At all events, Mrs. Stanniforth is Amelia, in prosperous circumstances; Colonel Kenyon is Dobbin, unchanged; and Philip Marescalchi is Tito, in modern dress and English scenery. He has even his Tessa, a pastry-cook's daughter, whom he marries. Nevertheless, though it is impossible to resist this thought, Mr. Norris's work is not to be despised. Tried by the test we have applied to Mr. Trollope, he has succeeded. He has written a good novel, as novels go, with some life-like description in it and much entertaining dialogue, and one or two life-like side characters—witness Mr. Brune, a goodnatured Mr. Bennett, who would not discredit Miss Austen—and among them all he has placed Tito—Philip Marescalchi—and so guided him that the reader, even if he has absorbed Romola, feels no sense of failure in the portrait. It is difficult work, too. Philip Marescalchi is an Anglo-Italian lad, adopted by Mrs. Stanniforth, the young and wealthy widow whom we think copied from Amelia Osborne. She educates him, sends him to Cambridge, finds him over-liberal allowances, and loves and trusts him all through with a motherly love which is wonderfully described, though all through he calls her Meg, and treats her as an elder sister. Philip repays all this by becoming the pleasantest of mankind, and a singer of second-rate force; by neglect, lying, gambling, and plunder; by marrying secretly a pastry-cook's daughter, a Tessa whose English vulgarity in her loveableness is a stroke of genius; by trying to oust his foster-mother from her property; by publicly marrying, after Tessa's death, a fat, old prima-donna with money; and finally, by refusing to visit his patroness, when he knows that she is dying. A most detestable brute? Certainly, judged by any code; but, nevertheless, Margaret Stanniforth loves him all through, and you like her the better for it; his friends do not desert him, and the reader feels for him in his strong contempt an admixture of pity and of liking. The man is throughout visible as he is, not a brute, not a complete villain, not a coward, and incapable of visible cruelty; an artist lost in a gentle, self-pitying, "sweet" kind of selfishness. He loves to the end the pastry-cook's daughter, whose death he feels a relief. To the end, the being he cares most about is the foster-mother whom he has so ill-treated, whom he refuses to visit on her death-bed, and who dies moaning for him, and excusing his hopeless selfishness. He never is ruffianly or sordid, does not trick Tessa, does not conceal any fault, and has a certain ultimate truthfulness always in him, which makes his inward nature worse, but his outward nature better. We knew Philip once, intimately, and he was just like that. So sound is the art with which he is portrayed, that the reader feels all through that the man is not villain, that he is in some way the victim of his nature, a nature artistic and amiable, but incurably selfish and shallow, and that were circumstances but favourable, Philip would be as nearly a pleasant gentleman as an incurable habit of lying when convenient will allow. He never once, unless it be in refusing to visit his foster-mother's death-bed, does or says anything in the least exaggerated or unexpected. His naughtiness is economised, till the spectator half thinks it does not exist, and that he is forming an uncharitable judgment on a man very hard bested. This is the sort of way in which the man who will not perform any one duty, if it goes in the least against the grain, meets a direct insult. Colonel Kenyon has told him he is robbing his protectress:—

"'Colonel Kenyon,' said Philip, in a rather graver tone, 'you have always had the worst possible opinion of me, and you are heartily welcome to it. Pray believe that your opinion is a matter of the most absolute indifference to me. More than once you have taken upon yourself to interfere in my affairs in a helter-skelter, blundering sort of way, and I haven't complained. It is your nature to be like that, I suppose, and I don't quarrel with you for it, any more than one quarrels with dogs for delighting to bark and bite. Perhaps, however, it would be pushing forbearance too far to allow oneself to be called a wholesale robber; and therefore I must respectfully invite you to retract that expression.'—Hugh was stroking his moustache with lean, brown fingers, which trembled a little. At this direct throwing-down of the gauntlet his eyes glistened. 'I won't retract a single word that I have said,' he replied, shortly.—'You won't?' returned Philip, deliberately swinging his legs off the sofa, and assuming a sitting posture, while he looked his visitor straight in the eyes. 'You won't retract the expression? Then we must proceed to extremities, I'm afraid. I thought perhaps you might have insulted me without quite meaning it, for your temper seems to have got rather out of hand; but, since you choose to stick to your words, I can only ask you to give me your address, so that I may send a friend to call upon you to-morrow."—"You young jackanapes!" called out Hugh, "do you suppose I am going to fight a duel with you? I'll see you hanged first!"—Philip raised his eyebrows. "You won't fight, and you won't retract? I suppose you know what is generally said of a man who acts in that way?"—"I'll tell you what," said Hugh, getting up; "I won't fight a duel, because it's ridiculous, and nobody ever does fight duels in this country; but if you would like to call me a coward, you had better do it—and I'll give you such a hammering, that you won't do it again for a year."—Philip did not take advantage of this handsome offer. He looked at his angry antagonist for a minute with a certain amused curiosity, and then burst out laughing. "What a ludicrous position we have got into!" he exclaimed. "We both look rather foolish; but, vanity apart, I must say I think you look the more foolish of the two. My height is five foot nine; yours, I suppose, is about six foot two or three; and in weight and length of reach there is probably an even greater disproportion between us. Therefore I see nothing to be ashamed of in acknowledging that, if it came to a regular ding-dong tussel between us, you could thrash me. But I think it is just possible that there may be something to be ashamed of in insulting a man whom you know you can thrash, and declining to meet him upon equal terms."

Redeeming touches like that are endless, till at the end the reader half feels that the fat prima-donna—who, by the way, is a good creature—is almost penalty sufficient. Mr. Norris has the art of analysing character in a high degree, and, after all, that is the novelist's first need. No New Thing is full of very human people, of whom only one is certainly a caricature. Mrs. Winnington's hardness, and imperiousness, and scheming greediness are overdone, as in the final scene between her and Mr. Brune the author has recollected, but most of the personages are natural throughout. A little more incident, to relieve a certain tediousness, would be acceptable, and we could bear a little more compression as to time, though in this matter Mr. Norris can plead Thackeray's example, but there is unmistakeable capacity in his work. He has given us a striking story, and left a strong impression that he will do still better, perhaps even rise into the ranks of the very few who can satirise without rendering the object of their satire unloveable. The greatest danger in his way is Thackeray's, the unreadiness to believe that nice women can have sense. Mrs. Stanniforth is feeble, Nellie Brune is a fool in crises, the pastry-cook's daughter is a fool always till she dies, and Edith is a fool whenever her mother is about. Women are not all like that, and Mr. Norris's impartiality in making most of his good men, Kenyon, Walter, Tom Stanniforth, and the rest, as weak as the women, in a different way, does not redeem the blunder.

PROFESSOR KNIGHT'S WORDSWORTH. VOLUME III.*

OUR appreciation of Professor Knight's edition of Wordsworth grows with every volume. Indeed, when completed, it will be an edition which the student of Wordsworth would not exchange for all the others put together. In familiarising himself with this third volume, the present writer has found himself not indeed actually reconciled to the poet's baldest lines—for no lover of Wordsworth can help regretting the violent and obtrusive flaws in that great imagination, where Wordsworth's poetry declines not merely into prose, but into prose of the flattest kind—but in some degree helped to understand how it was that Wordsworth could ever have been unconscious of those clumsy deformities of speech to which he sometimes seems positively to invite attention, even at the very opening of a poem. In this volume, for instance, we find the stanzas addressed to "Mr. Wilkinson's spade," commencing, "Spade with which Wilkinson hath tilled his lands," an absurd invocation, which has probably repelled as many readers from Wordsworth and his poetry as ever were repelled from Mr. F. W. Newman's Iliad by such lines as (if we recall it rightly) "Autolycus held up the meat, divine Ulysses sliced it." To break at once on the reader of a poem with the vocative case of 'spade,' and then describe the spade so addressed merely as one that belonged to a gentleman of the name of Wilkinson, is indeed to indulge in one of those familiarities with the reader which we can hardly distinguish from a practical joke. It is something of the nature of a burlesque to invoke a spade at all, and still more to invoke it simply on the ground that it has been used by Wilkinson, the reader knowing nothing of Wilkinson but his name. But one almost forgives Wordsworth his clumsy burst of invocation, when one has read what Professor Knight here tells us of the Wilkinson in question, and realises that it was because Wordsworth already knew the man, and knew him to be invested with these simple and touching and manly qualities, that this invocation never suggested to him that effectual wet blanket for a kindling imagination which it has represented to so many of his readers:—

"Thomas Wilkinson of Yanwath, the friend of Wordsworth and the subject of these verses, deserves more than a passing note.

He was a man
Whom no one could have passed without remark.

One of the old race of Cumbrian statesmen—men who owned, and themselves cultivated, small bits of land (see note on Michael and The Brothers in appendix to Volume II.)—he was Wordsworth's senior by nineteen years, and lived on a patrimonial farm of about forty acres, on the banks of the Emont,—the stream which, flowing out of Ullswater, divides Cumberland from Westmoreland. He was a Friend, and used to travel great distances to attend religious conferences, or to engage in philanthropic work,—on one occasion, riding on his pony from Yanwath to London, to the Yearly Meeting of the Friends; and, on another walking the 300 miles to town, in eight days, for the same purpose. A simple, genuine nature; serene, refined, hospitable, naïve, and humorous withal; a quaint, original man, with a true eye for Nature, a keen relish for rural life (especially for gardening), and a happy knack of characterisation, whether he undertook descriptions of scenery in the course of his travels, or narrated the incidents which befell him in the way. This is how he writes of his farm, and his work upon it:—"We have at length some traces of spring (6th April, 1784); the primrose under the hedge begins to open her modest flower, the buds begin to swell, and the birds to build; yet we have still a wide horizon, the mountain tops resign not their snows. The happiest season of the year with me is now commencing—I mean that in which I am at the plough; my horses pace slowly on before, the larks sing above my head, and the furrow falls at my side, and the face of Nature and my own mind seem to wear a sweet and cheerful tranquillity." The following extract shows the interest which he took in the very implements of his industry, and may serve as an illustration of Wordsworth's stanzas on his 'spade.' 'Eighth month, 16th, 1783. Yesterday I parted without regret from an old acquaintance—I set by my scythe for this year. I have often this season seen the dark blue mountains before the sun, and his rising embroider them with gold. I have had many a good sleep in the shade among fragrant grass and refreshing breezes, and though closely engaged in what may be thought heavy work, I was sensible of the enjoyments of life with uninterrupted health.' In the closing years of the last century, when the spirit of patriotic ardour was so thoroughly roused in England by the restlessness of France and the ambition of Napoleon, he lived on at his pastoral farm, 'busy with his husbandry.' In London, he made the acquaintance of Edmund Burke; and Thomas Clarkson, the philanthropist,—whose labours for the abolition of the slave-trade are matter of history,—became his intimate friend, and was a frequent visitor at Yanwath. Clarkson afterwards bought an estate near to Wilkinson's home, on the shores of Ullswater, where he built a house, and named it Eusemere, and there the Wordsworths were not infrequent guests. (See note to The Daffodils, p. 7 of this volume.) Wordsworth stayed at Yanwath for two days in 1806. The 'Tours to the British Mountains, with the Descriptive Poems of Lowther and Emont Vale' (London, 1824), have been referred to in the note to The Solitary Reaper, one of the poems in the 'Memorials of a Tour in Scotland, 1803' (see Vol. II., p. 347). It is an interesting volume—the prose much superior to the verse—and might be reprinted with advantage. Wilkinson was urged repeatedly to publish his 'Tour Through the Highlands,' but he always declined, and it was printed at last without his knowledge, by some one to whom he had lent his MS. (Wilkinson's relations to Wordsworth are alluded to in the note to The Solitary Reaper. He is occasionally referred to in Miss Wordsworth's Grasmere Journal of January and March, 1802, e.g.:—"Monday, March 12th.—The ground covered with snow. Walked to T. Wilkinson's, and sent for letters. The woman brought me one from Wm. and Mary. It was a sharp, windy night. Thomas Wilkinson came with me to Barton, and questioned me like a catechiser all the way. Every question was like the snapping of a little thread about my heart. I was so full of thought of my half-read letter and other things." The following are extracts from letters of Wilkinson to Miss Mary Leadbeter of Ballinore:—"Yanwath, 15. 2. 1801.—I had lately a young Poet seeing me that sprang originally from the next village. He has left the College, turned his back on all preferment, and settled down contentedly among our Lakes, with his Sister and his Muse. He writes in what he conceives to be the language of Nature, in opposition to the finery of our present poetry. He has published two volumes of Poems, mostly of the same character. His name is William Wordsworth." In a letter, dated 29. 1. 1809, the following occurs:—"Thou hast wished to have W. Wordsworth's Lines on my Spade, which I shall transcribe thee. I had promised Lord Lonsdale to take him to Lowther, when he came to see me, but when we arrived he was gone to shoot moor-game with Judge Sutton. William and I then returned, and wrought together at a walk I was then forming, which gave birth to his Verses."

This account of Mr. Wilkinson does not in any degree atone for the much more than flat opening to what are, on the whole, exceedingly flat stanzas, but it does help one to understand how Wordsworth may have invested his friend with an atmosphere of individuality and simplicity which disguised from himself how little he had succeeded in telling the public what he too easily took for granted that the public would infer from his own halting lines. So, again, when we know that his sister, Dorothy Wordsworth, suggested the following lines, we can in some degree pardon Wordsworth for supposing that they would convey to the outer world what was clearly in his own mind, though it certainly never got into the verses:—

“LOUISA,

AFTER ACCOMPANYING HER ON A MOUNTAIN EXCURSION.
Comp. 1805. Pub. 1807.

I met Louisa in the shade,
And, having seen that lovely Maid,
Why should I fear to say
That, nymph-like, she is fleet and strong,
And down the rocks can leap along
Like rivulets in May?

She loves her fire, her cottage home;
Yet o'er the moorland will she roam
In weather rough and bleak;
And, when against the wind she strains,
Oh! might I kiss the mountain rains
That sparkle on her cheek.

Take all that's mine 'beneath the moon,'
If I with her but half a noon
May sit beneath the walls
Of some old cave or mossy nook,
When up she winds along the brook
To hunt the waterfalls."

Dorothy Wordsworth was so much to her brother, was, indeed, so indissolubly associated with all the poetry that was deepest and truest in him, that he probably hardly knew how much of his own intense feeling for her he had introduced into his verse, and how much of it remained quite unexpressed in his own breast. The deadly-lively stanza which opens the verses just quoted would suggest nothing in the world to an ordinary reader except the query, "Why, indeed, should you fear to say it? but that is no reason at all why you should not fear to publish so very pert a verse as that;" and though the two next verses rise to something better, they do not succeed in extinguishing the unpleasant impression of the opening verse. But, knowing, as we now know, all that Dorothy Wordsworth was to her brother, we cannot doubt that what he wrote concerning her was to his mind invested with a specially glorifying atmosphere of feeling, even when he did not succeed in sufficiently steeping his own words in that atmosphere of feeling, and therefore failed to impress his thought on the mind of the reader.

And that reminds us how much the value of this volume is increased by its extracts from Dorothy Wordsworth's Journal, a journal full of the essential poetry which breathed in the noblest of her brother's verse. We know few poems of his which are more perfect and more buoyant with genuine poetical delight than "The Daffodils," but even the poem on "The Daffodils" grows in beauty and value, when we have this marvellously lovely description by his sister of the scene which suggested it:—

"The following is from Miss Wordsworth's Journal, under date, Thursday, April 15th, 1802. It is a specimen of the general character of that Journal. 'It was a threatening, misty morning, but mild. We set off after dinner from Easmer. Mr. Clarkson went a short way with us, but turned back. The wind was furious, and we thought we must have returned. We first rested in the large Boat House, then under a furze bush opposite Mr. Clarkson's. Saw the plough going in the field. The wind seized our breath. The lake was rough. There was a boat by itself, floating in the middle of the bay below Water Millock. We rested again in the Water Millock Lane. The hawthorns black and green; the birches here and there greenish, but there is yet more of purple to be seen on the twigs. A few primroses by the roadside—wood-sorrel flower, the anemone, scentless violets, strawberries, and that starry-yellow flower which Mrs. C. calls pilewort. When we were in the woods beyond Gowbarrow Park, we saw a few daffodils close to the water-side. We fancied that the sea had floated the seeds ashore, and that the little colony had so sprung up. But as we went along there were more, and yet more; and, at last, under the boughs of the trees, we saw that there was a long belt of them along the shore, about the breadth of a country turnpike road. I never saw daffodils so beautiful. They grew among the mossy stones, about and above them; some rested their heads upon these stones, as on a pillow for weariness; and the rest tossed and reeled and danced, and seemed as if they verily laughed with the wind that blew upon them over the lake. They looked so gay, ever glancing, ever changing. This wind blew directly over the lake to them. There was here and there a little knot, and a few stragglers higher up; but they were so few as not to disturb the simplicity, unity, and life of that one busy highway. We rested again and again. The boys were stormy, and we heard the waves at different distances, and in the middle of the water, like the sea."

But it is not in extracts from Miss Wordsworth's Journal only that this edition is so rich,—though it would be impossible to exaggerate the value of these illustrative extracts. Everything we want is here. For example "The Waggoner,"—one of Wordsworth's most delightful poems, and as Sara Coleridge well said, one touched off with a lightness and spirit which Wordsworth very rarely attained,—was dedicated to Charles Lamb, and the dedication acknowledged in one of Lamb's most charming letters, which, of course, one wants to read at the time one reads the poem, and not to have to hunt up in Talfourd's Memoir. Professor Knight appends it for us. Again, when Wordsworth lost his brother,—the captain of an Indianman,—by shipwreck, Mary Lamb wrote to Miss Wordsworth to express her tender sympathy, and the beautiful letter, with its simple and touching verses, is quoted by Professor Knight in an appendix to the poems which Wordsworth wrote on the occasion of his brother's death. And so it is all through. Whatever one needs to illustrate the poems is found either in Miss Fenwick's notes, or in the editor's, or in the appendix.

"The Prelude" gains less in proportion by Professor Knight's notes than the minor poems, and for a very good reason, that Professor Knight reserves for the volume of biography what he has to say on this great autobiographical poem. To that volume, —the sixth and last, we believe, of the series,—we shall look forward with the most vivid interest. It will, we hope, form the fitting crown of a work of great and lasting value, a work in which the individuality of a great poet is made to illustrate his poems in a manner more complete, than any in which it has ever been the good-fortune of a previous critic to illustrate the poems of the author to whose works he had devoted himself.

MR. JOHN SKELTON'S NEW ESSAYS.*

To readers with a delicate literary palate, anything from the pen of Mr. John Skelton, better known to all of us as "Shirley," is of the nature of a bonne-bouche. It would be difficult to analyse the charm of Mr. Skelton's work, but it is doubtless largely due to the fact that he never writes upon any subject until his emotions have been stirred by it, and the stirring of emotion is in him one with the awakening of the imagination. He muses till the fire burns, then he speaks with his tongue, and such speech cannot but be attractive at a time when nearly all the literature of the class to which these papers belong comes so obviously "from the teeth outward," as Carlyle so pertinaciously put it. Imaginative criticism is not merely critical, but constructive; and in many of these papers we do not simply get a new "view" of this or that historical or literary figure, or merely see the familiar form posed in a way which gives it an unfamiliar expression; the portrait itself is new, it is a fresh conception, which demands to be judged not by the judicial reason, but by the judicial imagination of which it is the outcome. Let us take, by way of example, the most elaborate and, in some respects, the most important paper in this volume, "The Speech for the Queen," as Mr. Skelton has entitled his defence of Mary Stuart:—

"Mary was not a person likely to come under the sway of a violent and absorbing passion. Her whole nature was masculine in its moderation, its firmness, its magnanimity. She was tolerant, uncapricious, capable of carrying out a purpose steadily, yet with tact and policy. She was never hysterical, never fanciful. With her, love was not an engrossing occupation; on the contrary, to Mary, as to most men, it was but the child and plaything of unfrequent leisure. She admitted Rizzio to a close intimacy. Rizzio was her intellectual mate, the depository of her State secrets, her politic guide and confidant; but the very notoriety of her intercourse with him showed how innocent and unsexual it was in its nature,—the frank companionship of friendly statesmen. Her marriage with Darnley was not exclusively a love-match; it was a marriage to which her judgment, as well as her heart, consented. Her love-letters abound in pretty trifles, her business letters are clear, strong, rapid, brilliantly direct. A love-sick girl, when her castle in the air was shattered, might have come to hate Darnley with a feverish feminine hatred; but the sedate and politic intelligence of the Queen could only have been incidentally affected by such considerations. She knew that, even at the worst, Darnley was a useful ally, and the motives which induced her to marry him must have restrained her from putting him forcibly away. Bothwell, again, was in her estimation a loyal retainer, a trusted adviser of the Crown, but he was nothing more. He had been recommended to her acceptance by the unanimous voice of the aristocracy, Protestant and Catholic. As the honest Craig observed, 'The best part of the realm did approve it, either by flattery or by their silence.' On a woman of ardent sentimentality these considerations would have had little effect; they were exactly the considerations which would appeal to Mary's masculine common-sense."

In these sentences we see what it is in Mr. Skelton's method which makes it so fresh and attractive, and yet now and then so tantalising also. Such questions as whether Mary signed the Catholic League, whether she were privy to the murder of Darnley, whether she really had a passion for Bothwell, so long as they are argued out along the old lines, have now little interest, save for historical specialists; but a novel reading of Mary's character changes the value of every piece of evidence, and every question becomes practically new. Of course, we have not space to discuss the credibility of Mr. Skelton's portrait; we only wish to draw attention to the way in which his imaginative revolt against tradition—a revolt which is certainly not merely whimsical—gives another lease of life to a controversy which had all but died of inanition. There is the same freshness, the same imaginative integrity, in Mr. Skelton's portraits of Claverhouse, of Dryden, of "the great Lord Bolingbroke," of Charles Fox, as we see him in the essay entitled, "From Chatham to Canning," and of Lord Beaconsfield, whose character and career seem to have for Mr. Skelton a peculiar fascination. He can build up a character from a hint, from a saying, from an anecdote, in the same way that Professor Owen can build up an extinct animal from a tooth or a fragment of bone. Just as Burke formed his opinions like a fanatic and defended them like a philosopher, so Mr. Skelton constructs an image with his creative imagination, and then vindicates its vraisemblance with the foot-rule and compasses of fact and inference.

From the arc he completes the circle; and perhaps the one defect of his portraiture is that it is rather too rounded, too symmetrical, more symmetrical, at any rate, than real men and women are wont to be,—that there is in it a too obvious lack of the inconsistent things, the incongruous things, the incredible things, as we should call them were they not there, which make life varied and interesting. Still, in spite of some defects in the method, Mr. Skelton has his successes. We may agree or disagree with his estimate of Bolingbroke, but we feel how realisable it is; and we feel, too—a feeling which counts for much—that the writer is striving to be true, rather than to be effective. It is, again, much easier to believe in Mr. Skelton's Dryden than in Lord Macaulay's, if only for the reason that the former is more like a human being than the latter; and whatever be doubtful about Dryden, one thing is certain,—that he was a man. Even the essay on Disraeli is, on the whole, one of the most satisfactory things that has been written about the deceased Tory leader, and it probably is so because Mr. Skelton really felt for his hero that affection which alone enables one man fully to understand another; but it would have been more satisfactory still if the eulogist had kept his instinct for symmetry a little more in check. Mr. Skelton is angry with Disraeli's other biographers and critics, because they have adopted a tone of apology:—

"We have apologies for his early Radicalism; we have apologies for his conduct to Sir Robert Peel; we have apologies for his economical heresies; we have apologies for his Reform Bill; we have apologies for his foreign policy. That is the tone, for instance, which his eulogist in the leading journal adopts. If all these apologies were necessary, it is difficult to understand what is meant by the universal sorrow and sympathy that have been expressed, not only in England, but over Europe. Treated in this way, the character of Disraeli loses its picturesque identity; any credible likeness of the man in his habit as he lived becomes impossible,—what we get is a mere caput mortuum. I believe (and I have enjoyed some rather unusual facilities for forming an opinion) that there is, throughout that remarkable career, from the point of view of the man himself, an essential consistency."

There is, of course, a sense in which we may say of any career that it exhibits an essential consistency, meaning that there must be some kind of harmony among all the diverse manifestations of any single nature; but when we accuse a man of inconsistency, we mean that his action at one part of his life and his action at another part of his life have no recognisable common ground other than self-interest, and stand in visible antagonism to each other. To deny to Disraeli's career this kind of inconsistency would be childish; and indeed his peculiar greatness seems to us to lie in the skill with which he improvised his life, calmly considering each situation on its merits, and making the very most of it on his own behalf. He did not, indeed, care to repeat himself, he had a passion for surprises, and the fantastic vindications of his consistency in which he sometimes indulged were simply meant to keep his followers together, at times when their bewilderment imperilled their fidelity. Still, though we think Mr. Skelton is at fault in making for Disraeli a claim which Disraeli would never seriously have made for himself, his estimate, as a whole, seems to us full of insight, and may be specially commended to the perusal of militant Liberals who are wont to appraise the Conservative statesman in a somewhat too rough-and-ready manner. Here, for example, is something which is true and worth remembering, though likely enough to be forgotten:—

"It is to be noted that while he was moved by the jeers and taunts of his foes, he was always able to resist—what is far more difficult to resist—the reproaches of his friends. He had to 'educate' his party up to his own level, and full-grown men do not take their education easily. There can be no doubt, for instance, that a large majority of the Tory squires shared the opinion of Mr. Gladstone,—that Jefferson Davis had created a people. But Mr. Disraeli remained incredulous; he had no belief in the creative force of anarchy; the unity of America was an idea that appealed directly to his imagination; and, when the secret history of these years is written, it will be found that his firmness mainly contributed to the preservation of friendly relations with our kinsmen across the sea."

Mr. Skelton makes a curious blunder, however, in his explanation of the reason why Mr. Disraeli kept on the right side. Mr. Disraeli's imagination was not in the least possessed by the idea of the unity of America. He expressed his belief, in a most effective speech, that the continent of North America was undergoing the process of being broken up into competing States like those of Europe, though he declined to commit his Party to either side in the conflict.

Of the twenty-four essays in this volume, we have mentioned only a few, and those few, with one exception, all belong to the historical section; but the literary papers, particularly those on Blake, Macaulay, Thackeray, and Charlotte Brontë, are delightful reading. There is nothing "intense" or "subtle" about them, but still less is there any trace of self-sufficient Philistinism. They are full of a refined and sublimated common-sense, with a fine graciousness of touch which testifies to a warm heart and a quick imagination. The essay on Macaulay seems to us one of the truest things ever written of a great writer who, at one time the object of ridiculous and unmeasured praise, has of late had to run the gauntlet of rather inconsiderate and reckless censure. We will only say of Sir Noel Paton's head of Mary, Queen of Scots, which forms the frontispiece, that it is very characteristic, very beautiful, but utterly ridiculous as a portrait of the Mary of Mr. Skelton.

ITALIAN ART IN THE NATIONAL GALLERY.*

THIS is a valuable book, but it is not one adapted to the general reader, for the style is dry and wanting in charm; and besides, he would probably find it rather bewildering reading, from the mere fact that the plan of the work does not allow of much detail or elaboration of subject. Dr. Richter does not write for the general reader, he specially addresses the art student; and it is from this point of view that the book must be considered. His object is to give a history of the Italian schools as illustrated by the pictures in the National Gallery, and he combines therewith a rapid sketch of the rise and fall of Italian art. The Florentine pictures of the fifteenth, the Umbrian school of the end of the fifteenth and beginning of the sixteenth centuries, and the Venetian school of about the same period, are those best represented in our National collection. There is, perhaps, out of Italy, no picture gallery which affords equal facilities for becoming acquainted with the development of these particular schools. There are also excellent examples of the Ferrarese, the Veronese, and Milanese schools. The development of Italian painting, from its first efforts to free itself from the Byzantine tradition to the glories of the Renaissance, can be studied here as a whole, as well as or better than in any other collection on this side of the Alps; but whoever wishes to obtain a thorough knowledge of any local Italian school can only do that in Italy, as most of the greatest works were executed in wall paintings, and still remain on the spot:—

"There is, however, in the national collection, a small number of pictures which, to a certain extent, enable us to trace the great connection between some painters in the particularities of their styles. To these we shall have to pay particular attention, because they are the only evidences here at hand of the organic and, at the same time, spontaneous continuity so characteristic of artists of the classic Italian schools."

Dr. Richter has adopted what he calls the modern scientific, or so-called experimental method in criticism, in contradistinction to that which was chiefly founded on subjective and artistic predilection. He considers it almost presumptuous on the part of writers on art to take on themselves to teach their contemporaries, as well as coming generations, what styles and kinds of pictures they should consider beautiful, and what they should like and dislike. Therefore, he does not allow any other basis on which to discuss advantageously the questions concerning artistic productions, except a thorough investigation of the works of art themselves. Naturally, the first question to be decided is their genuineness, and in order to be able to decide this, careful investigations of the individual style of every master must be made, "and we have to take into account not only his general conception and the tone and harmony of colours used by him, but also his rendering of details, and especially the manner in which he represents single parts of the human figure."

There is no doubt about it that fashion, terrible fashion, does influence even the appreciation of pictures, and it is, moreover, a most difficult point to decide exactly how far we each and all take our tone from it. Indeed, it is almost impossible to judge exactly how far we are acted on by any influence. Therefore, a question may be raised as to how much unqualified good the art student gains by a close study of the painters we indiscriminately class together as the "old Italian masters," both those painters before Raphael and those of the Renaissance with whom the strong, passionate feeling for nature, according to modern views, holds so little place. Though perhaps not unqualified good, we cannot but hold the opinion that in the hurry and rush of modern life, where people seem only to ask for amusement and excitement, a close and reverential study of those "old masters" must raise the tone of the artist and lead him to true feeling and noble thought, and so lift him beyond the trivial aims and small ambitions of modern painting, where the love of mere technical skill seems now to reign paramount. No fashion can ever rob these Italian masters of the exalted place they have held for generations, through their glorious colour, and more especially through their grandeur of sentiment and elevated feeling.

Dr. Richter's book will probably lead the student to further studies, and will form an admirable nucleus round which he will be able to collect ever more and more knowledge of the Italian schools, whenever opportunity offers. It is full and comprehensive, and gives us, as clearly as is possible in such a condensed form, the various complicated ramifications of the different schools. The casual observer would, perhaps, be surprised at the interest in the whole progress of Art which is created in the mind of the student by tracing the influence which one painter has on another. For instance, not many will have given probably more than a cursory attention to the two large altar-pieces by Piero della Francesca, in room thirteen, for they are not particularly attractive to the untrained eye. But when led by Mr. Richter to recognise in them the influence of an earlier painter, Uccelli, they assume an individuality which instantly clothes them with interest. First, we are introduced to Uccelli as the first representative of the scientific and realistic tendencies in painting, and in his pictures, as well as in his private life, he appears to have been the regular professor. Vasari, in his life of him, explains that, his efforts being chiefly directed to the problems of perspective, his style was in consequence "of a dry and angular hardness, which is a very common result of too close a consideration of minute points." We do not see, however, much proof of Uccelli's love of perspective and foreshortening in his picture in the Gallery. His most ardent follower was Piero della Francesca, who studied at Florence, but neither tradition nor documents tell us the name of his master. In the years 1439 and 1440 he worked with Domenico Veneziano, and this statement has led to the belief that he was Piero's master in painting. Dr. Richter, however, shows us that a totally different conclusion is to be drawn from a study of the above-mentioned altar-pieces:—

"It was the Commendatore Giovanni Morelli, the celebrated connoisseur, who first pointed out the striking affinity of style between the landscapes of Piero's pictures and those of Paolo Uccelli. It is therefore very probable that Piero was a pupil not of Domenico Veneziano, but of Uccelli. The peculiar construction of these landscapes, with steep mountains of an uncommon type, is more remarkable, because they are the starting-point of all the later achievements in realistic landscape painting. The background of the picture No. 665, representing the baptism of Christ in the River Jordan, is especially instructive in this respect. The tops of the mountains appear reflected on the surface of the river in the foreground. In the middle distance there is an extensive valley, with a foreshortened view of a street leading to a fortified town. The landscape in the second altar-piece, No. 908, representing the Nativity of our Lord, is not less rich in combination of picturesque details. The painting is said to be unfinished, but the assertion is probably an error. Even minute details, such as the pearls on the robes of the Virgin, have been worked out with an accuracy which excites astonishment. One of the two shepherds, standing on the right side and seen in front, appears to have no pupils to his eyes, and this strange fact might account for the theory of the unfinished state of the picture. On the other hand, it seems to me to have suffered very much from repainting in all the flesh parts. The drawing of the features of the singing angels is entirely out of proportion. So are the toes and some of the hands,—faults which are common with picture-restorers. It would be certainly unjust to impute such errors to the hand of so gifted and conscientious a painter as Piero. The restorer has, I believe, forgotten to paint in the pupils of the shepherd's eyes, after having destroyed them by the cleaning of the original picture. Generally, the most tenderly and carefully executed parts of a picture—namely, the flesh parts—suffer most under the hands of picture-cleaners. A fully convincing evidence of this regrettable fact is Piero's picture No. 665, where the destroyed parts have not been subjected to restoration. Two portraits of ladies in the same room are said to be by Piero. . . . No. 758 was ascribed by Commendatore Morelli to Uccelli, and the reasons which he brings forth for this can easily be verified by comparison with the above described picture by that master; the treatment of the hair recalls that of one of the portraits in the battle picture, while Piero used to represent curls in a thin and thread-like shape. The ornament on the left sleeve of the lady also reminds one of the decoration on the standard of Uccelli's picture."

The history of the Florentine painters is treated at greater length than any others. After showing the inadequacy with which the early Siena and Florentine Schools are represented in the Gallery, and after touching on the different aims of those early artists, Dr. Richter enters more fully into the characteristics of their successors. In examples of these the collection is very rich. He classes these painters in a way which may seem arbitrary to some, but which cannot fail to be instructive. He gives a chapter to each class, and works out the differences and resemblances in an interesting and useful way. There is a chapter on the early realistic painters of the Florentine school, another on the artists of the Florentine quattrocento following dramatic tendencies, and, again, on those of plastic tendencies. The next chapter is on Florentine colourists of the cinquecento, then one on Michel Angelo, and, finally, on the decadence of Florentine art. There are but few pictures of the Umbrian school in the national collection, but they are, fortunately, by the most prominent of their painters. There is little of moment to be learnt about the early painters of this school, whereas there is much detail and discussion to interest every one in the account of later painters, and in those of Ferrara. There are magnificent works of both the Paduan and Veronese schools. In the chapter on the Venetian quattrocento colourists, the question of the introduction of oil painting into Italy is discussed, and Vasari's testimony on the subject is questioned. There is a chapter on the cinquecento Venetian painters, another on the schools of Brescia and Cremona, one on that of Milan, and a final dissertation on the decay of the Italian school of painting. Here, however, it must be confessed that any difficulty there may be in the subject has been avoided by the easy remedy of ignoring it.

Where the value of the book as a whole is so great, it is perhaps ungrateful to carp at want of style; but still, where one meets occasionally with such an awkwardly constructed sentence that one remains in doubt as to Dr. Richter's meaning, it cannot be passed quite without notice. For instance:—"The charm of naïveté which Lippi succeeds so well in impressing on the features of his saints is always confounded with a worldly expression, and this romantic poetry places his representations of sacred subjects beyond the realm of pure religious art." Is "confounded" here a Germanism? We suppose he means that Lippi's saints have an expression of romantic, poetical, worldly love on their faces. Of the photographs which illustrate the book, it is impossible to speak with too high praise. They are simply beautiful, and thoroughly well chosen to illustrate this history of painters. There are also numerous wood engravings and etchings, which are fairly well done, but which naturally appear only inadequate representations by the side of the "heliographs." They are of use, however, in helping us to call to mind the different pictures. In conclusion, we must add that for those who do not wish to make an extensive study of the subject, Dr. Richter's Italian Art in the National Gallery will serve admirably as a guide and book of reference, pointing out what is best worth considering, and leading us, perhaps unconsciously, to a more intimate acquaintance with the pictures than can be readily gained by the usual superficial way of "doing" a picture gallery. The book will be found the more valuable now that the late Mr. Wornum's catalogue is out of print, for the present one is condensed away into truly pitiable, scanty proportions.

HERALDS OF THE CROSS.*

MISS ARNOLD-FORSTER has done a greater work than she is probably at all aware; the words she has prefixed to her description of

* Heralds of the Cross. By F. E. Arnold-Forster. London: Hatchards, Piccadilly.

Captain Allan Gardiner's work might not inaptly be applied to her own: "I was given a seed to plant, and when most I loved it, I was bidden to bury it in the ground; and I buried it, not knowing I was sowing." The results of much patient and evidently much loved labour are buried in the modest volume before us, but we are very much mistaken if they do not take new shape and life in the hearts and lives of hundreds of readers. "Exeter Hall is dead,"—granted; but that for which Exeter Hall under a thousand distorted forms strove, the manifestation of the power of a living Christ, lives still. There is a passing fashion to believe that it is wise and well to smile contemptuously at the very name of "Missionary work," the words to many minds suggest only the shibboleth of a narrow creed, or still narrower culture. There could scarcely be a greater mistake. After many years of careful observation on this very point, the present writer unhesitatingly believes that a child intelligently interested in the work going on in the great spheres of Missionary labour has a broader foundation for further knowledge to grow upon than (we had almost said) in any other form of education whatever. To take one or two points only, a child so interested is at least removed from that main difficulty in the way of all true mental growth, the absorption of the mind in "the miserable aims which end with self,"—an absorption which may be quite as complete at one end of life as at the other. Then it is an enormous gain to know, with a knowledge not barren, but pregnant with thoughts which must bear fruit in action, the geographical insignificance of this island of ours, to early realise that the European civilisation is but one of the civilisations of earth, that the Maker of this little world must have some designs other than those we daily grasp when He made every third man a Chinaman; these and co-relative facts widen the mental horizon. To understand that everywhere the intuitive conscience of mankind is one, while yet the individual never rises above his ideal, to find, to put it briefly, that one touch not of nature, but of Christ, doth make the whole world kin, goes far to kill insular prejudices, and merge them in a wider brotherhood, a more extended citizenship; and these results, we contend, are the legitimate outcome of the insight afforded by a careful study of the work of Christianisation going on in all parts of the globe. "But does it go on?" "A handful of men here and there, perhaps, out of a whole empire, and these little or nothing the better," is the constant observation of those who simply do not know. And it is just here we think that Miss Arnold-Forster may find she has accomplished a good deal. Her work has all the strength and all the charm of great simplicity and most careful accuracy, and while written professedly for children, her narrative will, we do not doubt, be read by hundreds of others in whose hearts it will awaken, in many cases perhaps reawaken, a keen interest. But her subject is a wide one, and our limited space will only allow us to glance at one or two of the main features of it. The writer lays no claim to originality, she has collected the facts she narrates from all available reliable sources of information, has studied very carefully that remarkable little atlas issued by the Church Missionary Society (an atlas we commend to the attention of the readers of the volume before us), and for her own part has simply the gift, not a universal one, for telling her story well. Whether taking her young readers to the heart of Africa, to the cities of India, or to the islands of the Pacific, they will at least while listening find themselves there, and be the wiser for their visit.

Few of us read unmoved the news of the death of Coleridge Patteson, the martyr-bishop of Melanesia; but the story of his life, as Miss Arnold-Forster tells it in these pages, may send more than one Patteson into the same field. It is difficult by any extracts to give an idea of the true nature of the work going on in the islands in which he laboured. The narrative needs to be read as a whole; and so is it also when passing from this subject to the wide fields of China or Japan, of Africa or India. The story of Buddha has a chapter to itself, and is graphically told, so that the mind even of a young, intelligent child might grasp at least some of its meaning, while all its beauty and all its sadness are but another call to show to the people a more excellent way. We should, perhaps, differ from the writer as to her exact estimate of the influence of Buddhism in the world, but that is a question in philosophy upon which we are not called to enter. The possible future of the millions to whom Buddhism is now a faith, when the despair which is its very root shall have given place to a living hope, is fairly indicated. The way in which natural cowardice disappears under the influence of a living faith, comes out very strongly in the history of some of these millions when first convinced of the truth of Christianity.

But perhaps we cannot better indicate the lines on which the whole narrative is laid than by following it in one direction to which public attention has recently been so specially drawn. We mean the case of Madagascar. Even while we write, the latest news of Madagascar lies under our eye in the Times newspaper; and we find Mr. Peill, in a paper read before the Society of Arts, detailing the rapid, "almost precocious," social development of the Malagasy people. Compulsory education prevails in the island, we read, and "the conversion of the Malagasy to Christianity—a religion adopted by them with much sincerity and intelligence—has unquestionably struck the death-blow to the institution of slavery, while the further construction of roads and the opening up the material resources of the country are matters which would more speedily be taken in hand, if the ruling race were better assured as to their immunity from foreign invasion." So writes Mr. Peill; and yet in the early part of this century, less than seventy years ago, the first Christian missionary visited this island, "the third largest in the world, four times the size of England," and found it full of fierce idolaters. For ten years the Christian missionaries found a welcome in the island, then King Radama died, and Ranavalona, one of the worst queens who ever lived, succeeded him, and a time of persecution ensued, and the Missionaries had to leave the country; but first they had succeeded in translating the Bible and The Pilgrim's Progress into Malagasy, copies were circulated in secret from family to family, and when after a reign of thirty-five years Ranavalona at last died, and the country was once more open to the Christian foreigner, "the Christians, so far from having become fewer in number during the persecutions, were found to be twenty times more numerous when the Missionaries came back to the island than they were when their first teachers were driven out." And to these people, as to so many others, Christianity means a higher national as well as individual life, the promise of the life that now is as well as that which is to come.

To turn to another spot, Miss Arnold-Forster leaves Sierra Leone out of her history, because its advanced Christian condition has made it already so well known, yet we imagine not many of her readers will be aware that the Bishop of Sierra Leone "oversees" a field of labour extending over 1,560 miles of sea-board, with an almost limitless and densely populated area beyond. Little more than sixty years ago, Sierra Leone was a heathen land. The census of 1881 registers in the colony 35,400 souls as liberated Africans and their descendants; there are 60,546 souls in the colony, of whom nearly forty thousand are Christians. In Lagos, the same work is beginning to manifest important results; but it is useless to multiply instances; the whole subject is one which demands the most careful study and attention. Miss Arnold-Forster has given us in her little book abundant evidence of the value of the work that is being carried on, so quietly that the non-observant take no heed of it, but which carries with it a vital force, which is slowly, but surely, influencing whole peoples.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

MAGAZINES.—Good Words.—This month's instalment of Mr. Beant's tale is most amusing. The French Professor's reflections when he comes into a fortune, and the "valedictory oration" which, by permission of the schoolmistress, he delivers to his pupils, make excellent fun. Among other good papers, which fully maintain the high standard of the magazine, we may mention "The Green Corn," one of Mr. R. Jefferies' instructive articles on rural things; the second part of an account of the Paris workmen, "The Ouvrier at Work," by Mr. R. Heath; a sermon on "Progress and Poverty," by the Rev. C. W. Stubbs (the sermon was preached before the University of Oxford, now, perhaps, the most appreciative audience in England of advanced social teaching, as, fifty years ago, it was the most hostile); and "The Central-Asian Desert," by Professor Arminius Vambery. Mr. Frederick Lansbridge, who is winning his way steadily to a place among the poets of the day, contributes a ballad, "Sent Back by the Angels," which, however, seems to us scarcely one of his happiest efforts.—Aunt Judy's Magazine continues to show the same sympathetic appreciation of what children really like, that has won for it so much favour in the past. "Convalescence," the quaint piece with which the number begins, is something that all little invalids should have read to them. The romantic history of Cervantes furnishes the subject of an interesting article, and there is a good natural-history paper on "Fish Out of Water," with curious details of the peculiarities which enable some species to live and even to move out of their natural element.

—Forestry (Rider and Son) gives us the first number of a new series, edited by Mr. Francis George Heath, a gentleman who has done excellent service in many ways to English trees and woods. The practical and the æsthetic aspects of the subject are both dealt with, and that, as far as we can judge, in a satisfactory way. Nor is general agriculture neglected. Mr. D. Sym Scott, for instance, writes on "The Stall-feeding of Cattle," giving his opinion strongly against roots as a winter food. If turnips could be banished, how all eaters of butter would rejoice! There is a notice of the reforestation scheme in Ireland. We wish the magazine in its new form all success.

—The Theatre. Edited by Clement Scott. (David Bogue.)—The first article in this number, "Talma, and the Dramatic Art," would be better, if it told us a little more of its subject. Some sketch of Talma's books would have been interesting to many readers. There is a sympathetic notice of the last performance of "Caste;" criticism of the principal dramatic performances of the month, and a variety of notes on kindred matters, make up an interesting number. The two photographs, Miss Eastlake and Mr. Forbes Robertson, are good. The poetry, of which there are three specimens, seems to be above the average of magazine verse.

The Bantoffs of Cherryton. By Arthur Kean. (Smith, Elder, and Co.)—This book states on its title-page that it is a story without a villain or a crime. That is perfectly true; and if it had added also that it is destitute of any study of character, of human nature, of plot, or anything worth reading, it would have defined itself still more accurately. Its people act, speak, and think as no living men and women would be likely to do; its moralisings are sometimes of the common-place cynical and sometimes of the gushingly sentimental order; its English is not always correct; its so-called high-class gentlemen and ladies appear ignorant of the ordinary usages of society,—as, e.g., when one of them introduces a peer's son to a lady with the words, "Permit me to present to you Lieutenant the Honourable Horace Varleigh;" and it is decidedly dull. Unwilling to give a needlessly harsh judgment, we have sought carefully to discern some redeeming point that might counterbalance the manifold faults and sillinesses of the work, but the search was to no purpose. Perhaps the chief sign of grace about the book is that its author has, at all events, sufficient good-sense to wish to hide her identity under a feigned name, for we think there can be no question as to the female sex of "Arthur Kean."

The Parthenon Frieze, and other Essays. By Thomas Davidson. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—Mr. Davidson's first essay is one of real importance. He seeks to show that the subject of the Parthenon Frieze is not, as is now commonly supposed, the Panathenaic procession, but a "Panhellenic thanksgiving sacrifice,"—a conception of Pericles, never actually realised. The great Athenian proposed, somewhere about the middle of the fifth century B.C., a convention at Athens, "for the restoration of the temples burnt down by the Barbarians, for the performance of the sacrifices which the Greeks owed to the Gods, in fulfilment of the vows which they had made when entering into conflict with the Barbarians; and, finally, for the preservation of the security of the sea and universal peace." So Plutarch tells us. His real object, so at least Sparta thought, was the union of all Hellas under the hegemony of Athens; and the Dorian States held back. Mr. Davidson sees in the two processions of the frieze—and it seems clear that there is more than one—the representatives of the Ionian and Dorian cities respectively, each coming to pay honour to its own group of gods. We give no opinion on the merits of the theory, but must say that it is persuasively set forth. The second essay deals with "The Group of Gods on the Base of the Olympian Zeus," the third with "The Pelasgic Wall of Athens." The object of the fourth is, as far as we can make it out, to bring the "Cedipus Tyrannus" out of the region of heroic life into that of every-day humanity. Mr. Davidson would have us see in the three principal characters of the drama "a weak, sentimental, well-meaning despot, a prosaic, strong-minded, robust woman, and a Jesuitical churchwarden." It is not a happy effort of criticism, or a pleasing specimen of style. What in the world does the writer mean by "the half-squeezed, spongy realism" of Euripides?

A School Course of Heat. By W. Larden, M.A. (Sampson Low and Co.)—This treatise combines, within moderate limits, an elementary text-book for beginners, with lessons for advanced classes. Equal attention is paid to the experimental and to the theoretical aspects of the subject. The illustrations are freely introduced, and if not new, are for the most part appropriate. Here and there we may meet with statements which are not quite in accord with the latest experimental results (as in the sections on "absorption," pp. 257, et seq.) Again, we may object to the usage and definition of such terms as "force" and "weight" (pp. 270 and 271), but the book will, we think, supply the want of a suitable class-book on the subject of Heat for our public schools.

The Constitutional History of England from 1760 to 1860. By C. D. Yonge, M.A. (Marcus Ward and Co.)—Professor Yonge's compilation is to be welcomed rather on account of the importance of the subject and the need of some such work, than on account of any addition it makes to our knowledge, or of any valuable judgments it contains on constitutional history. He has been diligent in consulting authorities, he is temperate in statement, cautious in conclusions, and devoid of literary merit. The result is that the book is unattractive to beginners and disappointing to students. It would, however, be unfair not to acknowledge that he has included within moderate compass an amount of information not easily obtainable elsewhere, and that his book forms a convenient work of reference for those interested in this study. A familiarity with the constitutional history of the period between 1760 and 1860 is most necessary for modern politicians, but the means of acquiring it are not so obvious. Within the last ten years there has been a great change in the attitude of the English people towards politics. Whether this is due to education, or to the democratic tendency of modern thought, or to both these factors, are questions weighty and interesting, which cannot be incidentally discussed. We have only to deal with the fact that at the present moment political matters are debated more earnestly and more hotly than at any other period since the Reform Bill of 1832, and for this reason it is desirable that the new social stratum should be permeated (in the old sense) by some knowledge of constitutional theory and practice. Hence we are inclined to receive Mr. Yonge's book indulgently, and even to express a hope that it should appear in a more popular form, so that it might reach the real power in the electorate, and so influence their aims and their methods. In the chapters treating of the Royal Marriage Act, the dispensing power, the "Nullum tempus" controversy, and with Lord Mansfield's theory of virtual representation, afterwards rhetorically amplified by Edmund Burke, Mr. Yonge gives a clear statement of the opposing opinions and fairly accurate judgments, though in the last instance he is too lenient towards a theory which, if logically developed, would do away with all local or direct representation. In reference to the power of the House of Lords on money bills, Mr. Yonge says, "The Lords alone of the whole nation are unrepresented in the House of Commons." He might have found an excellent instance of virtual representation in the 144 members of aristocratic families who sit in the Lower House. The names of Henry Hetherington and John Cleare should have been mentioned in connection with the repeal of the taxes on knowledge, and the allusions to the Peterloo massacre and the Birmingham Bull-ring riots might have been brought into closer agreement with the facts. Finally, it may be said that this book will have done much good, if it should induce some more independent thinker, some more skilful writer to treat the subject.

The Parallel New Testament, Greek and English. (Oxford University Press.)—It will be a sufficient recommendation of this volume if we briefly describe it. The left-hand pages contain in parallel columns the Authorised Version and the Revised Version. The former is printed as it appeared in 1611, with references and marginal notes, the latter with the Revisers' marginal notes. The right-hand pages contain the Greek Text, from which the Revisers translated, as it was edited by Archdeacon Palmer. In a parallel column stand the readings of the Textus Receptus which were displaced. The Revisers' preface is prefixed.

Country Rambles, and Manchester Walks and Wild Flowers. By Leo H. Grindon. (Palmer and Howe, Manchester; Simpkin and Marshall, London.)—Mr. Grindon's volume suggests to the ordinary reader, and must suggest much more forcibly to country-loving dwellers in Manchester and neighbouring Lancashire towns, some melancholy reflections. Part of it was published some twenty-five years ago, and twenty-five years have wrought a sad change, not wholly due to the growth of population and other necessary causes, but some of it the work of bad-taste and wanton destruction. Still, it is something to have an appreciative record of vanished beauties. Happily, too, much remains to be enjoyed, and to this Mr. Grindon is an agreeable guide, just as he is a sympathising historian of the past. Nothing in his book is more interesting than his notices of the artisan botanists and entomologists whom the Lancashire towns have produced. The volume is adorned with some agreeable illustrations of buildings and scenery from the pencil of Mr. T. Letherbrow.

Science in Short Chapters. By W. Mattieu Williams. (Chatto and Windus.)—Here are four-and-forty essays, papers, and letters, on various scientific subjects. They have been collected from the various newspapers and periodicals in which they first appeared, and are here reprinted, with occasional notes. Most of them were published within the last ten years. The subjects discussed are mainly astronomical and geological, but the later essays chiefly relate to such domestic questions as fuel, ventilation, and stoves. Mr. Williams writes forcibly, and makes his meaning clear. His views on some cosmical questions may not meet with general acceptance, but the world of science is certainly indebted to him, not only for correcting unrecognised errors, but also for suggesting new working hypotheses.

His skill in presenting the results of scientific discovery and invention in a popular and intelligible form is considerable. The republication of the longer and more thorough papers in this volume may be readily justified, but the same statement cannot be made concerning the short notes. The "Corrosion of Building-stones" (pp. 337 to 341), a brief paper published so lately as 1881, in no way adequately represents the present condition of our knowledge of this subject; it should not have been printed, much less reprinted. How Mr. Williams, in 1882, could add this note to his slight sketch of some experiments, in which he was himself once engaged, in electric lighting (p. 85), is hard to understand:—"The burnt card, burnt bamboo, and other flimsy incandescent threads now (1882) in vogue merely represent Starr's preliminary failures prior to his adoption of the hard, adamant stick of retort-carbon, which, I suppose, will be duly re-invented, patented again, and form the basis of new Limited Companies, when the present have collapsed." And the questionable taste, to say nothing stronger, of Mr. Mattien Williams's lofty disdain of the public analysts in his paper on "Iron-filings in Tea" (p. 244) cannot be commended. The strain in which his attack on a most useful class of public officers is written may be gauged by the opening sentence:—"I have watched the progress of the tea controversy, and the other public performances of the public analysts, with considerable interest; it might have been with amusement, but for the melancholy degradation of chemical science which they involve."

THEOLOGY.—The Claim of Christ on the Young. By Anthony W. Thorold, D.D., Bishop of Rochester. (W. Isbister).—Four of these six sermons were preached before the University of Oxford, being especially addressed by the preacher to the younger part of his audience. They are neither controversial nor apologetic. Of these kinds of sermon there are enough, perhaps more than enough, delivered from the pulpit of St. Mary's. They are didactic, and their appeal to the conscience of the hearers is manly and sensible, as well as earnest. Perhaps the second sermon, "Jacob," with its analysis of the patriarch's character, is the best of the series. Bishop Thorold, though he cannot follow in all things the theology of F. D. Maurice, is one of those to whom that great thinker has "made the Old Testament absolutely luminous;" and he is never seen to more advantage than when he is following this light.—Sermons. By Richard Twigg. (Griffith and Farran).—Mr. Twigg was a devoted parish priest, and an effective preacher. He was the first or one of the first to hold a "mission" in his parish (St. James', Wednesbury), and he afterwards became a "mission preacher" of considerable repute. His sermons have the excellencies and, we must add, the faults which we should expect in this account of his work. They are direct, vigorous appeals to the conscience. Stripped as they come to us here of the personal power which accompanied their delivery, they are still effective. But they use over much the instrument of terror. Here is a passage from "Dives and Lazarus," which certainly errs in this way:—"He is in torment. How? Through every sense. His hearing is tormented by the cries of demons, and by the wailing of the damned. His sense of taste is tormented; for his tongue is parched with thirst, and in his agony he bites it with his teeth, and thus adds to his pains. His taste of smell is tormented; for he is almost suffocated with fire and flame, brimstone and smoke. His sense of feeling is tormented; every nerve is on the rack. His sense of sight is tormented, as we have already seen, by beholding on every side the means which torment him." This elaborate detail suggests that the passage is borrowed from the Latin or French. It is certainly not native to the Anglican pulpit.—We find a much more liberal theology in Sunday Mornings at Norwood: Prayers and Sermons. By the Rev. S. A. Tippet. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.).—The prayers, indeed, seem to us, we must say, too rhetorical. Perhaps this is a prejudice suggested by attachment to a liturgy. But the sermons are excellent, thoughtful, eloquent, without any excess of ornament, and, we should think, genuinely helpful to those who had the privilege of hearing them. We may single out for special praise the sixth sermon, "The Election of God." The preacher clearly apprehends and plainly sets forth the underlying principle of the fact, which no one who looks at life can deny, of the election of some to privileges and blessings which are denied to others. According to Calvinism, the elect are chosen, to the exclusion of the rest; a more hopeful creed holds that they are chosen for their benefit.—Three Books of God: Nature, History, Scripture. By George Dawson, M.A. Edited by George St. Clair. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.).—These sermons present the well-known characteristics of Mr. Dawson's style. They are fearless, outspoken utterances, somewhat rugged, sometimes, we should say, not sufficiently well considered; but manly and energetic, and full of a faith which, though often widely departing from orthodoxy, was vivid and genuine. A sentence from the first sermon will give a good idea of the preacher's aim. He begins by quoting Hazlitt:—"In the days of Jacob, there was a ladder between heaven and earth; but now the heavens have gone farther off, and have become astronomical." And further on, he says:—"There are two books—one of the body, and one of the soul—one of matter and one of spirit; and that declaration of Hazlitt about the heavens having become astronomical, is the result of trying to read God in the wrong book." The two sermons, "Christ Fulfills Moses," and "Christ and Moses; or, Love Better than Law," may be specially mentioned. Those who are inclined to find their ideal in Islam, or, at least, to put Islam above Christianity, should read the two admirable discourses entitled "Christ and Mohammed" and "Christ Increases: Mohammed Decreases." They will see what an able thinker, who formed and expressed his convictions with perfect freedom, had to say upon this subject. The sermon on "Evolution" is forcible. "It is to me," says the preacher, "quite as pleasant to have had a lowly beginning and to have climbed to loftiness, as to have been lofty and to have gone downhill." The following sermon, "The Ascent of Man from Savagery," is good, too, in its way. This is fine satire:—"When I go through the country, I get a vision of kings, and dukes, and highnesses and mightinesses, and I find that every one of them is a butcher, with his tools by his side. We are carried back to the tiger. These men are going to have a gala-day, so they go to the tiger and say, 'Lend me a stripe or two.'" We notice a mistake, common enough, but still such as we should hardly expect from so acute a thinker. "Judge Phillimore . . . having been brought up in the human learning of the law, settles whether there is a Real Presence in the Eucharist." He does nothing of the kind. He settles whether the language of certain formularies asserts, or denies, or allows—for there are these three possible issues—the tenet of a Real Presence.—We have also received The Collects Exemplified. Illustrations of the Collects for the Sundays after Trinity, edited by the Rev. Joseph Jackson, M.A. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.), a series of twenty-five sermons, constructed on strictly orthodox lines, by a layman.—Old Faiths in a New Light, by the Rev. Newman Smyth (C. Higham), which comes with the powerful recommendation of Professor Bruce.—Abbott's Young Christian (Roberts Brothers, New York), "a memorial edition," with a sketch of the author, from the pen of one of his sons.—The Story of the Bible, Told in Simple Language for the Young. By Charles Foster. (C. Griffin and Co.).—Introductory Hints to Readers of the Old Testament. By the Rev. John A. Cross, M.A. (Longmans).—Living Truths for the Head and Heart. By the Rev. Rev. C. D. Bell, D.D. A series of short papers setting forth the main tenets of the Christian Faith in the language of Evangelical theology.

NEW EDITIONS.—Messrs. Smith and Elder send us cheaper editions, in a single convenient volume, of three good novels, Carità and Within the Precincts, by Mrs. Oliphant; and For Percival, by Margaret Veley.

We have received the following magazines, &c., for May:—Part 24 of English Etchings, the subjects this month being the work of W. H. Urwick, W. Strang, and W. Holmes May.—The Magazine of Art, a good number.—Art and Letters.—L'Art, the plates and illustrations in which are above the average.—The Century, the woodcuts of the illustrated articles in which are very fine. The English issue of this magazine is now published by F. Warne and Co.—Part 7 of Greater London.—Time, which opens with the first three chapters of a story by Jean Middlemass, entitled "Silvermead."—The Gentleman's Magazine.—Belgravia, in which "The Admiral's Ward" is concluded.—The Army and Navy Magazine.—The Nautical Magazine.—Colburn's United Service Magazine.—Tinsley's Magazine.—The Irish Monthly.—Science Gossip.—The Folk-lore Journal.—The Antiquarian Magazine.—Chambers's Journal.—All the Year Round and its spring number.—Letts's Household Magazine.—On the Road, the first number of a new series of the organ of the Commercial Travellers' Christian Association.—The Sunday Magazine and the Sunday at Home, in both of which new serial stories are commenced.—The Month.—The Catholic Presbyterian.—The Ladies' Gazette of Fashion, which contains three coloured plates of the latest styles in female dress.—The Ladies' Treasury.—The American Journal of Mathematics.—St. Nicholas, a good number; the illustrated paraphrase-parodies of well-known fables are clever and amusing.—The Continent.—The Atlantic Monthly.—The Manhattan.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE Tories are in a high state of delight. They all think that what Mr. Lowther calls the disastrous blunder of 1880 is about to be repaired. Even Mr. Gibson, who is a sensible man, speaking on Friday week at Cambridge, quite capered with pleasure. One almost fancied, in reading his speech, that in certain states of exaltation he might be guilty of a joke. He did not utter one, of course, but he almost lapsed into poetry, talked of "clouds" disappearing, of "happy atmospheres," of the "dictates, the instincts of patriotism," and denounced the Liberals with energetic bathos as men who could find no basis. They had secured "peace without honour" in the Transvaal, had demoralised Ireland, had been nobly lavish of unperformed promises, had misrepresented finance, and so on, and so on. One expected to see at the end of the speech that Mr. Gladstone "had alienated the Sultan" and "degraded his Sovereign into a Suzerain." All this is very unlike Mr. Gibson, who expects office, and only to be explained by the mental intoxication produced by the Roman Catholic victory on the Affirmation Bill, the signal by which the speaker judges that "the tide has turned." As we have argued elsewhere, Mr. Gibson will find that his joy is a little premature, as well as excessive, and would be wise to leave war-whoops of triumph to Mr. Lowther and his like. He is not prepared, we imagine, to pay the price demanded for the permanent alliance of Messrs. O'Brien and Biggar, and without that he is where he was yesterday,—in presence of a majority delayed, but not defeated, in their plans, by systematic Tory obstruction.

An unexpected and severe blow has fallen upon the Parnellites. Archbishop Croke, always a violent defender of the party, recently solicited subscriptions to the Parnell Testimonial Fund, which does not flourish much in Ireland. He was thereupon summoned to Rome to explain himself, and made his submission; while, on the 11th inst., the Pope issued, through the regular channels, a strong circular to all Catholic Bishops in Ireland. They are informed that, while it is lawful for the Irish to seek redress for their grievances, provided that they observe the divine law, "it being wicked to further any cause, no matter how just, by illegal means," it is the duty of Bishops to curb the excited feelings of the multitude, so that they may not be led away "to place their hopes of public prosperity in the shame of criminal acts." All collections are forbidden which "are raised in order to inflame popular passions, and to be used as the means for leading men into rebellion against the laws. Above all things, they, the clergy, must hold themselves aloof from such subscriptions when it is plain that hatred and dissensions are aroused by them, that distinguished persons are loaded with insults, that never in any way are censures pronounced against the crimes and murders with which wicked men stain themselves; and especially when it is asserted that the measure of true patriotism is in proportion to the amount of money given or refused, so as to bring the people under the pressure of intimidation." Under these circumstances, the Pope absolutely prohibits the clergy from promoting the Parnell Testimonial Fund.

The effect of this letter, which in language and in drift is unusually clear, cannot as yet be ascertained. Its first result has been to induce Mr. F. H. O'Donnell, a Catholic, to assume once more his favourite attitude of Ajax defying the lightning. He has sent £10 to the Parnell Testimonial Fund, and a letter in which he declares that English emissaries have poured the poison of lying assertions into the unsuspecting ears of the Vatican, and have "beguiled with specious mendacity the pastoral simplicity" of the Pontiff. The Freeman's Journal says the same thing in more respectful form, and Mr. Sexton, at a meeting of the National League called to consider the subject, intimated that so much of the Irish future was bound up in Mr. Parnell's personality, that the Pope could not be attended to; Mr. Mayne, M.P., also said Mr. Parnell's reward had been "an affront from people who knew nothing of his work, or of the political duty of the Irish people." Mr. Kenny, M.P., denounced the letter as "a shameful insult to the priests and people of Ireland." The serious leaders of the party are not, however, likely to talk nonsense of this kind; and if they did, it would not matter. Nobody suspects them of reverencing the Pope, any more than anything else. The important question is the effect of the letter upon Biddy and Pat in America, who forward dollars to help Mr. Parnell to separate Ireland from England. As they are sure to ask the priests, and as the priests cannot very well hint, with Mr. O'Donnell, that the Pope is an imbecile, the subscriptions will probably be greatly lessened. At all events, those who subscribe from fear will now have an excellent reason for not yielding to compulsion. It must be convenient for Mr. Parnell just now that he is not even nominally a Catholic, and so escapes the necessity of feeling damned.

We have received, from a correspondent who has access to good sources of information, the following version of the proceedings consequent upon Archbishop Croke's summons to appear at the Vatican:—"Archbishop Croke arrived in Rome on the 2nd inst., and it was announced by his friends that he proposed to have an immediate audience of the Pope, and to return forthwith to Ireland. But the Holy Father fixed the date of his audience for Friday, the 11th. Meantime, the recent letter of the Archbishop on the Parnell Testimonial Fund, the strong representations of leading Irish ecclesiastics on the state of the Church in Ireland, corroborated by much evidence, such as comes in the regular correspondence of Propaganda, had been well weighed by the Pope personally, and it was determined that the terms of the document to be now issued should not be capable of misinterpretation or misrepresentation, such as had happened with previous Papal letters on the troubles of Ireland. The letter to the Irish Bishops, which you will have already seen, was accordingly prepared and issued on Friday, the 11th, and on that same day the Pope received Dr. Croke at the Vatican and made him aware of its contents, and of his intention no longer to tolerate the course hitherto pursued by that prelate. The Pope was, it is said, greatly agitated during the interview, and at its close, when Dr. Croke completely submitted, two of his priests who had accompanied him from Ireland were summoned in a somewhat marked manner to the Papal audience-chamber. I believe Archbishop Croke left for Ireland the following day, without taking the usual formal leave of the Prefect of Propaganda."

The existence in Dublin of sympathy with the murderers of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke may be considered proved, but it is difficult to gauge its depth and extent. On the one hand, among the classes summoned on juries the Crown officers found it impossible to collect jurymen sufficient without heavy fines, and difficult to exclude men certain not to convict; and in Kelly's case, they twice failed. On the other hand, the juries, once empanelled, usually did their duty, and every man accused of those murders, or of the attempt to murder Mr. Field or Mr. Poole, has been convicted and sentenced. The Special Commission finished its work on Thursday. Even Fitzharris, who was, with the Judge's consent, acquitted of murder, was convicted of conspiracy and sentenced to penal servitude for life. Again, the mob all through showed the greatest sympathy for Brady, the actual murderer. It was necessary to guard him on his way to and from prison like a Czar, and among the American-Irish especially he was described as a martyr. The most stringent precautions were taken on the day of his execution, and a solemn demonstration in the shape of funeral processions was expected all over Ireland. Nevertheless, he was executed on Monday, and everything passed off quietly, and there was no special exhibition of popular feeling, even in the easy form of wearing crape. The truth seems to be that Irishmen of the extreme type try hard to believe that the men are unjustly condemned, and adhere to their faith in words, but cannot, even in their hatred, delude their own minds completely. The condition of the public mind is, however, heart-breaking to contemplate. Not only is the natural horror of murder suspended, but also instinctive logic. If, as all just men say, Brady was a murderer, he was fairly condemned; while if, as the agitators say, he was a soldier in a war with the British, the British had a right to make war on him. The Irish of extreme opinions reject equally either deduction, and declare that no one ought to die except the innocent.

The more moderate of the Farmers' representatives appear to be better pleased with the Government Agricultural Holdings Bill than we thought they would be. Mr. W. C. Borlase, Member for East Cornwall, and President of the Farmers' Alliance, told an audience at Hackney on Wednesday that, although he wished for some amendments, and an extension of the drainage clauses to some other improvements, he regarded the Bill as "an honest and conscientious attempt to settle the question," which the Alliance would not oppose. This declaration is the more noteworthy, because Mr. Borlase is by no means Conservative about land, but as regards its enfranchisement would go the whole Radical length,—that is, would make it as saleable as Consols, abolishing alike primogeniture and settlement. He warns the landlords, moreover, that they must submit to a permanent reduction of rent of 50 per cent. That is, we imagine, premature and exaggerated, but we quote it to show that Mr. Borlase does not accept the Bill from any concealed feeling of sympathy with extreme landlord views.

In a letter to Mr. Chesson, Cardinal Newman defines his mental attitude towards the Affirmation Bill. He "cannot consider" that it "involves a religious principle; for, as I had occasion to observe in print more than thirty years ago, what the political and social world means by the word 'God' is too often not the Christian God, the Jewish or the Mahometan—not a personal God, but an unknown God—as little what Christians mean by God as the Fate, or Chance, or Anima Mundi of a Greek philosopher." "Hence," "all that is secured to us by the Opposition" is "an Impersonal, or Material, or Abstract and Ideal something or other." Consequently, "nothing is lost to religion" by the Affirmation Bill, "and nothing gained by its being rejected." The conclusion seems to be that if Cardinal Newman were in Parliament, he would, on the whole, support the Affirmation Bill, but would prefer the entire abolition of the mockery of "swearing by an Impersonal, or Material, or Abstract and Ideal something or other," an opinion in which a good many sound Protestants concur. It takes cultivation, however, to understand Cardinal Newman, and he will no more move the ordinary Irish Catholic than if he were a layman.

A great fuss is being made in the papers over an incident which we believe to be quite trivial. Mr. Justice Norris, of the Calcutta High Court, in the course of a trial, and on good Hindoo advice, ordered an idol to be brought into the verandah of the Court, that the Judges might see it. The native Editor of the Bengalee did not approve this, and not writing his own language, used exaggerated phrases, probably taken from some reminiscence of his reading in college, about Scroggs and Jeffries. The Judge, not having quite the self-control of his colleagues at home, sentenced him to two months' imprisonment for contempt of Court. That irritated the natives, who held a meeting, said to have been attended by 10,000 persons, who declared that they had lost confidence in the Government, whereas they had only lost confidence in Mr. Justice Norris. The speakers, with their usual cleverness, instead of attacking the Judge for his severity, attacked him for an insult to their religion. He had offered none, and if he had, the Mussulmans who also attended the meeting would only have chuckled, and wished for the old days when they could occasionally make remarks on an idol with a hammer. The incident has been eagerly seized upon in England as proof that Lord Ripon is "letting India slip out of his hand, and waking-up race hatreds." That is pure nonsense. Lord Ripon has, as we believe without intention, greatly annoyed Europeans by a premature attack on their right to be tried only by their countrymen; but he has not annoyed the natives, not one in a million of whom has heard of Mr. Ilbert's Bill. The endless gossip of the Presidency towns is not native opinion, nor are the few cultivated natives of the coast-fringe the people of India. The former, too, though they sometimes talk disaffection, are much too clever to be disaffected. They know quite well what a Sikh Sirdar would do to them, and that the alternative of a Viceroy is a Sikh Sirdar.

The Northbrook Indian Club, formed to promote intercourse between Indian and English gentlemen, has excited much interest in India, and £12,000 has been subscribed there to obtain a more central site for the Club in London. This Club, which will be called the "Northbrook," will be opened next Monday, by the Prince of Wales, at 3 Whitehall Gardens, and will, it is hoped, form a point of meeting for the two races. The President is Lord Northbrook, and the committee comprises the best known of retired Indian officials. The scheme is an admirable one, for its end, if its underlying thought is true; but that has still to be ascertained. It is supposed that frequent intercourse between Englishmen and Indians will bring them closer together, but it may also, as in so many other cases, make them more hostile. Intimacy has not made the relations of England and Ireland cordial, nor do Negroes and Southerners love each other because they live in the same cities. We seem to see that race dislike increases as the races draw together, and half-believe that the ancient seclusion which placed a social wall round both the Englishman and the Indian was most favourable to their mutual respect. They jar, when they touch. It is well, however, that the other theory should be tried to the uppermost, and tried fairly; and it could not be tried under better auspices than in the new quarters of the Northbrook Club. Hitherto, the managers report that the attendance of Indian gentlemen has been full and regular, but not of English.

It is difficult for Englishmen to estimate the extent of the Czar's danger during the forty-eight hours that his coronation practically lasts, but it is probably quite real. No care will guard a life which another man would give his life to take, and the Nihilists, besides being excited by the fear they inspire, are aware that if the Emperor, after all their throats, escapes, their wand of power will be broken. At all events, the Russian Court believes that the struggle is most deadly. The Czar, it is stated, has requested the eight royal personages who will attend the ceremony to enter Moscow alone, as it is during his entry, and not during the actual ceremonial, which takes place in a small church, that the danger will be greatest. The ancient capital is being occupied by picked troops like an enemy's city, entire detachments of police have been forwarded from St. Petersburg, and although the Ambassadors are beginning to arrive, the day for the crowning ceremony is not yet officially announced. All that human skill can do will be done, but still the Czar must be visible to thousands, must pass through streets, and must be surrounded by guards, priests, and officials, among whom may be his destined enemy. The grand chance in his favour is that expected crimes never occur, the expectation trying the nerves of the criminals more than those of the victim, whose position is, however, horrible. To be crowned with the consent of 80,000,000, and expect death at that very hour!

South Africa is still in unrest. The Basutos have broken out again, and are fighting each other, and President Brand has appealed to the Queen's Government to carry out the Treaty of Aliwal. Under this agreement, the British pledged themselves to keep the Basutos quiet, and, as the Cape Government is reluctant to interfere and has this year a deficit of £500,000 to meet, the work will be left to the Imperial authorities. At the same time, the Government of the Transvaal professes itself shocked with the anarchy in Zululand, where Cetewayo has evidently lost the habit of victory, and asks the Queen's representatives to restore order. The Government will be most unwilling to interfere, but if it does not, the Dutch colonists will declare that it never keeps agreements when they are to the benefit of Boers. The English colonists are eager for more annexations, the Dutch colonists are suspicious of the English, and the Government is so hampered by agreements that it can pursue no policy without accusations of bad faith. Affairs in South Africa need a thorough overhaul by a great officer, who can remain long enough to pursue a well-defined policy, intelligible alike to the two white races and the blacks. Nowhere, as we argue elsewhere, is a Viceroy more needed.

The French Chamber, on Tuesday, voted the conquest of Anam by 358 to 50. This amazing majority, so entirely at variance with the recent temper of the Chamber, was secured by two minimising speeches from M. Challemeil-Lacour, who described the expedition as a mere promenade. He assured the Chamber that China was not a military power, and would not fight, that the cost would be less than nothing, as the taxes of Tonquin would pay for the troops employed, and that the Anamese people ardently desired the aid of France. There were, moreover, coal-mines in Tonquin, which M. Bourrée, the Minister recalled from Peking, had wished to sacrifice to China. If the Emperor of Anam resisted, and, no doubt, he was hostile, France behind her occupied fortresses would await his inevitable submission. Only two speakers opposed the Bill, and many of the Extreme Left, who were supposed to be hostile, voted for it. We fear the Republicans will find that they have been deceived. The Chinese will strengthen Anam till it is in a position to defend itself, and the Highlanders of Tonquin, who have never been conquered, will slaughter Chinese soldiers and French marines with perfect impartiality. The design is practicable, if France will spend £5,000,000 and 10,000 men; but the demand for a credit of £200,000 is either an absurdity or a fraud.

The Special Correspondent of the Standard, who has been sent to Madagascar, reports that the whole island is determined upon resistance to the French. The majority of the Sakalavas, who were supposed to be in the French interest, have made up their quarrel with the Hovas, the dominant race, and the French will have no effective native assistance. They can bombard the principal port, Tamatave; but if they do, the Hovas will institute a land blockade, keep up constant attacks, and cut off supplies. To put an end to annoyance, the French will be compelled to march upon the capital, but the broad belt of forest between the coast and the interior will be stoutly defended by twenty thousand Regulars with fire-arms, and a mob of fifty thousand spearmen, formidable in the forest. Such an expedition will require at least fifteen thousand men, and as will be seen from an account we publish elsewhere, the French will have difficulty in finding them. They are reluctant, for the reasons there stated, to use the Line, and of their 20,000 seasoned troops specially intended for colonial service, at least half are required for Tunis and Tonquin. The Admiral, who has many ships, but less than 2,000 troops, will therefore be locked up for months in Tamatave, until the French Government decides either to use adequate means, or to agree to a compromise under which the independence of the Hovas will be recognised, but the French will be allowed the right of holding land.

The suspicion that Prince Bismarck intends Austria to acquire provinces in the Balkan has received this week a noteworthy though small confirmation. A Bulgarian paper, not known to be inspired, but possibly in relations with Prince Alexander, recommended that the States of the Balkan should confederate themselves, in order to protect "European Turkey" against the great military Powers. This advice, probably because it is so practical, roused the anger of Prince Bismarck, and the North-German Gazette roundly tells the Balkan States that they must devote themselves to their internal affairs. If they attempt to pursue an "adventurous" foreign policy—that is, a combined foreign policy of any kind—the Great Powers would raise the question whether it was not unwise to create these minor States. Serbia, Roumania, Bulgaria, Roumelia, Montenegro, and Greece are, in fact, all informed with brutal plainness that they exist by sufferance, that they are to obey orders, and that they are not to combine even in a defensive league. Those sentences have, we suspect, advanced confederation by years. The Princes are all jealous, but if they are to be swallowed one by one, they will soon discover a basis for a strong alliance, which even now could control 300,000 good troops.

The grand result of the lowering of the Italian franchise has been, it is said, to re-form parties into two great divisions, which we may call the Whig and the Radical. S. Minghetti, the leader of the Right, has announced that he and those who think with him will in future lend a steady support to S. Depretis and his Government, which is now face to face with an Advanced Party almost or quite Republican in its views. He adds that the Government must for the next few years devote itself to domestic and social questions, rather than "political"—that is, external—affairs. With this reinforcement, S. Depretis is completely master of the Chamber; but it is expected that at the next election many more Radicals will obtain seats, and out of doors they have behind them large masses who are still below the suffrage, and who, in Naples and Lombardy, desire improvements of tenure, which the Monarchy hesitates to grant. Ultimately, it would not be surprising if, when Leo XIII. abandons the sterile policy of sulking, the balance of power fell, as in Germany, to the Ultramontanes. For the time, however, S. Depretis is supreme.

The Débats states that the Suez Canal Company have resolved to meet the demands of the British shipowners, which are creating an extraordinary amount of ill-feeling in France, by a grand concession. They will themselves cut a second Canal, and allow to England a much larger power of control over the double undertaking. That is really a large offer, if it is made in sincerity, and would sufficiently meet commercial requirements. With two canals, one reserved to the "up" and one to the "down" traffic, blocks would be avoided, and the time occupied be regulated only by the speed of the steamers. The position, however, would still be an unfortunate one. The Canal would be maintained by a French Company for a trade of which four-fifths is British, in a country which is virtually a British dependency. A collision of authorities in such a case is nearly inevitable, and can be avoided finally only by M. Leroy Beaulieu's suggestion that the new Company should be English, and should buy out the old one. This suggestion, however, is repudiated by the French journalists, who see in the whole matter not an ordinary business transaction, but a subtle plot of Lord Granville's to obtain complete ascendancy in Egypt.

The International Exhibition of Fisheries was opened on Saturday by the Prince of Wales, in full regal state, with a prayer from the Archbishop of Canterbury, who, by a happy inspiration, alluded to Christ's direct sanction of the catching of fish. The collections forwarded by half the Governments of the States and Colonies of the world almost outrun the capacity of the vast Exhibition buildings at Kensington Gore, and the crowds who visit them are never tired of expressing their amazement. All known fish, all modes of catching fish, all kinds of fishing vessels, all sorts of fishermen, from whalers to Thames punt-fishers, and most sorts of fisher-girls, are there represented, and excite keen interest among a people who never lose the feeling that the sea is their domain. The gathering is described elsewhere, and it is of course too soon as yet to know what we may expect from the Exhibition. Experts say, however, that, so far as can be perceived, the world has little to teach us in catching fish, that no new fresh fish is visible likely to be popular food, but that an important trade in cured fish may be developed by the Exhibition. Barrels of such fish hitherto unknown to Londoners have been forwarded, and will, it is hoped, become familiar, the managers, with unusual wisdom, having taken pains to show how any fish for which they desire to cultivate a taste ought to be cooked. The English commonalty, aware that "fish is not fillin'," have hitherto too greatly ignored its value as a relish, and most of them have never even seen cured fish, except haddocks, herrings, and sprats. There are dozens as good, and some of them will henceforward find a demand.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE PARTIES.

WHITSUNTIDE is always a good time for taking stock of the position of the two great Parties, and this year it is a better time than usual. The holiday has occurred exactly in the middle of the Session, and both sides have gone into the country under the influence of excited feeling. Liberal Members are depressed, as we think, unduly; and Tory Members are exultant, as we think, unreasonably. The Liberal depression, though real and well justified, for the defeat on the Affirmation Bill unquestionably weakened the Government, is not very deep, and probably will disappear after contact with the Constituencies; but the Tory exultation may be less evanescent. It is certainly extreme. If we may judge from the dance of delight which Mr. Gibson, usually a sober-sided and even moderate man, performed at Cambridge on Friday week, Tories of the highest position believe that the Liberal Ministry is dying, that power is immediately within their grasp, and that when they dissolve the country will give them a long lease of rule. "The fortunes of the party," sang Mr. Gibson, in an irrepressible burst of ecstasy, "so long apparently under a cloud, were about to emerge—had already emerged—into a brighter, happier atmosphere!" He "was speaking at an encouraging and happy moment. The tide was turning,—the tide had turned." At "the present moment their opponents in Parliament and the country were disunited, dispirited, demoralised." "Not only the Conservative leaders, but their rank and file were united, energetic, and courageous." The "Opposition, sometimes dispirited, was now active and triumphant!" And in short, the Liberals, who had accomplished nothing and spoiled everything, were, in Mr. Gibson's judgment, about to be turned out. The Cabinet was plainly before his eyes, and he, oratorically, skipped for joy.

It may be so, for when the question is of the opinion of the millions who now govern England, experience is of little value, and the most sensible man is he who dogmatizes the least; but, looking at the whole situation without party feeling, we think Mr. Gibson will find himself mistaken. He does not misread the facts, but he misapprehends their consequences. The defeat on the Affirmation Bill has undoubtedly injured the position of the Government. Any serious defeat does that, and this was a serious one, for although the Bill was not made a question of confidence, and although it was thrown out by an alliance of incompatible parties, still the Government made every effort to carry it, and, had the majority proved faithful, they would have been successful. But the injury is not one of the kind which cannot be repaired. There are not many questions on which the Irish Liberals will be forced to quit the Government for fear of the Catholic vote, and very few on which the English Liberals will venture to do so. They could plead their consciences in the case of this Bill, and the plea might be accepted; but if they rattled on secular subjects, they would lose their seats. The Government, therefore, will be able, after the holiday, to command the votes of a majority which, though shaken in courage, is little diminished in numbers, and which, if called on to act with determination, will undoubtedly respond. That it will be so called on we make no doubt, and it will in two respects, at least, be more efficient than before. The idea of a possible overthrow of the Government having been spread abroad, every vote will be watched, and Liberals will be compelled to be much more cautious in deserting their leaders, and to work much harder in forcing the Government Bills through. At the same time, the obstruction will be less. We do not say it will be much less, for the obstructive group is almost beyond the influence of reason; but it will be less, for the Tory leaders know that no reason for dissolution would please their opponents like persistent obstruction. If Mr. Gladstone could only dissolve upon that, with a case clearly visible to the country, the Liberals, and more especially the Liberal provincial journalists, would work as they have never worked before, and the majority would be large enough to defeat both the Tories and their Parnellite allies. Upon the result of a dissolution to crush obstruction we entertain no doubt whatever. No Tory, from Sir Stafford Northcote downwards, would be returned, unless pledged to the lips to put obstruction down. The supposition that a dissolution could not be sanctioned because of Irish affairs is, we believe, a delusion. Whether the dissolution comes now or next year, the Parnellites will still be strong, and Government cannot avoid a dissolution for ever because of its possible results in one section of the Kingdom. Those results are by no means certain, and if they were, must be met as best may be when they arrive. If the Government cannot overcome the hostility of the Irish Extremists, as little can the Tories benefit by it, —unless, indeed, they are prepared, by granting Home-rule, to shatter their Party into atoms; and this fear cannot outweigh every other. The dissolution must be arranged, when the time comes, on broad reasons of public policy, the first of which is that Parliament must be efficient. We venture to predict, therefore, that while the Government may be compelled to throw overboard some of its measures, it will carry those on which it insists with steadier majorities and less resistance than it has hitherto encountered. Expectation is very often defeated, and the Session hitherto wasted may turn out unexpectedly fruitful.

But the Constituencies? They, it is said, we do not doubt in good faith, are "turning against the Government." It may be so; for, as we said before, the Householders are counted by millions; but we see none of the signs which in 1874, and again in 1880, we interpreted aright. The regular argument of the calmer Tories is that many Liberals have been alienated by the Affirmation Bill, and by the idea, true or false, that it is a Bill to admit Mr. Bradlaugh, and there must be some truth in that. There must in each constituency be a section of voters, a very prominent and possibly influential section, irritated on that account. The Clergy alone would make that true. But if the irritation were deep or extensive, it should first of all destroy the personal popularity of Mr. Gladstone. The Bill was his device for extricating Parliament from an impasse, and the Tories have lost no opportunity of hammering this fact into electors' heads, and concentrating all odium upon their great adversary. Do they themselves think they have succeeded? To all appearance, Mr. Gladstone, though defeated, has with the people lost neither prestige nor popularity. With some he has increased both, for the effect of his speech, circulated as it has been, is wonderful; and with the mass there is no appearance of loss. He is received as enthusiastically as ever, his name elicits the same continuous cheering, there is the same oppressive desire that he should not retire from politics. We believe that the truth is this. Those who hate Mr. Gladstone hate him a little harder on account of the Affirmation Bill, which, as the motive of a vote does not count, is, from the point of view of party, of no importance; those who like him and thought him right admire him a little more, which also is of no importance; and those who like him, but thought him wrong, intend to support him still, subject to their distaste upon that one question. And as it is with Mr. Gladstone, so it is with his Party. If the dissolution occurred to-morrow, there would be more excitement, if that is possible, than in 1880, and majorities would be smaller; but the causes which produced a majority then would produce one again, though the Liberal representatives in many places might be bidden, as they were almost throughout Protestant Ireland, to leave the Oath of Allegiance alone. The party would win as if Affirmation had never been heard of, though possibly with the loss of some determined men, who on such a point would adhere, in season and out of season, to their convictions. None of the remaining Tory arguments would have the least weight. Grant for the moment that they are right about South Africa, still the mass of electors do not care a jot about South Africa; while as to Egypt, they know the Tories would go further, and as to the failure to perform promises, they set that down to Tory account. Mr. Gibson knows Ireland, but he does not know England, and he may rely on it that in this last division of the subject he is under a distinct illusion. Every sentence he utters about "failures to pass Bills" is a nail in his Party's coffin. Obstruction, if it has succeeded in Parliament, has failed in the constituencies. Apart altogether from its own demerits, that mode of resistance has excessively annoyed all devotees of Mr. Gladstone —whom our opponents will admit to be numerous—all "local leaders"—read the language of Mr. Smith, the Member for Liverpool, a typical local leader,—and all provincial journalists, who have the literary irritability under delay. The matter has been explained, and explained week after week, day after day, by all Liberal speakers and writers, till the voters are possessed of the facts, and regard the Government's failure to carry its Bills as one main reason for punishing enemies of the Government, who, and not the Government, are for those failures held solely responsible. Their other reason, dislike and distrust of the Tory leaders, of Lord Salisbury, who out of mere fury stormed against a Bill for suppressing dynamiteurs—which he would certainly have brought in—and of Sir Stafford Northcote, who defended the Obstructives as the Spartans in the English Thermopylæ, and so revealed his deep sympathy with those who would paralyse Parliament, remains as before, and will, we have little doubt, overcome all the prejudice created both by the facts as to Mr. Bradlaugh, and the Tory misrepresentation of those facts, which on one point has not been adroit. They should have fixed on somebody else as a secret sympathiser with Atheism, and not on Mr. Gladstone. That was foolish, as foolish as it would be for Liberals to fix on Lord Salisbury as a secret sympathiser with O'Donovan Rossa. So far as we can judge, a dissolution to-morrow would not increase the Tory list by ten votes, would increase Mr. Parnell's list by twenty votes, unless the Pope's letter dries up his supplies, and would leave the Liberals where they are, though with some of their men pledged, like the Irish Attorney-General, not to vote on an Affirmation Bill.

We have, of course, confined ourselves to the situation as it stands. Should the Redistribution Bill be in front, or should Mr. Gladstone have resigned, or should a new topic like a war in Europe have arrived before the Dissolution, all the conditions of calculation would be changed. But apart from those new factors, we have, we believe, described the situation rightly, and certainly with as little party bias as human nature will allow.

LEO XIII. AND THE PARNELLITES.

THIS Pope strikes straight. In language of most unusual clearness, language intended to be understood by common people, the Pope, as Head of the Catholic Church, has formally condemned all collections for Parnellite purposes, and especially the Testimonial Fund intended to do honour to Mr. Parnell himself. He has denounced "absolutely" all "such collections as are raised in order to inflame popular passions, and to be used as the means for leading men into rebellion against the laws;" has commanded all Catholic Clergy "to stand aloof from such subscriptions," and has declared it "not to be tolerated that any ecclesiastic, much less a Bishop, should take any part whatever in recommending or promoting the Parnell Testimonial Fund." Such collections are utterly evil, "when it is plain that hatred and dissensions are aroused by them; that distinguished persons are loaded with insult; and that never in any way are censures pronounced against the crimes and murders with which wicked men stain themselves." This is plain speaking, and the issue of the Circular containing such expressions to the Catholic Bishops of Ireland may prove an historical event. This is no pro forma denunciation of "unlawful means," of unnamed Secret Societies, or of rebellion in the abstract. The Pope names the clique he condemns. Before such words could have been used, and especially words of such popular plainness, the Papacy must have been thoroughly informed, must have studied the whole situation, and must have taken one of those resolutions from which it seldom swerves under any pressure whatever. Many considerations must have induced the Pope to pause before he struck so resolute a blow. He is thoroughly aware of the special difficulties of his Church in Ireland, of the deep variance among its Bishops, of its dependence for means on popular favour, of the disposition, so widely spread of late years, to declare that the Church shall only be obeyed on matters non-political. It is nothing less than schism that he risks in Ireland. He knows that in America the Parnellite movement is far more Roman Catholic than in Ireland, that it has gathered to itself all sorts of Catholic societies, and that its leaders have assiduously courted and honoured the priests, through whose aid alone they can work on their subscribers. He has been in incessant communication with Bishops avowedly on Mr. Parnell's side, he has studied letters from Archbishop Croke, the most rabid of them all, and he has round him men who know Ireland as it is known only to her clergy and her agitators. There was no special demand pressing on him for so uncompromising an utterance, no recrudescence of outrage, no great horror amid which even Protestants might have looked for an utterance for Rome. It is in the face of the circumstances, and not under strain of circumstances, that he speaks out in unqualified terms, and prohibits in America, no less than in Ireland, the collections which are the life-blood of the Parnellite movement. No Catholic will henceforward be able to subscribe to a Parnellite fund without the sense that he is furthering a movement denounced by the Pope in the precise method held by the Pope to be most blameable, and no priest will be able to collect for Mr. Parnell without imminent risk of suspension for overt disobedience to the direct command of the Pope and the settled policy of his Church.

We did not expect such decision, though we have long since been in the habit of annoying many of our readers by pointing out plainly that the popular view of the situation was misled by religious prejudice, and that the Catholic Church was not and could not be in complicity with recent movements in Ireland. That Church has never been heartily favourable to the independence of Ireland, which, as its rulers perceive, would leave Great Britain one of the least Catholic of the European States, in fact in most Sessions without a Catholic in her representative body. It has always been hostile on ecclesiastical grounds to Secret Societies of any kind, and of late it has seen too many signs that the leaders of the Irish party hostile to Great Britain sympathise with the cosmopolitan Revolution, and at heart detest all clerical control. It was certain, therefore, that the Pope would be on the side of Cardinal McCabe, that he would inculcate moderation on all Bishops, and that his more favoured representatives in Parliament would not be Parnellites. But, in the face of Irish difficulties, we did not expect such decision as this, such a distinct effort, for it is nothing less, to cut off the supplies from the Parnellite agitation, and we can only explain the Pope's action in one way. Leo XIII. is not only a philosopher, but a good man, and thoroughly detests the unscrupulousness which from first to last has marked this movement, and for which he condemns all priests who favour it. He has heard, as he could not but hear, from the Catholic nobles if from no one else, of the long series of agrarian outrages, murders, beatings, and boycottings, paid for no one knows how; he sees, as we all see, that for such crimes, to use his own words, "never in any way are censures pronounced," and, alike as gentleman and as the head of Catholic Christendom, his blood boils at such things; and he has denounced them, leaving all consequences to the God whose Minister in some special sense he claims to be. In so doing, he has only acted on the unbroken tradition of his Church; but those traditions have often slept, and Popes have usually been content to denounce evil, without naming names.

What the consequence of this utterance will be, it is hard as yet to tell. One consequence may be distinctly bad. Such of the Irish leaders as are defiantly infidel will obtain a higher place in the organisation, as being beyond all secret dread of the thunders of Rome; and their tendency will be towards violence, and they will choose for instruments men to whom the censures of all Churches are equally mere words. Utter infidelity, an entire disbelief in any power not entirely of this world, makes much of the strength of Nihilism. But no Irish party is strong without the sympathy of the people, and the question for politicians is the effect of the Pope's action upon the Catholic majority. It is one to which we at least can give no confident reply. There is no subject connected with the condition of Ireland so hopelessly puzzling as the religious attitude of the Catholic section of her people. They say they are Catholics, but on agrarian matters they will receive no guidance, they defy the parochial clergy, and they pay to any Bishop who differs with them a cold respect which is as little a sign of an intention to obey as open defiance. Mr. O'Donnell represents them, and he publicly ridicules the Pope as a simple old pastor, easily hoodwinked. The priests have been unable to check outrage, to prevent intimidation, or to obtain any reverence for the law. Thousands of Irishmen supposed to be faithful Catholics declare that the priests shall keep to the churches, and in a few cases the clergy have not been left free even there, for if the sermon has been too "strong" against breaches of the law, the congregations have walked out. The greatest clerics in Ireland, if known to be hostile to Parnellism, have been distinctly unpopular; and though the threats said to have been levelled at Cardinal McCabe were denied, the circulation of that report marked clearly the new attitude attributed to the Catholic laity. On the other hand, the Catholic Church retains a singular authority. On religious questions, Dr. Manning regulates a great many votes. A man like Carey finds it pay him not only to be exact in performing all ceremonial religious duties, but to join a special Brotherhood of the faith. Brady heard mass before he went to the Phoenix Park. The Philadelphia Convention selected a priest for chairman, and an attempt to "enfranchise" the meeting from "clerical ideas" was suppressed with the energy of alarm. The priestly approval or veto is still an important factor at elections, an irresistible one indeed, if the leading priests happen to be popular. It is impossible to be certain, for the evidence is hopelessly conflicting, but we presume that, as in all other Catholic countries, the Papal utterance will sever from the movement many good Catholics—not to its improvement—that it will immensely strengthen those Catholics who wish to resist, and that for the rest, it will be rather evaded than defied. The priests who favour Parnellism will not appear on platforms, but will be present in the body of the hall. Still, censure of this kind checks energy; and the Pope has given the world a test by which to judge his influence in Ireland. If the “Parnell Testimonial Fund,” directly and by name condemned in his Circular, proves fruitful either in Ireland or America, the authority of the Papacy over Irishmen has sunk to a low ebb. Lord Cairns, to judge by his recent speech, will exult at that; but calmer Protestants see reason to doubt whether in Catholic countries belief in the Church is not often inextricably bound up with belief in anything, even in the sanctity of human life. Bigots become assassins sometimes, but we have not seen in the Secret Societies which work by assassination any deep mark of respect for any Christian creed.

THE BARRISTERS' AGITATION.

THE recent meeting of the Bar, and the resolutions which it is understood to have adopted in favour of a more permanent and effective organisation of the Profession, have given rise to a good deal of speculation, and some alarm. It is a just instinct which leads the public, already too much at the mercy of an army of compact and well-disciplined “Interests,” to suspect that it is witnessing another, and this time a most formidable, accession to the ranks of its natural enemies. There is, moreover, it must be admitted, at first sight something that verges on the ridiculous in the spectacle of the Bar, of all people in the world, posing in the character of sheep without a shepherd. There is no profession which makes so much show, takes so many of the great prizes of life, or apparently exercises an influence at once so visible and so far-reaching and many-sided. What other class or calling is there in England which contributes anything like the same number of Members to the House of Commons, of writers to journalism, of successful candidates for the highest and best paid posts in the service of the State, both at home and abroad? The conditions, moreover, under which a great part of a successful barrister's work is done secure for him in a peculiar degree the attention and good-will of the public. The name, the face, the minatory tones, the slipshod style, the highly-flavoured and full-bodied humour of an eminent Nisi Prius leader are familiar to thousands to whom the personality of the most distinguished doctor, or engineer, or artist, is altogether unknown. It seems difficult, therefore, to believe that a profession so ostentatiously strong, possessing so many mouthpieces, carrying on its labours in the full glare of publicity, animated (as it is always supposed to be) with an unusually powerful esprit de corps, and by no means given to waiving its pretensions, should have been suffering in silent impotence, from its inability to take corporate action in defence of its own interests.

There is, no doubt, a certain amount of exaggeration, both in the complaints which the Bar is making of its present helplessness, and in the expectations which many of its members entertain of the benefits which the new organisation will confer. At the same time, it is certain that, powerful as the profession appears to be, and in many ways unquestionably is, its real strength for all corporate purposes, whether of internal control or of external influence, is singularly small. Nor is the explanation far to seek. The Bar is suffering from that worst form of anarchy which consists in the make-believe of government. In theory, the organisation of the profession is complete. No one can enter it except through one of the Four Inns of Court, each of which is governed by a body of Benchers, recruited from time to time from among the most distinguished and experienced practitioners. The enforcement of domestic discipline, the representation of the interests of the profession, the expression of its views in all public matters by which it is directly affected or in relation to which it can speak with peculiar authority, might naturally be supposed to be tasks which these eminent persons were both competent and zealous to discharge. When they were silent or inactive, it might reasonably be inferred that the Bar was either contented or indifferent. In fact, however, the governing bodies of the Inns of Court appear to have neither the will nor the power to perform the multiform and delicate duties which they alone, under the existing organisation of the Bar, are in a position to undertake. So far as the outside world can judge, their energies of late years have been mainly directed to the pulling-down of a number of more or less interesting old buildings, and the setting-up in their place of a number of more or less ugly new ones. It would be unfair to deny that they have rendered service to the profession, and done what they could to raise its educational standard, by the creation of professorships, the foundation of scholarships and prizes, and the institution of examinations. Nor can it be doubted that they deal justly and effectively with such cases of professional misconduct as are from time to time brought to their notice. But, for the most part, if they do good, they do it by stealth, and it would be difficult to name an occasion during the last ten years—one of the most critical periods in the history of the English Bar—upon which they have interposed to resist an encroachment, to remedy a grievance, or to suggest or support a beneficial reform.

The causes of the marked and growing impotence of the Inns of Court are to be found partly in the altered conditions under which the work of the profession is carried on, partly in the composition and character of the governing bodies themselves. Within the memory of living men, the Bar consisted of a comparatively small number of persons, all living and practising in London, under the eye and within easy reach of the arm of the paternal authority of the Masters of the Bench. Twice a year its members were dispersed over the country, on the various Circuits; but to prevent them from abusing their temporary freedom, they were environed, wherever they went, by an iron fence of protective etiquette, and subjected to the penal jurisdiction of the ambulatory Circuit Court. The profession was, in fact, governed by a kind of club law, which was easily enforced among a body of men not too numerous to be personally acquainted, bound together by community of pursuits and interests, and peculiarly well situated for making their wishes known and their influence felt. But this state of things has been completely changed by the large increase in the numbers of the Bar, and its gradual and growing decentralisation. Rules of conduct and prescriptions of etiquette which were well adapted to the old system have become unsuitable, nor is it even any longer possible to secure by means of the old machinery the observance of such of them as are fit to be retained. For the same reason, it is far more difficult than it used to be to ascertain and to find expression for the floating opinion of the profession. The Bar has, in short, reached a stage when it can neither be governed nor take any kind of effective corporate action without representative institutions. And the essential weakness of its existing organisation is that it is in no sense representative. The Benchers of the Inns of Court form, for most purposes, four entirely distinct and independent bodies. They are, moreover, constituted upon a thoroughly vicious principle, all vacancies being supplied by co-optation; while tradition dictates that no one shall be considered eligible who is not either a Queen's Counsel, or a “junior” who has long since passed his prime. The younger members of the Bar, who are, after all, a vast majority even of the practising part of it, are completely excluded from all share in the choice of its rulers and spokesmen. It is not to be wondered at that feebleness, want of initiative, and caution carried to the point of timidity should constantly mark the action of bodies which rest upon no popular basis, and are only accidentally in sympathy with the constituency on whose behalf they profess to speak and act. Accordingly, the main object of the recent meeting of the Bar was to secure the establishment of a permanent, elective Committee, on which the interests and ideas of all sections of the profession would be adequately represented.

If it be asked what interest the public has in a better organisation of the Bar, it ought to be a sufficient answer to point to the good results which have attended a similar process in the case of the other branch of the Legal Profession. The services rendered by the Incorporated Law Society, both to professional morality and to the improvement of the Law, have been conspicuously great. Every attorney of the baser sort lives with the fear of the Society constantly before his eyes, and there is good reason to believe that, in consequence of its strenuous and indefatigable efforts, the class is being sensibly thinned down. In the matter of Law reform, the value of the criticisms and suggestions which the Society, focussing as it does the opinions of a mass of experts, has from time to time offered, with reference both to the form and the substance of pending legislation, has been attested by successive Lord Chancellors. Like benefits may surely be expected from any such organisation of the disjecta membra of the Bar as will make the profession, for the first time for many years, really articulate, and capable of united action. The temptations to the grosser forms of professional misconduct are not great at the Bar, and are rarely yielded to; but the public is as much interested as the profession itself in a thorough revision, undertaken by competent hands, of its traditional regulations, conventions, and etiquettes. A quasi-legislative authority is urgently wanted, both to get rid of much that is antiquated and superfluous in its present code, and to lay down definite rules for cases which are now unprovided for. A really strong and representative Committee of the Bar would also be invaluable as an aid to Parliament in certain departments of general legislation. If, for instance, the Criminal Appeal Bill, which is battling its way wearily against the ignorant obstruction of Lord R. Churchill and his friends, had been submitted to and revised by such a body, it would have been presented to the House of Commons in a better form, and with far greater authority. And Parliament, having in its inscrutable wisdom entrusted to the Judges the power, which they use most liberally, of transforming our whole system of civil procedure from time to time at their discretion, it is certain that many past mistakes would have been avoided, as it is to be hoped that some which are now imminent may be averted, if all the new rules were laid in the first instance before the authorised representatives of the Bar.

THE SOUTH-AFRICAN COLONIES.—A SUGGESTION.

THERE is a tendency just now to exaggerate the badness of all news from South Africa. Many of the colonists are very sore at the absence of high-handedness in Liberal policy, and at what they think undue concessions to "Dutch" feelings and ideas. They represent every event—and events are always occurring in South Africa—in the worst light, and find eager allies among Tory speakers who have convinced themselves that "Mismanagement in South Africa" is an effective hustings cry. It is not, for the real feeling of the householders is that such matters are for Governments to arrange; but the Tories think so, and they therefore study all reports from the Cape, exaggerate them, and pour out the names of little-known chiefs and unknown localities with amusing fluency, and very often amusing ignorance. According to many of them, the Liberal Government is too lenient to Boers, and is therefore hated by the Dutch; too favourable to black men, and therefore hated by the tribes; too generous with its franchises, and therefore hated by the settlers! Nevertheless, in spite of all the allowances to be made on this account, the situation in South Africa cannot be pronounced good. The British Government, whether Tory or Liberal, succeeds there less than in any quarter of the world, except, perhaps, Ireland. The broad ends of its policy are never satisfactorily secured. The native population is never quite at peace; the Colonial Ministries are never quite content; the Boer Governments are never without an alleged grievance. The troubles, too, are not merely troubles, but always threaten to develop into explosions, which will lead, and that very rapidly, to demands for military intervention. We tolerate much in the Boer Governments, but still there is a point at which we should fall back on force. The Colonial Governments are let alone, but still they may force large territories on us, to defend or to give up to barbarism. We bear incessant native risings with equanimity; but still, if the white men were in danger, we should send out troops without delay. It is in ignoring that perplexity that the error of the Times lies. That journal has maintained for years, with unusual consistency, that our South-African possessions are not worth having, and that all power and responsibility should be handed over to the Colonists, with permission to do the best they can at their own expense. That would be easy advice, though immoral, if the Colonists were united, or were always certain to win; but neither of these conditions can be reckoned on with any certainty. The Dutch and the English are not united, and if the British Government withdrew, the Dutch element would probably demand supremacy under a threat of civil war, while the native strength is uninterruptedly increasing. Upon the first point there may be some difference of opinion, men like our correspondent of to-day, who live in towns and talk to the educated, reporting that the ill-feeling between the white races is not deep; but the mass of authority is all the other way. Mr. Gladstone has repeatedly stated that the Dutch, as a body, sympathise with the Boers, and Lord Kimberley only the other day declared that this was the difficulty of the situation. Without wary walking, he said, the Colonial Office might find itself resisted by two-thirds of the white population; that is, in fact, might have all South Africa to reconquer. Sir Hercules Robinson is coming home, it is said, to impress the same truth. That consideration alone is fatal to the Times' plan of withdrawal, while the second one, the increase of native strength, is never questioned. So strong is the pressure of emigrants from the North, so rapid the increase of the settled tribes, that a general rising of the dark races is always a possibility, and if it occurred, and there seemed even a chance of Europe being slaughtered out of Africa, the Times' policy of abstention would go at once to the winds. No Government could exist an hour which consciously permitted such a catastrophe.

Under these circumstances, might it not be worth the while of the Colonial Office to consider whether an intermediate authority between themselves and the South-African Colonies would not be of use? The effort to secure Federation has failed, for the time, owing partly to the Transvaal war, partly to the jealousies of the Colonies, and partly to the incurable difficulties of the Native question, but could not much of the benefit expected from that scheme be secured in another way? Suppose her Majesty were represented in South Africa by a Viceroy carefully selected, to whom the Governors would report, with whom the Boer Presidents would negotiate, and who would, as regards natives, possess all the authority the Crown and Parliament could give him. Such an officer might be invested with the commission of Captain-General, once or twice given in India—Lord George Bentinck, for example, held it—he would be for the Colonies a Colonial Office present on the spot, for the natives a Grand Protector, and for the Boer States a Plenipotentiary with whom they could negotiate frankly. Wielding such powers, in personal communication with the leaders of South-African politics, always on the spot, and always watching opinion, he would, we conceive, be able to remove, and frequently even to anticipate, difficulties which press severely on the Colonial Office, hampered as it necessarily must be by want of local knowledge, by conflicting reports, and by those defects of vision which so constantly debar exiles from understanding the precise situation in the countries they have left. If a Viceroy is useful anywhere, it should be in a country of vast extent, filled with nearly independent States and tribes, and harassed by differences of race, of colour, and of civilisation. A supreme referee upon the spot, placed above the strife of parties, is always necessary in such circumstances, if it be only to keep the Home Government informed as a competent Ambassador would do; but the Viceroy could do more, for he could steadily impress upon all British representatives that, so far as they needed British aid, a definite line of policy must be adhered to. Moreover, he would adhere to it himself, and so steady the policy of the Colonial Office, which in a country like South Africa is apt to respond too readily to party changes at home.

It may be said that the experiment has been tried, a High Commissioner having several times been appointed, not always with success. The High Commissioner, however, has always been a Governor of some one colony, has always been something of a partisan, and has never been able to travel easily, to confer with the Chiefs of the Independent States, or to make Colonists, Boers, and Natives alike understand the separateness of his position. The Viceroy should be free of detailed duties, should regard himself as Ambassador far more than ruler, and should be of such rank among politicians that Governments could quote his authority as one in which they confided. He should be, in fact, the kind of man whom a good Government selects for the Viceroyalty of India. We have always hoped that the Government might one day be able to avail itself at the Cape of its own good-fortune in possessing in the House of Lords a Peer who is also a Dutch noble, who is familiar with the inner feelings of both races, and who would be at all events understood by both. Lord Reay, born Baron Bentinck, and trained to diplomatic work in the service of the Netherlands, would, if he would accept the post, make a perfect representative of the Crown in South Africa; but the suggestion is independent of any individual name. What is wanted is a man of high rank, familiar at once with administration and diplomacy, who could represent England on the spot, hold together the various and often-conflicting authorities—could reign, as far as natives were concerned—and be, in fact, the Colonial Office on the spot, in the very face of the problem which so puzzles them, and which may be measured by a single week's news. Since Friday week, the country has been informed authoritatively that Cetewayo has been defeated in a rather serious engagement,—which means possible anarchy in Zululand; that the Basutos have all broken loose,—which means that the Cape Ministry will declare them subjects of the Crown only; that President Brand, of the Orange River Free State, has demanded the fulfilment of the Aliwal Convention with him,—which means that Great Britain must conquer the Basutos, lest they should trouble the Free State; and that the Cape Government is sending home the Attorney-General to confer with Lord Derby,—which means that the Cape statesmen see difficulties close ahead not to be settled by despatches. None of these things may come to much, for, as we have said, all affairs at the Cape are exaggerated by the atmosphere through which we see them; but they are all serious enough to make politicians long for a little white light. As for cost, no South-African trouble ever lets the Treasury off under millions.

THE EFFECT OF CONSCRIPTION ON LITTLE WARS.

IT is often said, and generally believed, that the enormous Standing Armies which in these days Continental States deem it expedient to maintain tend to render wars more frequent, and peace less secure. The correctness of this view is, however, open to very grave question. There can be little doubt that universal military service, whereby alone great standing armies can be raised, especially when associated with universal suffrage, makes aggressive warfare less probable, and distant expeditions more difficult. Only those who have lived in countries where military service is universal can form any adequate idea of the terrible memories left by the most glorious of wars, and of the unspeakable horror with which the bare possibility of future wars is regarded. It was the lot of the present writer to spend two years in Germany shortly after the war of 1870-71, and he saw and heard enough to convince him that only under pressure of the sternest necessity will this or the rising generation of Germans engage in another contest. For universal military service is all-devouring. Once the Army is mobilised, every valid man between twenty and twenty-eight must go to the front. Should the struggle continue, and the Landwehr be called out, the limit of age is extended to thirty-three. The only son of his mother, the rising physician, the popular advocate, the busy merchant, the spoiled darling of fortune, the newly-married workman,—all must shoulder the Mäuser, don the pickelhaube, fare as common soldiers fare, and face wounds, hardship, and death. Except among officers hungry for promotion, and young men eager for excitement and adventure, the mere idea of war is viewed in Germany with a repugnance which in England is hardly conceivable. A considerable proportion of the Germans who leave their country for the Far West, leave it less to better their condition than to avoid the incidence of military service. The two great wars in which Germany since 1815 has been involved were in both instances followed by a portentous increase of emigration. Ask an American-German, or his son sent to the old country for his education, which country he prefers,—that of his birth or of his adoption. The answer is invariably the same,—“America, of course. There is no military service there!” Nobody knows better than Prince Bismarck the wretchedness wrought by war, a wretchedness far more keenly felt by those who stay at home than by those who have to face the bullets of the foe. The survivors are always the greatest sufferers. His never-ceasing efforts to strengthen Germany by alliances arise far more from a desire to reduce the chances of war by a general understanding among the Military Powers than from fear of French revenge,—a fear for which there was never less warrant than at the present moment, war being even more dreaded and universal military service more detested in France than in Germany. The system in France is comparatively new; the people are more restive and rebellious, and by reason of the relative smallness of their families, the blood-tax is harder on the French than on their neighbours. The German peasant, with three or four sons—and most German peasants have three or four sons—can spare one at a time for military duty without serious inconvenience; but when the French peasant parts with one of his two children (the regulation number) he loses his right-hand, and the mere hint of a possible war drives him positively wild. “What is the feeling of people in Savoy about the connection with France?” asked the present writer, a few days ago, of an intelligent Savoyard peasant. “We would rather be French than Italian,” was the answer, “so long as there are no more wars.”

The tendency of universal military service to make people more pacific is, indeed, too palpable to be denied. It arises from the nature of things. Citizen soldiers, who would fight cheerfully in defence of their country, would not easily be induced to risk their lives in an unprovoked attack on a neighbouring nation; and in France and Germany, the right to vote and the liability to serve go together. The Tunisian war showed most significantly that universal military service is incompatible with distant expeditions, except on a very small scale. The reason is obvious. A French regiment is composed of the men actually with the colours and of the reservists. The latter have served their time, and nothing save imminent war with a great Power would justify their recall to the regiment. Of the men with the colours, some have only just joined and are not fit to serve, and some have so nearly completed their term of service that it would not be worth while to send them far from home. The residue—perhaps half, possibly only a third of the regiment—would consist of men who had two years to serve, and even they would not be seasoned soldiers, capable of sustaining the hardships of a campaign in such countries as Anam or Madagascar. These are the reasons which rendered the organisation of the expedition to Tunis so difficult, and which compel the French Government to send out reinforcements to Tonquin in dribbles of 1,000 or 1,500 men at a time, most, if not all, of whom have either volunteered expressly for the occasion, or belong to the Foreign Legion or to the Infanterie and Artillerie de Marine, which are composed exclusively of volunteers, and constitute in effect the sole force of which the French Government can dispose for carrying out a policy of adventure. We have been at some pains to ascertain the strength of this force. The Foreign Legion numbers, at its full strength, 3,000 men; but recruits are often lacking, and its effective strength cannot safely be computed at more than 2,500. According to La Statistique of Maurice Bloert, the Infanterie de Marine, including the transport service, consists nominally of 15,215 men. But the force is far below its proper strength; it contains many non-combatants, and Éliacé Reclus, in a recent communication to a friend, estimates the effective strength of the Marine Infantry and Artillery at 16,000 men at the outside. We have thus something less than 20,000 men, all seasoned soldiers, theoretically available for distant expeditions, without disorganising the regular army by breaking up regiments, or creating discontent among the peasantry by sending their sons to perish in African jungles, or conquer colonies in the China Seas. But as some of these men must be retained for service in the Fleet, and several detachments are on duty in the West Indies, Cayenne, and elsewhere, the number actually available is probably not more than from 10,000 to 15,000. With so slender a force it is impossible to do much, and men in authority, however much they may desire “to extend the influence of France,” are compelled, in the main, to keep to the fireside policy which universal military service, by bringing home to every French citizen the unpleasantness of war, has imposed upon them. The same difficulty is experienced in other countries where a similar system prevails. During the debate on the Egyptian Question in the Italian Parliament, the Minister frankly admitted that one of the reasons why the Government declined to join England in the suppression of Arabi's insurrection was the difficulty of organising a force for foreign service. And yet Italy has a standing army of 200,000 men, and a potential force of 1,400,000! The lesson of Tunis has not been lost. We owe the non-intervention of France in Egypt, as well as of Italy, more to the exigencies of universal military service than to deliberate policy. So long as that system obtains, peace is likely to prevail. When voters have to fight in person, they will not sanction wars the causes of which they do not clearly understand, and in defence of which they are not willing to lay down their lives. Sanction for the expedition to Tonquin was only obtained by official statements that there would be no war.

THE CO-OPERATIVE CONGRESS.

THE figures given in the Report presented to the Fifteenth Co-operative Congress are not very clearly set out, and they are not quite identical with those quoted by Mr. Baxter in his opening address. But even with these drawbacks they are exceedingly striking. The Societies which made returns for the year 1881 were 865, with 515,000 members. The total sales for the year came to very nearly twenty millions, the net profit on which amounted to £1,333,513. These profits were made on a share capital of not quite six millions. In Scotland there were 238 societies, with 85,439 members. The total sales for the year were £3,496,137, and the net profit £303,733, on a share capital of £473,633. Taking the ten years from 1872 to 1881, Mr. Baxter says the profits on the share capital have been at the rate of 29 per cent. per annum for England and 65 per cent. per annum for Scotland. It would be interesting to know why there should be so great a difference in the rate of profit between the two countries. The only reason that suggests itself is that to the Scottish mind it is more pleasant to see much money coming in than to see little going out. In a co-operative society the members have their choice between paying little for the goods they buy and paying highly for the goods, while receiving large returns in the shape of bonuses on their purchases. Mr. Baxter speaks as though there was something creditable in the fact that the dividend of the Scottish Societies is "more than double that which had been realised by our friends on the other side of the Tweed." This national self-glorification surely betrays that infection of nature which doth remain, yea in them that are regenerate. It savours of the old pride in making large profits out of a public which was regarded as the appointed prey of the retail tradesman, and as such has no place in the new world of Co-operation. Who pay this dividend of 65 per cent.? The purchasers. Who receive this dividend of 65 per cent.? The purchasers. It is merely a transfer from one pocket to another. There is no question about this, because the interest on the share capital is allowed for before the net profit is calculated. Consequently, there is neither merit nor demerit in paying large dividends. That I give ninepence at a Scottish Co-operative Store for what I could buy at a similar store in England for fivepence, is really of no importance whatever. In the one case, I receive fourpence back at the end of the year; in the other case, I receive nothing. The article, whatever it is, costs me precisely the same in the two cases, unless, indeed, my purchases are so large as to make it a serious matter to lie so long out of the money. All that is really essential to the success of a Co-operative Society is that the prices shall be fixed sufficiently high to guard against any possibility of loss, and for this purpose a moderate return in the shape of bonus to purchasers is the best and simplest system that can be adopted.

Besides the numerous Societies with which the Co-operative Congress dealt, there are the great London Distributing Agencies. The accounts of the five largest of these were given in the Statist of last Saturday. Their annual sales in 1882 amounted to £4,778,530. Their gross profits in the same year were close upon £450,000. A single society, the Army and Navy, sold last year £2,148,288, and made a gross profit of £189,864. With the exception of the Manchester Wholesale Co-operative Society, of which the sales are £4,500,000 a year, the Army and Navy is the largest Store in the kingdom. The main difference between these Societies and the Working-men's Societies is that in the latter the dividend on capital is limited to £5 per cent., and any surplus profit is divided among the purchasers; whereas, in the former, there is no restriction on the dividends beyond the interest of the shareholder not to drive away trade by unduly high prices. In fact, the London Societies are really Joint-Stock Companies for the distribution of all goods in general request, and, in the first instance, there was nothing to prevent them from putting their charges at any figure which would still leave the purchaser an advantage in dealing with them. Now, however, a new form of rivalry has risen up, which promises in the future to exercise a very effectual check on this tendency. The points in which Co-operative Stores have the advantage over the shops which they are superseding are ready-money payments, the saving of the cost of carriage, and the large scale on which they do business. How is an ordinary shopkeeper to stand up against them in any one of these respects? His customers are accustomed to have long credit given them, and if he refuses it, they leave him. He has to keep men, carts, and horses to deliver at short notice very much fewer parcels than he could deliver with the same staff, if he could but secure the necessary orders. He cannot hope to increase his trade, because he sells only one class of goods, and even in this has half-a-dozen rivals in the same street. Consequently, he cannot bring his prices anywhere near those charged at the Stores, unless he either sells inferior goods, or submits in the long-run to make a loss, instead of a profit. Now, however, there are shops which do business on as large a scale as the Stores, insist as rigidly on ready-money payments, and only differ from them in providing free carriage. So far as the convenience of the buyer goes, shops of this kind have the advantage of the Stores. The prices charged are about the same, the delivery of the goods is more rapid, and there is not the constant sense of having to pay extra for it. Still, the cost of delivery has to be met somehow, and if it is not paid by the purchaser, it must come out of the profits of the shopkeeper. But if the shopkeeper is to contend successfully with the Stores, he must charge prices which only return the shareholders of the Stores some 5 per cent. on their capital; and if out of this he has to deduct the cost of delivering the goods, how will it be worth his while to sell at all? The answer to this question touches upon the really weak point in the Co-operative system, —its inferior command of individual energy and individual courage. If the manager of a Co-operative Store is unconscientious, he is likely to be careless about a business which, after all, is not his. If he is conscientious, he is likely to be timid in the expenditure of money which, after all, is not his. These are the two rocks upon which Co-operative Societies almost necessarily run, and neither of these has any dangers for the private trader. He has a direct and immediate interest in pushing his business, and if, in order to do this, he runs any serious risk, he puts no one in peril but himself. He may reckon, therefore, upon making very much more than the £5 per cent. which contents the shareholders in a Co-operative Society, and out of this margin will come the cost of carriage.

Thus the Retail Trade of the future seems to reveal itself as divided between Co-operative Stores and those large private concerns which can afford to supply the best goods at equally low prices. We shall not pretend to see in this a perfect millennium. The small shopkeepers are, after all, a very numerous and a very industrious class, and the prospect of their slow, but inevitable extinction, is not to be welcomed with enthusiasm. They have been very useful in the past, and between them and their customers there is a link of human sympathy which, if it be not always perfectly disinterested, is at least more attractive than the universal indifference with which one of a hundred shopmen takes down the orders of one of ten thousand buyers. "They always," says Miss Thackeray of the tradespeople, in "Old Kensington," "conversed with their customers while they measured a yard of silk, or sold a skein of thread across their counters. Dolly would feel flattered when Mr. Baize found her gown. Even Lady Sarah would graciously reply to his respectful inquiries after her health, on the rare occasions when she shopped herself." Pleasures of this sort will not hold their own against the current of a great social change, but it is what we cannot keep that we most naturally regret. It may be that the constantly changing conditions of modern civilisation will disclose some new chance for the small retail traders. What form that chance will take cannot now be foreseen; possibly, indeed, it will only be developed out of a more complete ruin than has yet overtaken the class it is to benefit.

THE INTERNATIONAL FISHERIES EXHIBITION.

ONE'S first vague impression is that one has "been there," in a previous state of existence; and that impression settles down into a combined reminiscence of the Exhibition in 1862, the permanent marine department of the Museum over the way, and the life-saving inventions at the Agricultural Hall last year. There is a suggestion of the Trocadero in the curved galleries sweeping away from the great conservatory, where the Queen's State Barge lies in state, a dead emblem, disinterred after a hundred years, and attended by mutes in scarlet and badgcs; but the Prince's Pavilion, with its £9,000 worth of solidly sumptuous upholstery, and its darkness visible, leaving the Windsor tapestries upon the walls to be taken on trust or seen by electric light—hardly appropriate to a summer show—is a less agreeable, though a more magnificent object than the maisonette in the Champ de Mars, whose doors only have been transferred to South Kensington. The foreign flavour of the great show speedily makes itself felt, for not only are the representative fishing people to be seen in each division, but a much-bearded Canadian of preoccupied aspect, who might be one of the "brothers" of Moore's beautiful old song, paddles his own canoe in a very navigable pond, and two live pelicans stand on one leg apiece in the water, with their big bills despondent, as though regretful of the distant delights of free fishing—in the Nile, perhaps—and contemplating a resentful dive at the holiday crowd, which is everywhere. An animated crowd, interested and good-humoured, with much strange speech among it, such as one has not heard since '62; and in the practical galleries, down Dutch and Canadian ways especially, a prevalence of the marine element. Ham Peggotty is well to the fore, and with his "mates" is curious as to nets and boats—not of the pleasure pattern—and frankly suspicious of the sea-going sincerity of the Chinese division (entirely perfect in its arrangement, and as serenely ready as if it had been there for a year, when every other was in wild confusion), on account of the glow of colour, the flaunting, outlandish flags, and the great, undulating, glittering, red-bearded dragons that guard the doorway. "This here's a theayter!" said Ham, with a disconcerted pull at his loose neckkerchief, as he caught sight of a sculptured group of spectacled Mandarins, seated in carved arm-chairs in a grove of Chinese lanterns, and also found himself in the living presence of a mild yellow gentleman (in blue silk, with a wide black hat, a bare throat, and shoes like flat-irons) whose calm politeness seemed to control the crowd, so that "China" was a restful haven, in comparison with the Western world.

Only a superficial view is possible on a first visit to this gigantic Exhibition, which has aroused interest amounting to enthusiasm, and got an immense amount of work out of everybody concerned in it; and that view is generally, but not completely, satisfactory. The main effect is grandiose, but while one is astonished at the amount of invention, art, and decoration, occasionally dropping into poetry, connected with fish, one also observes the ugliness of the chief entrance, with its prison-like barriers, the ill-arranged trophy of patchy flags stuck up against bare boards in the "hall," instead of being displayed upon a draped background; the vulgar, staring advertisements, worthy of a Continental railway waiting-room; and the hideous, heavy cases, so judiciously placed that they hide the valuable series of paintings lent by the Fishmongers' Company, and afford a fine relief for the thrilling announcements above-mentioned. Lastly, the ugliest clock (we hope) that ever was made in this world,—a clumsy, plate-shaped, black-faced monster (with a fine voice, though), urges its monotonous lesson upon holiday-making mankind about as attractively as a school black-board. The incessant din of the newspaper and programme boys, reminding one of the opposition bawlers in the streets on dynamite days, might be suppressed with advantage; and perhaps it would not be too much of an infringement of British liberty, if visitors to the vast and very picturesque gallery in which the boats, sails, and sail-making are exhibited were invited to "circulate," after the French fashion, going down on one side and coming back on the other. At present, they are suggestive of Malays running amok, but happily unprovided with the kris. The determined explorer who forces himself into the narrow passage behind the cases in the hall will find some pictures worth looking at, especially Scott's Westminster and London Bridges, in 1757, (the latter reminds one of the old ferry-song, "Sing ho, my Lady Lee!") and a few by Arnold van Hacken, in which fish are treated, now with Zola-like realism as to their insides, and again, with a touch of artistic feeling. There is one dramatic, blunt-nosed gasper expiring against a background of flat-fish, with a gashy mouth somewhere near its waist, that is quite fascinating. In the "Fine Arts" department adjoining the hall sentiment is not wanting. We could dispense with a monstrous picture of a fish-stall and its saleswomen, that occupies the place of honour; but the fish portraits, the river scenes, the "Anglers' Delights" (one is benignly presided over by a cathedral), the pretty ruralities illustrative of the gentle craft, with its impudent assumption that the silvery victims "don't mind it," the peculiarly mild jokes in which "piscatorial artists" indulge, and the recognition of a quiet but absorbing enthusiasm, leading to the braving of wet feet and chills, which, however incomprehensible to us, possesses wholly a great number of our not insane fellow-creatures, render this preliminary to the severer purposes of the Exhibition very pleasant. The jokes on canvas "took" like the fish. "The Biter Bit"—a very replete pike being triumphantly landed—was much appreciated, and "A Catastrophe" collected an admiring crowd, as well it might, for the too confiding cat who has staked upon the black, not the red, lobster, and is securely nipped in a strong, short claw, makes an uncommonly clever picture. An adjacent otter, with his prey, is tragic after the manner of a Briton Rivière, reminding us of a tribute once offered by a domestic poet to a feline pet,—

"With all my paws, and all my jaws,
My food I claws."

The arrangement here is very pretty; everywhere are marine emblems, flags, anchors, and nets in festoons, and the long vista beyond, stretching down to the Goods' Entrance, like an enormous light tunnel, with flags, nets, machinery, boats, all sorts of things that give one a general sensation of being "on board," with several thousands of shipmates and a month or so to shake down in, is charming. But there is the fish-market to tempt us at one side, while endless colonnades in every direction invite us to come and learn all about fisheries all over the world; splendid cases display the treasures of the great deep, and tell of the peril of those that go down to the sea in ships; the manifold industrial devices of the Thames Mission appeal to public support on behalf of its objects; the huge stand of the Bible Society is prominent, as becomes it; and Lady Brassey's wonderful collection of coral, madrepore, carved shells, feather and shell ornaments, and other objects from the Southern Seas, is surrounded all day long by an admiring crowd. Curiosity, rather than admiration, is aroused by a stand containing articles of use and ornament, cunningly contrived from crab and lobster-shells mounted in silver and gold. These are ingenious, but ugly: knives and forks with handles formed of lobster-claws are objects which every gentleman's dinner-table is better without, so far as comfort is concerned. Equally uncongenial is the notion of a toilet mirror framed in the distended jaw of a shark. Death and the Lady, indeed! The force of eccentricity and bad taste could hardly go farther. A fish market (approached by a Gothic gateway of twisted columns) forming an agreeable promenade, and where the smells, if "fish-like," do not get time to become "ancient," is a pleasant novelty. Here one may behold fishes beautifully becalmed in transparent slabs of ice, and mysterious to the uninitiated as flies in amber, green vases of ferns and water-plants and artistically treated seaweed, "wet" fish, shell-fish (the oyster stalls have suggestive cruets on the premises), fresh-water fish, the sportive French crayfish all alive in a tank, unconscious of the dainty sealed bottles of his ultimate expression (bisque d'écrevisses) on the slab above him, the pale-pink prawn, and the familiar shrimp, in persuasive half-pint packets, handy for the proletariat tea, as a souvenir from South Kensington.

Who shall tell of the tinned fish and the dried fish, of the kippered salmon and the roe of cod, of the herring "cured" to every taste, national and particular; of the pretty canisters of condiments, provocative of unappeasable thirst, ready to be sent out to our dear ones in India; and the nice adaptation of the fan and the festoon to the arrangement of Finnan "haddies," Yarmouth bloaters, and "the herrin" of all the seas? How gay are the stalls, how little sloppy (considering) is the pavement; what models of locomotive elegance are the light vans, blue-grey, picked out with red, for market purposes,—chariots in which Masaniello might have driven, and King Naso held his fish auction—how well the "bit of red" shows up in banks of lobster, and what a pretty lightness is lent to the scene by the globes of perpetually circumnavigating gold and silver fish! To say that one's mind expands alarmingly on the subject of sauce, is sternly made up to have it out with the cook on the piscatorial monotony of existence, and to stand no nonsense for the future, is feebly to express the effect of the fish market, and what we may take leave to call the oil-and-pickle arcade. The latter is a truly amazing place; one gets to the end of it, receiving by the way a tribute of glazed cards, silently presented, with a notion that, in a world in which so many good things are to be had in such beautiful bottles and such loves of pots, life should be worth living, in a flat, with a tall press in the wall crammed with "selections" from all the compressive countries—chiefly Norway—in peace unbroken by any "tradesman," except the baker, though, indeed, even he might be baffled by biscuits. But from this "fond, fond vision, happy, happy dream!" one must awake, for it is not business, and Canada calls, Columbia hails, North and South summon one to behold how they each and all bring their harvests "home from all the seas." There is the foreign fish market on the other side, and some day, late in June, perhaps, one may reach it; and there is the promenade, a vast play-ground, where the bands perform, and concerts are to be given (with "O Pescator!" "Tom Bowling," and Dibdin generally, let us hope). And there is India, approached by a noble entrance, with such alligators as would not condescend to call cousins with the feeble and muddy reptiles we have hitherto been put off with, stuffed, and sleeping sweetly on the roof. Then one is wanted in Russia, and in Poland (a country we do not naturally think of as connected with fish), in Heligoland and Scandinavia, all over Italy, Greece, Spain, and France, up at Stornoway and the Lewis with Sheila's people, in the Bahamas, where the fish have strange faces; down among those wonderful Dutchmen in the Low Countries, so "bad to beat" at anything, whether it be an art of war or peace; away in our own Australian Colonies, admirably represented according to their wont; in Japan, where the swarming sea and rivers are the life-source of the people; in China, where fish-culture is carried to a height that astonishes even at a passing glance, and would reward the closest study; in short, everywhere, and all at once. Breathes there a man or woman in the vast enclosure, a garden no longer, but where flirtation still flourishes, who is not eager to contemplate the sea-fishes in the aquarium, see Grace Darling's boat, and make a call on the Marquis of Exeter's whale? Not only can one not do it all, but one can only grasp a small portion of what there is to do. There's fascination for a week in China only; in the beautiful fishing fleet, with grass-mat sails, that seems to be coming to shore with a fair wind; in the slender and fragile-looking, but almost indestructibly strong fishing apparatus, all made of bamboo; in the wonderful silk nets (as fine as those our children used to have their golden hair packed into before mane-and-fringe time) with which the unwary fish are caught by the gills; in the curious oyster-culture processes, and seine fishing with rafts. Then there is the tetradon, a knobbly, bladder-shaped creature, used by the Chinese as a lantern, when he has been scooped; a collection of beautiful shells, and a hammer-headed shark from Formosa; models of boats with luminous edges for fishing by moonlight (we are not even a match-box ahead of the Yellow Man), and of the salt-pans used all over the vast empire that has no salt mines. The cases of fish, resting on their fins at the bottom of spirits-of-wine lakes, the admirable drawings by native artists, the beautiful models of cargo-junks, a fishing-house, and a fisherman's temple; the otter-nets, in which the terror of the finny tribes is let down to fish, not for his own paw, but for his master's behoof; the innumerable inventions that tell of the patient toil of the Yellow People, and their wonderful faculty for utilising everything, render this division supremely interesting. Then there is the Stuffed-fish Department, which has its fascination, not for the captors only, to whom each cool, contemplative, anxious-looking specimen represents a victory. For instance, Mr. Pugh's trophies, "all taken in three years" from the bosom of Father Thames, are positively characteristic; they are poised, not pinned, in their cases; and two dace, in particular, are passing one another, with that strictly unrecognising, minding-their-own-business aspect, which no one who has learned the various expressions of fish, by watching them in an aquarium, will fail to observe. There is in the same collection an otter climbing up a rock, with a fish in his jaws, that is a triumph of taxidermy. The fierce satisfaction and anticipation in the compression of the jaw and nostrils, and the grip of the hinder claws on the wet stone, bringing out the muscles of the leg, are perfect. But, neither is the Stuffed-fish collection the business of the Exhibition. It is no use; it cannot be done; the International Fisheries afford the latest example of those things that are "not to be tasted in a sip."

MR. AUBREY DE VERE ON THE SCEPTICAL BIAS.

IN a remarkable article contributed to the current number of the Nineteenth Century, by Mr. Aubrey de Vere, on "The Subjective Difficulties in Religion," he discusses at some length the question whether the alleged inability of the modern reason to believe in religious truth be due to the defect of the creed which it rejects, or to the defect of the intelligence which rejects it. If the flaw be in the former, of course the rejection is right. In that case, reason has detected, what it is the proper function of reason, by comparing, and measuring, and analysing, to detect, notes of error—intrinsic flaws—in the object of study, or intrinsic contradictions between the constitution of the faculty which conducts the study and that attitude of reverence for the object presented to it for consideration, which the creed requires. The historian who studies the story of Cagliostro finds that in a great number of instances, while pretending to much greater knowledge than his dupes, he acted just as if he possessed just thus much more knowledge than they, and thus much more only, that he knew they were easily to be duped, while they did not even know as much as that. If, on the contrary, the same historian examines the careers (say) of St. Francis of Assisi or John Howard, and finds the whole of those careers explicable only by the key of a devout and self-sacrificing holiness, he decides that these are lives to be interpreted from above, and not from beneath. Just so, if our reason discovers in a creed presented to its acceptance as a creed from above, that it is just what might be manufactured from below, and that it contains nothing of a nature to stimulate, elevate, fortify, and subdue us, as supernatural wisdom must, then we should rightly reject it as spurious. On the other hand, if the defect lies not in the creed, but in the intelligence which too feebly, hastily, and inadequately attempts to grasp the creed, then what we might expect to find, and what Mr. De Vere believes that we do find, would be this,—that, so far as the creed is really apprehended, the mind which apprehends it is strengthened, widened, stimulated, elevated, and also chastened; and that those who fail to apprehend it, fail also in gaining this additional strength, stimulus, elevation, and healthy humiliation, and consequently seem to miss something of calm, of strength, of loftiness, and of humility, for which there is room in them. Such is the point of view from which Mr. Aubrey De Vere discusses what he calls "the subjective difficulties in religion," in other words, the sceptical bias. He holds that the sceptical bias is one which speaks of defect in us, not one which is caused by the flaws in the object presented to us for our spiritual acceptance.

Mr. De Vere insists, of course, very naturally and very truly, on the complete unfitness of the sceptical bias for the early lessons of life. "It is through a sympathetic and joyous docility," he says, "that we learn to walk, to speak, to exercise and direct our first affections, to reach out to the rudiments of all wisdom." That is true, and yet Mr. De Vere does not do justice to the sceptical bias, when he only insists on its complete incapacity for the early training of the mind. Of course, the child who should refuse the guidance of its parents, through premature scepticism, would perish of hunger; and the heart that should resist the growth of instinctive love, through premature distrust, would perish of ossification; but then it may fairly be answered that the time for the activity of the sceptical bias is not in childhood, that it comes later, so soon as the growing mind comes into contact, as it soon must, with misleading experiences and with profound moral disappointments. Mr. De Vere does not concede enough to the sceptical bias. It is perfectly true, as the man of science tells us, that without the sceptical bias, we should never have had the inductive sciences, if, indeed, any sciences at all. The man who dared to doubt whether the sun really rises as it appears to rise, dared a doubt which was prolific of true astronomy. The man who dared to doubt whether any tradition of custom could justify the enslavement of human beings like ourselves, dared a doubt which was prolific of true morality. The man who dared to doubt whether it could be pious to persecute those who met their persecutors with radiant forgiveness, dared a doubt which was prolific of true faith. Mr. De Vere is unjust to the sceptical bias, when he ignores this. It is perfectly true, as he says, that all healthy human life begins in "a joyous docility," but it is equally true that almost all healthy human life soon dashes itself against the rock of some misleading lesson, some poignant disillusion, some authoritative iniquity, some successful hypocrisy, and it is then that the proper moment for the development of the sceptical bias comes. True, even then the highest sceptical bias is only faith, or love, or trust in disguise; it is not scepticism simply, but resistance to some demand on faith which offends a deeper faith, repudiation of some illusion of the senses which violates the conditions of some intellectual principle of our being, rejection of some exercise of authority which implies disloyalty to some higher authority though one less ostentatious and less outwardly peremptory. All this we admit to Mr. De Vere; but none the less, his striking article seems by appearing to condemn the sceptical bias as wholly unfavourable to the true growth of man, whereas, in some form, it is essential to that growth. He approves the Socratic doubt which "doubts our doubts away;" but not, apparently, any other kind of doubt, any kind which takes at first a more serious form. Now, we maintain that though the true sceptical bias is rooted in faith, it is yet rooted in a faith which often sets him who cherishes it at odds with all the so-called natural authorities about us, and which requires us to assume the attitude not only of incredulity, but of rebellion, towards teachers who seem to be set over us, and to be the natural guardians both of the public peace and of domestic life. It can hardly be said that the sceptical bias is wholly misleading, if there be, as we believe there are, great eras of the world, and little eras in everybody's private life, when the primary duty is to trust the impulse of distrust, when the highest belief is involved in a stern incredulity, when the truest humility expresses itself in the attitude of insubordination, and the "non-possumus" of modest defiance. It is true that the highest life begins in "joyous docility," but it is not true that that goes very far before the bias of scepticism should begin to play its part. The only fault we find with Mr. De Vere's paper is in its apparent ignoring of the value of that part, and even of its direct service to the cause of lofty and living faith. In one of the finest passages of his essay, Mr. De Vere says that the soul always exercises its freedom most in humbling itself before a truth which solicits it from above:—

"The will, the spiritual within us, when it is a 'good will,' becomes the highest expression of our freedom, lifting the reason into its loftiest sphere, and delivering the heart from the thralldom of inferior motives. The obedience of this nobler will to grace is the fiat which unites man with God; and faith, the light of the soul, is the child of that union. The Creator's primal 'fiat lux' was an act of supreme authority; the creature's 'fiat voluntas tua' is an act of humility, and irradiates the world within."

That is powerfully put; but surely Mr. De Vere understands that in a world of appearances many of which are so false, there must come—almost for every one before mature faith can be reached—a time when the challenge of illusion, sometimes so fierce a challenge of illusion as to run on into passionate cynicism, takes the place of "joyous docility." As we grow up to manhood, we see so many false things sheltering themselves under the pretext of representing God's will, so much authority that is blind and cruel, so much morality that is a bad kind of conventionality, so much religion that is mere hypocrisy, that it is no wonder a question arises in many a soul as to whether this is God's world at all, and even after that is decided in the affirmative, as to whether any specific claim made upon us in God's name is really divine, or something very much short of divine, even down to the point of being diabolic.

Mr. De Vere seems to make no allowance for this almost necessary stage in the growth of every adequately matured mind, the stage in which the mind runs the gauntlet of a hundred falsehoods, and is, unless singularly pure, brought to the very edge of utter disbelief in the divine will as the basis of things. But even the purest has to go through this battle with falsehood and illusion, this encounter with mocking shadows and evil dreams. And it is a healthy scepticism which challenges these false appearances, and requires even divine truths to stand and make good their authority to the heart, before it surrenders itself to their guidance. Long after the 'fiat voluntas tua' has been honestly said, the painful doubt and difficulty as to what the divine will really is, goes on. Hence, the sceptical instinct is given us, as we believe, as a necessary buttress to faith in such a world as ours. If we are to believe strongly, we must disbelieve strongly too. We must challenge strenuously all sorts of shams which come before us wearing the exterior appearance and presenting themselves in the name of divine authority. It may be—we agree with Mr. De Vere that it is—"something in ourselves" which prevents us from accepting all the divine truth which we might otherwise accept and live by; but this is only the excess of that other "something in ourselves" which prevents us from taking what is false as if it were true, and what is plausible as genuine. It seems to us that in a healthy mind, scepticism is the complement of faith. We do not quite agree with Tennyson that, "there is more faith in honest doubt, believe me, than in half the creeds," but we do hold that the truth in the creeds can never be heartily appropriated by those who have not first doubted either the true creeds themselves, or the false creeds which come to them with all the authority of the true, and without having tested link by link the strength of each imposing claim. All that we should condition for in the sceptical bias is that it be true scepticism, and not unbelief, that is, true suspense of judgment till the truth be found, and should be based on a deep conviction that to him who will search patiently and perseveringly enough, the truth is to be found; and will be, when found, the solid foundation of all true life, the sure light of God. The sceptical instinct itself,—the instinct for challenging superficial appearances,—far from being a mere defect in the human intellect, appears to us to be intended, in this world of outsides, as a kind of guardian angel of true faith. If our minds be only half fit to take in truth, they are a great deal too fit to take in falsehood, and but for the sceptical instinct, they would swallow falsehoods wholesale, and live on them till they were poisoned. Mr. De Vere, it is certain, does not do full justice to the sceptical bias.

BRITISH MILLIONAIRES.

A LITTLE more than ten years ago, having an interest in that curious and little-studied subject, the History of Property, we published a list, compiled from the Illustrated London News, of all British fortunes exceeding a quarter of a million personally which had been transferred by death within the decade. That list, which was the first of its kind, and excited at the time a preposterous amount of interest, showed that within the ten years ten persons had died in Great Britain leaving more than a million, fifty-three leaving more than half a million, and a hundred and sixty-one leaving more than a quarter of a million sterling. We promised to repeat the list at the end of another decade, and here it is, compiled in the same way:—

We had expected that the number would have doubled, or at least greatly increased, and that the scale of fortunes would be much larger; but this is not the case. The number of fortunes ranging between £100,000 and £250,000 has increased enormously, and is now far beyond anything we care to print, and a fact perceptible in the old list might have been made a marked feature in the present one. The wealthy of the world are investing in England very largely indeed, especially the Spanish-Americans, who find it convenient to place a section of their often gigantic fortunes beyond the reach of plunder. But excluding a Rothschild, whose wealth is of a separate kind, there is no double millionaire in the list, and no man whom the rich Americans and the cosmopolitan Jew millionaires, with their fingers in every pie, would allow to be possessed of a first-class fortune. No one approaches even at a distance the wealth of W. Vanderbilt or Jay Gould, and no one's personalty enables us to compare him with a first-class English landed property. About £80,000 a year would represent the very highest sum upon the list. No British subject, in fact, has left wealth so large as to raise social questions or seriously affect the Budget, and the fact is a very curious one. It is, of course, in part explained by the method of computation. These returns are based on the payments made for probate duty on personalty, and do not include land and houses, still a favourite investment in England, or the enormous masses of wealth now held abroad, which, though liable to income-tax, escape legacy duty altogether. Much of this mass belongs to the very rich, who have accurate information, who like a good percentage, and who are in many cases haunted by an idea that distribution in many countries is equivalent to insurance. The English holdings in the Rentes of all countries, in Railways and Banks abroad, and in foreign house property elude this list altogether, as do also the immense sources of wealth classed as "businesses," with their offices outside Great Britain. Still, we are surprised at the figures. Only thirteen men have left more than a million, only fifty-six more than half a million, and only a hundred and ninety-five more than a quarter of a million. That is an increase among millionaires of thirty per cent., among half-millionaires of six per cent., and among quarter-millionaires of eighteen per cent., and we expected the numbers to be doubled. Considering the increase of opportunities, there must be some cause operating against excessive accumulation, and we are happy to believe it is a reluctance to spend life in mere amassing, which prevents the children of millionaires, who in England are usually cultivated, from treading in their fathers' footsteps. They either retire altogether from such work, or pursue it with a certain languor, and end by merging themselves in the ordinary aristocracy, who hunt down exceptional wealth with persistence and success.

Still, what a list it is! Amongst all those millionaires and demi-millionaires and quarter-millionaires, there is only one great grandee, the late Duke of Portland, whose eccentric wastefulness did not in the least impair his magnificent income; only three or four Peers; and not above ten persons who were at all widely, not to say nationally, known. The immense majority were quiet traders, bankers, manufacturers, ironmasters, and the like, who led usually quiet, though wealthy lives, spent money on collections and gardens, and were unknown even to those who make it a business to know. They represent the profits of Trade, and that is all; and their wealth increases the wages fund, without disturbing the social calm. If they do good, it is generally by cultivating Art; if they do harm, it is by keeping up a standard of outlay which destroys much of the ease and enjoyment of social life, and would anywhere but in England make the able restless and discontented. Here, however, the wall which surrounds private life is seldom broken, expenditure is apt to be steadily profuse rather than ostentatious, the love of country seclusion is deep-rooted, and ambition is much more common than acrid envy. The foible of rising men in England is sensitiveness rather than ostentation, and though purse-pride often exists in a high degree, it is lost amidst other prides, and toned down by the social ascendancy of an aristocracy which loves money and despises moneyed men. As to popular hostility to the millionaires, there is no trace of it. We detect strong signs of a growing desire to spoil certain privileges, rather than let the rich monopolise them—as, for example, in the agitation to throw open gardens which are worthless, and worse, the moment they cease to be secluded—but of dislike to an individual because he is rich, we see no sign. Any butler in London who, on reading our list, finds that his master inherited more than he thought, will not only respect him more, but, oddly enough, will resent his economies less. Wealth, when not too pompous, is liked, like any other ornament; and if a man shod his horses with silver, his grooms would quote that fact as one reflecting a certain credit and rank upon themselves. Indeed, even opinion hardly presses on the rich; there is no "feeling," as in America, that a millionaire should do something for the public, and we very much doubt if legacies to charities excite any great respect. They become more frequent, we fancy, but the comments upon them delivered on omnibuses are not entirely eulogistic. "He was a charitable beggar; but Lord, how his folks must feel!" was actually said, and expresses forcibly, if inelegantly, the genuine popular idea. There is no point on which English and Continental feelings differ so widely as the appreciation of wealth. To "kill a bourgeois," as the French Socialist did the other day, strikes Englishmen as something worse than killing a man; and they lament over a fire all the more, if the person burnt out was rich.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

EPISCOPAL TIMIDITY.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—For some forty years I have held the Spectator in honour, as almost the only paper for which the maxim Audi alteram partem had any practical meaning. May I reckon so far on its loyalty to that principle as to ask leave to say a word for the Bishops, with whom it has dealt so hardly of late?

First, as to the Sunday question:—The Bishops approach it, you say, under no other influence but that of an "ignoble timidity." Is it not possible that some of them, looking thoughtfully beyond the English horizon, and seeing a state of social life in which the Lord's Day is distinguished from the other six by horse-racing and political elections, may doubt whether that foreign ideal, however "cheerful" it may be, is really better for the people, or more true to the divine ordinance, than the English Sunday? They may be right or wrong in thinking so, but I am at a loss to see what their thought has to do with "timidity." You must remember that the kind of Sunday which you describe so eloquently has no existence outside your own columns, and that the leading opponents of our English Sunday would like your Sunday quite as little as they like our own. Amusement without restraint is their ideal,—a very different one from that which you propose.

Secondly, as to the marriage question, we have at least the right to ask the supporters of change to explain their own principle. At present, the innovators maintain an ominous, and not very honest, silence on the fundamental part of it. Is relationship by affinity a bar to marriage, or is it not? If it is a bar, why do they propose, in one important case, to overleap it? If it is not, why do they propose to prohibit all marriages of this kind but one, the only reason for the prohibition having been abandoned as unsound? If the Bishops have so much knowledge and reason as to see that the marriage law as altered by Lord Dalhousie's Bill would be so utterly indefensible as to bring it into general and speedy contempt, what has this to do with "timidity"? To look before you leap is, to my mind, better than to take a leap in the dark; to call the former course "timidity," is an abuse of terms. It may be well to note that there is no country in Europe in which the marriage law at all resembles what it would be in England, if Lord Dalhousie's Bill were passed. I must not, however, enter on the general question; but, having been in a minority on most important occasions in my life, I do feel just a little aggrieved at being told that I am habitually afraid. I rely on the courtesy of the Spectator not to launch its censures, and leave the object of them to be, in this case, as he often has been,

AUDITOR TANTUM.

[We did not blame the Bishops for taking any view of Sunday, but for not expressing their view, whatever it was. That is timid. As to the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, our correspondent proposes an unreal dilemma, constantly used to excite prejudice. All marriages of affinity are not in the same category. None are prohibited, as we conceive, by Christian law; but some are, by an instinct older than revelation. That prohibition may still be expediently registered in law. No divine law and no English law prohibits a man's marriage with his adopted daughter. Nevertheless, such marriage is held abhorrent, and all Continental laws rightly prohibit it. Where divine law does not exist, the feeling of the people is on such subjects the best guide.—Ed. Spectator.]

THE GREEK PHILOSOPHERS.

SIR,—In your review of my work on "The Greek Philosophers," for the generally complimentary tone of which I am much indebted to you, there are some remarks to which I may be permitted to reply, relating as they do not to the literary and scientific merits or demerits of the work, but to the motives which led me to undertake it, and to my intellectual character in general.

It is perfectly true that I do not believe in the existence of the supernatural, and that I brought this negative conviction with me to the study of Greek philosophy. But I do not see why a disbelief probably shared by at least half the philosophical students of the present day should be spoken of as "personal," nor in what sense it is more a "preconception" than disbelief in Aristotle's "Physics." At any rate, such a disbelief has nothing in common with the prejudices which led some of the thinkers whom I have criticised to adopt theories having little or no evidence in their favour, and a great deal of evidence against them.

It is true that "superstition" and "supernaturalism" are with me synonymous. In this use of words, I do not depart from common custom, for by "superstition" we generally mean those supernaturalist beliefs which we do not ourselves accept. But it is incorrect to say that by either term I mean "almost all that other people mean, when they speak of natural and revealed religion." For, in my opinion, and in that of much more authoritative writers, such as the author of "Ecce Homo," belief in the supernatural is neither the whole of natural religion, nor even its most essential element.

Further, it is not true that I regard supernaturalist beliefs as being in all circumstances either useless or mischievous. In certain stages of thought, they may furnish the only possible expression of the highest ideas of the human mind. And I imagined that there were many passages in my first volume embodying an adequate recognition of this truth. With regard to Christianity in particular, I have never doubted its long-continued utility, and its immense superiority to the various forms of Paganism which it displaced. I certainly held that it owes these advantages in great measure to the incorporation of a Greek element with its original Judaic nucleus. But there is nothing personal, or prejudicial, or anti-religious, about an opinion sanctioned, if I am not mistaken, by Professor Goldwin Smith, and other learned and pious historians.

Finally, my work, taking it altogether, was not intended as an attack on the supernatural, but as a contribution to the better understanding of several detached points in the history of philosophy, and as an attempt to exhibit the development of abstract thought in thorough-going connection with all the great interests of life.

On two points only has your reviewer attempted to show that my judgments on matters of fact have been distorted by my theoretical "preconceptions." The first relates to the story of the Centurion in the Gospel. It seems to be implied that I have no right to accept any part of a narrative professing to record a miraculous incident, unless I accept that incident as true. I must, however, claim the right to separate a probability from what I, in common with many other persons, regard as an impossibility, healing by word of command to the disease. Now, it seems far more probable that the speech attributed to the Centurion, and referred to by me, was really pronounced on some occasion or other by a Roman officer, than that it was invented by a Jew; while the speech itself seems to betray a conception of the physical world, as controlled by a hierarchy of spiritual agencies, perfectly false, and, at the same time, perfectly in harmony with the modes of thought encouraged by military discipline. The general thesis that militarism tends to favour supernaturalist beliefs is not itself incompatible with the entertainment of those beliefs.

The second point is my description of Plato's "Timæus" as the forerunner of the Catholic Faith. This your reviewer characterises as either a truism or an untruth. He seems to forget that forerunners often not only precede, but clear the way for what comes after them. I do not mean that Plato's monotheism created Christian monotheism, but that it predisposed the West for the reception of that dogma. A Bishop might agree to this, although he would probably not agree with me in regarding Plato's language about the world as the only-begotten offspring of a Divine Father ("Tim.," p. 50, D, and sub fin.) as a step towards the Catholic doctrine of the Incarnation.—I am, Sir, &c., Florence, 8th May.

A. W. BENN.

[Mr. Benn has a right to speak with authority as to the motives which led him to undertake the writing of his book on "The Greek Philosophers." Our statement was only an inference from the character of the work, in which hatred of superstition bulks as largely as the exposition of Greek philosophy. Mr. Benn acknowledges that he brought a negative with him to the study of Greek philosophy. He objects to our speaking of this conviction as personal, inasmuch as it is "probably shared by at least half the philosophical students of the present day." It may be none the less a prejudice and a preconception. We have called it personal in the present instance, because Mr. Benn brought it to the study of the facts, and, so far, his conception of the facts is prejudged. The question of how far natural religion is dependent on a belief in the supernatural is a large one, far too large to be discussed here now. Nor shall we discuss the question of the usefulness of supernatural belief at certain stages of thought. The fundamental difference between Mr. Benn and us emerges here. We hold that supernatural belief is true and useful in the highest stages of thought. Mr. Benn holds the opposite. As regards the story of the Centurion, we still hold that Mr. Benn had no right to cite it, as an illustration of extreme superstition, without a critical examination of its contents, and without disposing of those reasons which have led many to regard the story in all its parts as true. We do not disagree with Mr. Benn's definition of "forerunner" as now formulated. But it appears to us that Mr. Benn did in his work claim for Platonism a larger share in the formation of the Catholic Faith than he now does in his letter.—Ed. Spectator.]

THE SCOTCH UNIVERSITIES BILL.—A PROPOSAL.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—It is said that the only remaining question on this Universities Bill is as to the Theological Chairs. The Established General Assembly is apparently going to oppose the removal of the tests, and the House of Commons is sure to disregard its protest now, as it did that of 1853. Will the Lords do otherwise? Time will show; but in the meantime, there is room for an appeal to all parties. Is there no possibility of their uniting, so as to isolate the Universities from the approaching Disestablishment cataclysm? May not a basis for this be found in the proposals of the Edinburgh Council to affiliate the theological chairs of all the Scotch Churches, and so to have one large and free and various Hall, which each may use as each desires?

There are only two difficulties, and neither is insuperable. The criticisms on this Bill hitherto have usually been disguised "daughters of the horse-leech," crying, through the lips of learned Professors, "Give, give!" But this money difficulty has no place in the question of the theological chairs. Everything on that side is only too easy. Take Edinburgh alone. The number of theological students in the Established Church Hall is reported as 101, about one-thirtieth part of the whole number annually matriculating at the University. But the number at the United Presbyterian Hall is 111, and that at the Free Church Hall, I am told, is 146. And the two institutions which thus draw superior numbers from the University (often including very distinguished graduates) have not a penny of support from the public funds. Is it not clear that if the whole of the students were thrown together, 350 instead of 100, with a staff of nearly a score of Professors instead of half-a-dozen, the union would be a gain to all parties? The Free Church at present spends £10,000 yearly on all its Chairs throughout Scotland, and the United Presbyterian Church about £4,000 on its one Edinburgh Hall alone. If these voluntary contributions were received as part of the national enterprise, supposing even that the Established Church were in the meantime to retain all, or nearly all, the present public money for its own use, and that we left to the future those more generous proposals to the others which would surely come, would not a bare country be enriched all round?

Its theology at least would. All who know Scotland (I do not include the Cockney reader who is charmed rather with our questions of organ and ritual), know that its Theological Colleges are the centres of a movement and progress which really exist. Presbyterianism, indeed, like every truly constitutional system, does not move very fast. But it moves, notwithstanding, and it moves organically. Last week, the English Presbyterian Church resolved to remodel its creed, and to confer with the Pan-Presbyterian Council on the subject. Four years ago the United Presbyterian Church in Scotland did the same thing, without conferring with any other at all. It is quite certain that in a short time the Free Church and United Presbyterian Halls above referred to will be united, and when they are united, there will be a saving of money, with a multiplication of academical topics or "chairs," and an enrichment of the curriculum. Why should not the three Halls be now united, with a still larger result? Generous as the Scotch Churches are, there is not one of them whose unaided exertions can at present maintain a properly equipped College. On a united system, it would be abundantly and superfluously easy. Any pecuniary contribution by the members of the Established Church need be excessively little; their brethren would still bear the academic load. There remains only the difficulty as to doctrine, and that does not seem to be a serious one. The objection to tests, which is still put by Dr. Flint, is scouted by Dr. Tulloch. In any case, it is a domestic difficulty. Suppose even that the event took place which the former anticipates, that the Church was unable to approve of a particular Government appointment to a chair. The very worst that would happen would be that the favoured Presbyterian communion would have to set up for a time one professor of its own, instead of maintaining a whole staff, as each of the others already does. There need be no burden on any side of such an enterprise as this, except "the burden that wings are to the bird."

I assume in all this that scientific theology (in a sense immeasurably higher than mere negative theology) is a reality and a moulding power in Scotland, and that while it works through the national life in the future, it will in any case maintain some connection with and build upon the Universities.

But why should not the University be its home, as well as its porch or pedestal? Is that not an object worth making some pecuniary sacrifice to secure?—I am, Sir, &c., ACADEMICUS.

BRITISH POLICY IN SOUTH AFRICA.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—May I make a few remarks from a colonial point of view on your able article on the Transvaal question, in the Spectator of March 17th?

You admit that the decision of the British Government not to protect the Bechuana Chiefs would be wrong, if it meant for those chiefs "total spoliation." But that is precisely what has already happened to them. The new line, drawn at the time of the Convention, between Bechuanaland and the Transvaal, ceding, as it did, a large tract to the latter, left Mankoroane and Montsioa only just sufficient territory to maintain them and their people, both in the supply of water and for agricultural purposes. Cut off and robbed as they are of most of their water and land, they are starving, and it is quite out of the power of the Cape Government to give them any habitable country, much less a "good one;" so that practically they will be extinguished, by becoming hewers of wood and drawers of water to the Boers and their friends. And when it is said that they are to blame themselves, for their "irrepressible proclivity to intertribal fighting," it should be remembered that it was their British alliance or connection which deprived them, on the one hand, of any ammunition or means of defending themselves—for the colonial frontier was strictly guarded—and furnished their enemies, on the other, with an endless supply of European men and arms from the Transvaal border. The notion, taken up apparently by statesmen at home, that these chiefs will save themselves by uniting against the Boers, is quite illusory. Natives never do unite, fortunately for the white population of South Africa, unless they are made to by some such despotic process as that of Cetewayo; and if they should do so for the moment, their union is never proof against a bribe.

I venture to think that when you state that an enforcement of the terms of the Convention by the British Government would mean "a quarrel with all the Dutchmen in South Africa," you do a large number of that people a great wrong, and it is a wrong which, if Imperial statesmen are going to act upon it, will cause grave political consequences. I speak without fear of contradiction, when I say that a firm insistence on the part of the Imperial Government that the Convention should be carried out by the Transvaal Government, and a prompt suppression of the marauders in Bechuanaland, would have met with the approval of all educated and intelligent Dutchmen; while an opposite policy is regarded with contempt, as showing that the Convention was not really an act of magnanimity, but the result of the defeats incurred at Laing's Nek, Ingogo, and Majuba Hill. It is the ignorant, illiterate Boer who hates everything English, because it means government, civilisation, and equality for white and black alike; that is the class of Dutchmen which will be dominant, if British supremacy is not to be upheld in South Africa. The best class of Dutchmen is perfectly loyal to the British connection, and views with anything but pleasure the Power to which he bears allegiance evading its duties and forgetting its position at the bidding of the Boers of the Transvaal. The danger is that persistence in this misconception by British statesmen may have the effect of driving loyal Dutchmen, in self-defence, into the arms of the Extremists. The policy of the last two years has created a feeling of general insecurity throughout South Africa. No one knows whether the British Government means to retain its South-African Colonies; and after what befell the loyalists in the Transvaal, loyal Cape Dutchmen cannot afford to pronounce too strongly against what, if England deserted her colonies, might be the dominant party.

Moreover, a wrong impression is given, if you will forgive me for saying so, by the statement that the Cape Government "categorically refused to assist" the Home Government in restoring order in Bechuanaland. All that the Cape Government did was to decline to act alone. It was perfectly ready to act in conjunction with the other South-African Governments, and to find mounted police not only for itself, but also for the Home Government. But it could hardly be expected to do single-handed the work of the Imperial Government, at the risk of embroiling itself both with the Transvaal and the Free States.

With regard to what you say as to the inexpediency of maintaining the Convention under existing circumstances, there is a pretty unanimous agreement throughout South Africa; and it is to be hoped that the influence of the Spectator may be employed in obtaining the cancellation of a document which, interpreted as it has been, has caused irritation and discord among the two sections (i.e., loyal and disloyal) of colonists, and brought ruin to the natives. The Convention could only have been beneficial if its terms had been energetically carried out for the protection of natives, and for the vindication of the supremacy of the British Government. If it was to be violated, as it has been, with impunity, it could only weaken the cause of law and order throughout South Africa, and materially impair the predominance of English influence. Mr. Forster did not exaggerate in estimating this Bechuanaland question as one which concerned the stability of British power in South Africa. If the British nation understands this, and deliberately assents to a sacrifice of a part of its Colonial Empire, well and good; but it must not be thought that under the political circumstances which exist in South Africa, anything short of this can follow from a continuance of the policy of Imperial self-effacement and retreat which has been carried out during the last two years.—I am, Sir, &c.,

[SECOND NOTICE.]

In this notice we intend to speak a little fully of some of the most important pictures, reserving our criticism on the minor ones for future occasions.

"Too Late" (232), by Mr. Frank Dicksee. It is difficult to say, without seeming to be at once unjust and unkind, how great a disappointment this picture of Mr. Dicksee's has afforded us. As for the subject, we need hardly describe an illustration of the Parable of the Ten Virgins, but only say that in this treatment of it we see only the foolish virgins, after the pronouncement of their sentence. One kneels sadly on the ground, fronting the spectator; the others, in various attitudes of sadness or despair, are turning away into the outer darkness. The lower portion of the picture is lighted, as it were, from within the palace, but above there is only a faint twilight, from the starlight sky beyond. The figures are at least life-size, clad in pseudo-classical robes, and of a somewhat massive, languid beauty. The picture is very carefully drawn, very solidly painted, and composed with a great deal of skill, but the whole result is intensely unsatisfactory. That short-coming of Mr. Dicksee's, which we have noted in previous years, of losing sight of the distinction between labour and enthusiasm, emotion and thought, has grown upon him, until his work has lost all true artistic quality, and resembles nothing so much as an industrious treatise upon Dutch farming, or some other equally dull subject. It would be a true criticism to say that this is at once one of the best painted and one of the least artistic works in the whole exhibition; there is not a single portion of it upon which minute labour has not been bestowed, nor is there one upon which that labour has produced a less successful result. The moonlit sky, composed of (how many) pounds of ultramarine, has no true relation to Nature, no true beauty even in the picture itself; it is simply a blue back-ground, less desirable, because less frankly conventional, than that which Giotto painted behind his pictures six hundred years ago. The carefully disposed robes, lose, in their elaborate folds, all the grace and freedom which give loveliness to drapery; they are, if not mechanical, at least premeditated. The lifeless beauty of the women's faces is scarcely touched by any of such grief, horror, or despair, as we might imagine would come to such women at such a time. Their stage manager has told them to be sad, but they are only amateurs at the business, and this is the first rehearsal. In fact, it would be appropriate to say that this is a "well-dressed piece" and nothing more, and bears to great art, a similar relation to that which a Drury-Lane tableau bears to great acting. Never, perhaps, has there been a more perfect example of the inadequacy of mere technical skill to produce a great picture; for in this painting the skill is very great, and the picture practically does not exist.

"Voltaire" (271), by W. Q. Orchardson. This is Mr. Orchardson's great picture of the year, and probably the best he has ever painted; it shows Voltaire appealing to the Duc de Sully for revenge upon the Duc de Rohan, who has just caused the philosopher to be horsewhipped at the door of Sully's house. The Duc and his guests are seated at a long table, regarding Voltaire with glances either indifferent or mocking; he stands before them, with his head thrown back, his hands clenched, his frame quivering with passion. To say that Sully's dining-room is a cross between a garret and a palace, that Sully's guests are a somewhat ragged, dishevelled lot of nobles, that the picture is half empty, and the painting at once powerful and careless, delicate and coarse, is only to say that it is by Mr. Orchardson. And its dramatic quality also goes without saying; but if we except a certain amount of repetition in the faces of the principal personages, who have been too evidently painted from one or two models; and if we accept a rendering of the scene which evidently aims more at the qualities of the theatre, than the dignity and reality of life, there is little to be said for this work but praise. Granting that all the people portrayed are a mean, unworthy crew, that Voltaire was a shabby scribbler, and Sully an insolent aristocrat, that, in fact, in such a scene neither the nobility of intellect, nor the nobility of rank, would have a fitting place, Mr. Orchardson's painting gives us all that we can expect or wish for; and it is above all alive in that very respect in which Mr. Dicksee's work is dead,—it is a genuine artist's work, done with a genuine artistic motive.

"Toil, Glitter, Grime, and Wealth on a Flowing Tide" (1493), by W. L. Wyllie. Mr. Wyllie has been exhibiting at the Academy for a good many years, and doing work which, though frequently careless, and insufficiently thought-out, has always possessed great qualities of truth to atmospheric effect, and freshness of natural impression; his, essentially, have been always out-of-door pictures, painted out-of-doors, or at least if not actually so painted, studied sufficiently in the scenes they depicted to render them true; but he has seldom or never done such good work as he has done this year. He only sends this one picture, but that merits careful attention. It is a scene of river-life in England, mainly concerned with barges, tugs, and wherries; a muddy river and a smoky sky; and besides its technical merits, which are very great indeed, it has the following essential quality: it depicts a scene of national life, truly and powerfully as to fact, freshly and beautifully as to impression. It actually does succeed in endowing common things in which most people see nothing that is lovable, with a beauty which really belongs to them. Health, strength, energy, the freshness of the air, the excitement and danger of the work, the shifting scenes of the river; the atmosphere, above all, of reality and life, as opposed to that of shams, and conventionalities, and morbid fancies, which make up a good deal of the thought and painting of the present day,—all these things contribute towards the beauty of Mr. Wyllie's work, one which we are pleased to hear has been bought by the Academy with a portion of the funds bequeathed to them by Mr. Chantrey.

"T. C. Hook, Esq., R.A." (29), by J. E. Millais, R.A. This is Mr. Millais' finest portrait in this year's exhibition, and as if prompted by the personality of his sitter, it is one of his strongest, freshest, and most brilliant pieces of painting. The old sea and sea-coast painter has been taken in his "habit as he lived," in a rough frieze suit, with a palette on his thumb, and his face glowing as if it were fresh from wind and wave. A fine portrait of an English gentleman, and worthy to hang as a pendant to the same painter's "Duchess of Westminster," in the Grosvenor Gallery. Turn from this most realistic, most literal piece of work, to the "Grey Lady," who is gliding, with upturned face and outstretched arm, up a staircase faintly illumined by pale moonlight. It is a strange, and a rather humiliating fact, that this painter, who as a rule absolutely welters in the common-place, can yet, when he likes, produce pictures which, if they have not the highest imaginative power, have yet an almost unrivalled faculty of touching our feelings. When we think of such work as the "Huguenots," "The Vale of Rest," and "The Gambler's Wife," and then consider that as a rule Mr. Millais rarely gives us more at the present day than babies and beefeaters, we are almost inclined to fancy that a truly paternal Government would hang him and his babies in a row, as an example to all painters who could do great work, and preferred to do little. But however this may be, the present picture, slight and unsubstantial as it is, has a rare charm. It is a work of true, if of somewhat thin imagination, it touches that chord of mystery and eeriness which vibrates within most of us; it is not a picture to hang in a corridor on the way to your bedroom, in an old-fashioned country house.

"The Ides of March" (260), by Mr. E. J. Poynter, R.A. This represents the scene from Julius Cæsar where Calphurnia warns Cæsar of the danger that waits him:—

"When beggars die, there are no comets seen;
The heavens themselves blaze forth the death Of princes."

—Julius Cæsar, Act ii., Scene 2.

Mr. Poynter has taken a new departure, and in some ways justified it. This, though a cold, is a fine picture, fine in the sense that it completely realises the artist's intention, that it manifests the power of entirely working out a somewhat unlovely but dignified conception. We are acquainted with no other painter in England who could at once have imagined so fine an interior as the one in this picture, and realised it for us so soberly. Not Mr. Tadema, for he would have found it necessary to introduce many marbles, and bronzes, and much picturesque matter, to show his own dexterity. Not Sir Frederick Leighton, for he would have failed in giving the massive solidity which Mr. Poynter has caught so well. Not Mr. Burne-Jones or any of the pre-Raphaelites, for they would have imported some trace of mediæval Italy into this Roman palace. Not Mr. Albert Moore, or any of our Greek painters, for such would have transformed the Capitol into the Acropolis. This is not a great picture, for the two dimly-lighted figures of Cæsar and Calphurnia are scarcely more than shadows cast upon the darkness of the night beyond them, and because, both in the architecture within and without the hall, there is scarcely any real feeling for beauty of form, or beauty of colour. Even Mr. Dicksee's ultramarine sky is preferable to this cold, indigo one, and the portents which Calphurnia dreads, only flash with a very weak, watery light; nevertheless, it is a genuine attempt by an unimaginative man to realise a scene which was worth painting, and though it has a certain Scotch harshness and formality of utterance, it has, too, a Scotch trustworthiness.

MODERN RESEARCHES INTO BUDDHISM.*

THE second and third of the books whose names are appended to these remarks ought, according to usage, to have been noticed by us somewhat earlier; but such is the influx of writings on subjects belonging to the same range of investigation, that we fear to nauseate our readers by too frequently recurring to matters which, deeply important as they are, and interesting to a rapidly increasing section of the public, are still probably "caviare to the million." The first book, however, that of Dr. Oldenberg, has been very recently made accessible to English readers, and if it does not throw much absolutely new light on the study of Buddhism, at least confirms many of the more novel views which deeper researches have developed, and which are different from what have long been the popular, and indeed, even among the learned, the prevailing ideas of the teaching of that great and mysterious system. In the rapid growth of that thoughtful study of the natural history and development of religious belief, and of the ideas and sentiments of man in relation to the unseen, it is not wonderful that that of Buddhism should have assumed so prominent a place, and should have engaged the attention not merely of purely scientific minds, but of earnest Christians who would, a century ago, have looked on such phases of belief with simple abhorrence. On the one hand, to the Christian philosopher it throws a not unwholesome light on Christianity itself, while on the other its peculiar tenets, the facts of its growth, and the nature of the myths which have encrusted those facts have been largely utilised, some times openly, and sometimes by innuendo, for the purpose of undermining the foundations of all supernatural religion, by dwelling on the close analogy which exists between the development of all faiths which are above the most barbarous class, and also by the encouragement which Buddhism, as generally and vaguely understood, appears to hold out to the denial of the universality of certain intuitions of the human spirit,—intuitions the universality, or at least the normal nature, of which goes far to the unprejudiced mind to prove that they have some foundation in objective truth.

A religion springing from, or at least greatly encouraged by, reaction against a prevailing system which had lost its higher attributes, and had become little more than a complex system of ritual, a new system rigidly ethical, preached by one professing and believed to be the subject of Messianic prophecy, whose birth was foreshadowed by portents, who, after a long period of seclusion and meditation, underwent a fearful conflict with the tempting powers of evil, and immediately proclaimed himself as one of those periodical visitants of earth, whose mission it was to purify and enlighten, who gathered thousands of disciples, and instituted an order of the "religious," numbering at this day, after the lapse of twenty-five centuries, many hundreds of thousands, to whom he committed the charge of propagating his doctrines and who were vowed to the utmost poverty, purity, and holiness, not to mention innumerable details which, from their accidental and, so to speak, irrelevant nature—such, for example, as an ethical discourse delivered on a mountain, and Buddha's interview with a woman who was a sinner—are all the more striking in their resemblance to the Christian story, presents a most puzzling phenomenon; for all attempts to trace any historical connection, or borrowing either of principles or facts by the one from the other, have, we have no hesitation in saying, utterly failed, and we have nothing to fall back upon, but the common workings of human nature in somewhat analogous circumstances.

It is not surprising that the existence of this religion, without a trace of a Personal First Cause, without prayers, without sacrifice, and with no distinct recognition of the prospect of individual life apart from body, and forming the faith of a third of mankind, should be held by the Agnostic as a triumphant fact, apparently disproving the innate nature of the Theistic intuition, and of that concept of spirit as entirely distinct from matter, to which our Materialists and Monists apply the name, or rather nickname, of "Animism," while Buddhism may be held up as a notable example of pure and noble morality, not dependent for its continued existence upon the support of faith in a Divine Author and Judge,—a foreshadowing, indeed, of that "natural religion" consisting of the admiration or adoration of the old trilogy of the true, the good, and the beautiful, which the author of Ecce Homo has recently so eloquently analysed, and which, now that that author has put it into systematic form for them, a few are beginning to look upon as the religion of the future for all cultured souls. Mr. Rhys Davids, accordingly, claims for Comtism, Agnosticism, and Buddhism the merit of being the only systems which have completely broken away "from the venerable soul-theories which have grown out of the ancient Animism," &c. Like most of his school, he apparently assumes a universality for non-Animistic views among thoughtful and educated mankind which, widespread as such ideas now are, we certainly have not yet discovered.

This author, whose lectures cannot be too highly praised for learned research and lucidity of expression, finds the rejection of "Animism" to have been the cause of Gautama's adoption of the doctrine of Metempsychosis, which he found existing in India, if not in the Vedic theology, at least in the popular belief, and which seems to have some foundation in human nature, for traces of it are found in the Valley of the Nile, as well as that of the Ganges, and in some rude tribes of Australia, as well as in the contemplations of Plato and Pythagoras, and even in the pages of the Talmud. He says that the founder of Buddhism, having abandoned Animism, and consequently all idea of future reward or retribution in a future state, and having a profound sense of the necessity of equity in some shape or other in the arrangements of the universe, took refuge in this peculiar form of Transmigration, not of souls, for there were in his view no such things, but of the "karma" of each individual. Whether he is correct or not in his analysis of the workings of Gautama's mind, there is no more valuable or interesting portion of his work, or, indeed, of any work on Buddhism which we have seen, than his exposition of this fundamental doctrine, so mysterious and almost unthinkable to the European mind. We doubt not that Mr. Rhys Davids is correct in looking upon Gautama as in some sense a Monist, and as one who held all objective existence in the ordinary sense as compound, and that everything that is compound is necessarily perishable, so that every existing entity or change must be only a link in the endless chain of causation. This idea pervades the original Buddhist writings. When the individual ceases to be, his actions, or rather his character, must entail certain results. How the Oriental mind could attain to the idea of character or attributes, apart from substance, being transmitted from one being to another without conscious identity of personality, so as to satisfy eternal justice, it is not easy to conceive; but had we space, we do not think it is impossible to find traces of something involving the same apparent absurdity in some popular phases of Christianity itself.

Plato's idea of Metempsychosis was certainly not identical with Buddha's. In the Phaedo (69), he puts into the mouth of Socrates the well-known statement of how the souls of men are sent into the bodies of animals resembling them in their brutal and selfish qualities, "but he who is a philosopher or lover of learning, and is entirely pure at departing, is alone worthy to attain to the Divine Nature." This is very nearly Buddhism, only it substitutes the conscious soul for the mystical karma.

Dr. Oldenberg agrees with Mr. Rhys Davids in that view of the Buddhist Nirvana which differs from the idea of its meaning entertained by the older investigators, and even by Bishop Bigandet, in the work now before us. We believe the more recent view to be correct. Nirvana, in the mind of Gautama, was not a condition to be attained in a future state. He either believed in no future state of the conscious individual (indeed, if his total rejection of "Animism" is correct, he could not), or he considered all inquiries into such questions as useless and vain. Nirvana is a state of high ethical perfection, to which he himself attained in this life; absolute freedom from desire (except the desire of knowledge and the passion of universal benevolence), which is the origin of all evil and of all unhappiness,—absorption in the contemplation of truth, truth being, let it be observed, not the mere truth of facts, but truth ethical, and in a sense, practical. In some of its aspects it has its analogues in many other religions and moods of mind, sometimes referring to this life and sometimes to a future state. What are the "suave mari magno" of the Epicurean poet, the contemplative life of quietists and ascetics in all ages, the repose and "peace" of many a world-weary Christian soul unable to picture the spirit-life as one of endless progress in wisdom and active goodness, but varied examples of the same spirit? The Aryan races of India, after living for generations in the enervating climate of Hindustan, may have become more receptive to an intensified type of the Paradise of Nothingness than they originally were; and the Oriental races in general have less of the instinctive desire for continued existence and activity, than the more masculine natures of Europe. Nor can we wonder at the charm which this form of asceticism had for the purer and more benevolent portion of a people living in a land of sensuality and cruelty, where even Nature, teeming with the infinite variety and beauty of tropical life, is "red in tooth and claw" with rapine, and where animal instincts are so conspicuously associated with destruction and agony.

Our space does not admit of our fully entering on the question how far the facts of Buddhism can be legitimately founded on by the Agnosticism of the present day; but one or two observations we can make, which an unprejudiced student of the subject may find it not unprofitable to carry along with him. 1. Although in their primitive form, the teaching of Gautama ignored the existence of a First Cause having a moral relation to man and his doings, the subsequent history of Buddhism, in the various modifications which it has undergone in Ceylon, in Thibet, in Burmah, and in China, affords sufficient evidence that as a mere system of ethics (which is all that it can claim to be), it has had a very short and limited existence and that the irrepressible instinct of Theism and worship has almost universally invaded it, although often in somewhat degraded form, and that even in its purer shape, it was unable to throw off something very like "Animism," for it retained a belief in a very swarm of unseen Powers, under the name of Brahmas, Devas, and Nats, peopling the universe, and exerting influences on human minds and affairs, and Gautama himself after his death speedily became an object of worship or quasi-worship; 2, that in the minds of by far the greater number of Buddhists there are gleams of a belief in personal existence beyond the grave, either in other material forms, or in the prolongation of a happy Nirvana. Nothing can be more absurd than to hold that so mystical a doctrine as that of the Karma has a practical hold on any large portion even of Asiatic humanity. Neither Buddhism nor Comtism, in its primitive form, can "expel nature with a fork," and theories of this kind are but transitory and exceptional phases of human thought, in its process of development.

The student will find all these three books well worthy of study. That of Bishop Bigandet refers mainly to the present condition of Buddhism in Burmah, a region with which the author is abundantly familiar, and concerns itself less with its tenets than with the facts of its history and with its present institution. The "Karma" doctrine is scarcely alluded to. The other two works are an admirable introduction to the study of Buddhism in a more metaphysical spirit. The more this subject is investigated, the deeper will be the interest felt in what has been certainly one of the greatest attempts ever made by unaided reason to solve the mysteries of existence, and to provide a remedy for human misery and sin. We have said "unaided reason,"—who shall determine whether, and to what extent, some supernatural help was not accorded to Gautama, and not to him alone, among the non-Christian teachers of men?

SIR JAMES STEPHEN'S HISTORY OF THE CRIMINAL LAW OF ENGLAND.*

"THE law of England, or even the criminal law, as a whole, can scarcely be said to have a history. There is no such series of continuous connected changes in the whole system as the use of the word 'history' implies." In these sentences, Sir James Stephen does great injustice to the topic of his work; he does even greater injustice to his own highly interesting book. Our author's own pages are the complete confutation of his own doctrine, and supply the best answer to his own depreciation of the result of his labours. The History of the Criminal Law in England establishes past a doubt both that criminal law exhibits a process of historical growth, and that the problems of English history will never be thoroughly solved until historians have followed the example of Professor Stubbs, and have with him realised the fact that the political, the constitutional, the moral, and the religious phases of English life receive constant explanation and illustration from the annals of the Law Courts. The History of the Criminal Law in England further proves that its author has, whether he admits the fact or not, made a most valuable and serious contribution to our knowledge of English history. The book, it is true, is not purely, we might say not mainly, historical. Legal polemics fill a good part of its pages, and the logical training and controversial habits of the writer affect, and at times perplex the flow of his narrative. But though this be true, and though Sir James Stephen's controversial disquisitions deserve separate attention and criticism, the best service which a critic can render to his readers is to direct attention to the historical side of the learned Judge's work, and show from Sir James Stephen's own pages what singular light the study of the criminal law sheds on more than one dark place of legal or general history.

Nothing, for example, is a more perplexing problem than how to account for the gradual change which took place in the position and character of the Jury. Modern ideas of justice involve the careful separation of the duties of the witnesses from the functions of the Judge; it is, however, plain that jurymen have gradually been transformed from witnesses into judges of fact. How has this transformation (which is not the effect of any sudden revolution) taken place? Sir James Stephen, if he does not give a complete answer to this question, assuredly supplies facts which contribute greatly towards its solution. The jury, he points out, not only gave, but took evidence; the jury also often gave, in earlier times, what we should now call special verdicts; they determined, that is to say, particular facts on their own knowledge, or on the information they could collect. Hence the distinction between juror and judge was far less clearly marked than it appears to modern observers. Sir James Stephen, however, gives us on this point something of much more worth than inferences based on general considerations. He adduces two most striking instances of the mode in which the functions of the Jury-box and the Bench have been found in combination during modern times. On April 30th, 1650, thieves were legally tried, found guilty, condemned to death, and, it would appear, executed by a court consisting of sixteen jurors, who performed the parts of witnesses, jurymen, and judges. This was done under the custom of Halifax, and we have here an undoubted survival of what was once a normal mode of trial. If any critic should (most gratuitously) decline to trust the tract called "Halifax and its Gibbet Law," the sceptic may be referred to transactions passing before our own eyes, but which, like other such facts, we most of us never notice. In the Court of the Liberty of the Savoy, proceedings even now take place "which will help us to realise the nature of the ancient trial by jury, and to understand how they dispensed with witnesses." The court consists of the steward and eight burgesses, two from each of the four wards of the manor. Any inhabitant who thinks a neighbour's house disorderly complains to the foreman of the jury for the time being, the jury satisfy themselves in any way they please as to the matter complained of. They give notice to the party in fault, and if the nuisance is not abated they embody their complaint in the form of a presentment, which is given in on court-day to the steward. If the presentment is in proper form, and the jury think the offender should be fined, four of the jury settle the fine. The finding of the jury is conclusive. They "hear no evidence, examine no witnesses, and go through nothing in the nature of a trial. The leet jury thus represents that stage in the history [of trial by jury] at which ordeal and purgation had fallen into disuse, and the substitute for them had not been discovered." Within a hundred yards of the Spectator office, justice, that is to say, is still administered after a method which was antiquated in the days of Edward I. A more instructive and impressive instance of an historical survival was never pointed out, even by a professed antiquarian, and every philosophic student must feel grateful to Mr. Justice Stephen for having brought the existence of this survival into notice. One such fact is worth a hundred disquisitions. There is a certain ingratitude in complaining that a writer who has added to our knowledge has not done more for us than he has. But we must make some complaint that Sir James Stephen has not pressed his inquiries to a conclusion. "It is not my intention," he writes, "to try to trace out in detail the history of trial by jury. The authorities already given show with sufficient clearness how it originated, but the steps by which the jury ceased to be witnesses, and became judges of the evidence given by others, cannot now be traced, without an amount of labour out of proportion to the value of the result." The reason alleged for omitting to trace out the process by which the modern jury was created is more unsatisfactory than the omission itself; the notion that the result of such an investigation would be without value betrays a certain indifference to research, which constitutes the main flaw in Sir James Stephen's treatment of history. He is, even when engaged in describing the growth of institutions, a good deal more of a lawyer, a logician, and a controversialist, than an historian.

This deficiency in the spirit of research is the main defect in Sir James Stephen's historical work. Still, that the annals of England should be looked at mainly from a legal point of view is not without its gain, and as we have already intimated, nothing is more remarkable than the way in which the details of criminal law illustrate, under Mr. Justice Stephen's hands, the more general aspects of English history. To take one instance out of a hundred, his account of crime, and the mode in which crime has been dealt with by the Courts and by the Legislature, throws new light, both directly and indirectly, on that most curious of topics, the astounding mixture of success and of failure which marked the Puritan Revolution. The criminal legislation of the Commonwealth gives us a new standard by which to measure the political capacity of the Puritan leaders. Measured as reformers of the law, the statesmen of Puritanism were infinitely in advance of their day. The Barebones Parliament is constantly talked of as an assembly of ignorant zealots. If you look at their scheme for reforming the criminal law, you see at once that they were in many respects as enlightened a body of men as any Parliament which has ever sat in England. The abolition of the peine forte et dure, the provision that prisoners should be entitled to counsel, the total doing-away with benefit of clergy and the like are proposals anticipating modern reforms, and well worthy of a committee presided over by Hale. This is not the legislation of ignorance and fanaticism; it may be the legislation of revolutionists who are in too great a hurry to carry out rational improvements not yet sanctioned by the public opinion of the nation. The much-reviled Barebones Parliament were, in short, if we look at their proposals for reform of the law, enlightened enthusiasts, who erred (if at all) not through ignorance or fanaticism, but from under-estimating the permanent force of prejudice and conservatism. Mr. Justice Stephen is not an enthusiast or an admirer of enthusiasm, but he has placed the legislation of so-called fanatics in a new and favourable light. But the direct information which Sir James Stephen gives his readers with regard to the criminal law of the Commonwealth is of far less importance than the conclusions which he indirectly suggests as to the causes both of the fall of the Monarchy, and of the failure on the part of the Puritans to establish the Commonwealth on permanent foundations. As an intelligent reader peruses the History of the Criminal Law, he is almost forced to the conclusion that the main ground of popular hostility to the Monarchy of the Stuarts has been overlooked or greatly under-estimated. We had, we confess, never realised till we read Mr. Stephen's work the extent to which not only the Star Chamber, but also all the Ecclesiastical Courts throughout the country, interfered in the most delicate, the most private matters of domestic life. Profanity, heresy, drunkenness, defamation, immorality, matters many of which are now dealt with by no tribunal whatever, and some of which are, like libel, the ground of regular actions in the Courts of common law, were, in the sixteenth and seventeenth century, under the control of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and, to a great extent, of the clergy:—

"Such," writes Sir James Stephen, "were the old Ecclesiastical Courts. I have tried to illustrate, as clearly as I could, the character of their jurisdiction, because I think it has a more important place in legal and general history than has usually been assigned to it. The only difficulty which is suggested in the present day by the account given of it, is to understand how people submitted to it so long as they did. It is difficult even to imagine a state of society in which, on the bare suggestion of some miserable domestic spy, any man or woman whatever might be convened before an archdeacon or his surrogate, and put upon his or her oath as to all the most private affairs of life,—as to relations between husband and wife, as to relations between either and any woman or man with whom the name of either might be associated by scandal, as to contracts to marry, as to idle words, as to personal habits, and in fact, as to anything whatever, which happened to strike the ecclesiastical lawyer as immoral or irreligious."

This paragraph, and the whole chapter in which it is contained, ought to be read and re-read by any one who wishes to understand why, in 1640, the English nation was prepared for revolution. The discipline of the Church, which meant the interference of the clergy with the affairs of every household, had long been intolerable; and the policy of Laud was to make the discipline of the Church—in other words, the power of the parsons—seen and felt as it never has been seen and felt before or since in England. From the time of the Reformation, the Crown, in taking over the authority, had incurred much of the odium which had at other times fallen upon the clergy. Men who cursed Laud were not likely to be loyal to Charles. Religious enthusiasm, theological fanaticism, zeal for Protestantism, fervour for liberty, were all, no doubt, sentiments which influenced Cromwell and his followers; but if, as we may fairly suppose, Englishmen of the seventeenth century were in essentials very like their ancestors and their descendants, we may feel pretty sure that the mass of the nation were in 1640 far more anxious to be delivered from the burden of clerical domination, than to ensure the triumph of Calvinism or to found an enlightened Commonwealth.

In 1640, "Clericalism was the enemy" in England in a truer sense than it now is in France; the Monarchy was overthrown, because the monarch supported the domination of the clergy. By one of the strange, but perfectly comprehensible paradoxes of history, the cause which led to the fall of the Monarchy, namely, the hatred of clerical tyranny, was also in a certain sense a main cause of the failure of the Commonwealth. The rule of the Saints was found nearly as intolerable as the rule of the Parsons. But this was not all. There is a general, but very mistaken idea that the Restoration restored everything which the Long Parliament had destroyed. In fact, the one thing which ordinary laymen cared to destroy was never restored at all. The Cavaliers who triumphed in the return of Charles II. had no more affection for the Star Chamber than had the most fanatical Republican among Cromwell's Ironsides. The Restoration brought many evils, but it did not bring back the hateful clerical domination of Laud and his followers. As long, indeed, as the Stuarts were on the throne, there was always a risk that ecclesiastical tyranny might revive, in one form or another. The Revolution put an end to this peril, and the nation was satisfied, and at rest. If, in short, the true cause, or rather one true cause, of the fall of the Monarchy under Charles was the insufferable tyranny of ecclesiastics and Ecclesiastical Courts, it is easy to understand why the majority of the nation suffered the Monarchy to be destroyed, and then, with no real inconsistency, welcomed a Restoration which did not restore that clerical domination which had brought hatred on the Monarchy; it is easy also to see how it happened that the Revolution of 1688, though it satisfied none of the Puritan ideals, thoroughly met the wishes of the English people. This, at any rate, is the reading of history forcibly suggested by Sir James Stephen's work. It is a reading well worth consideration, and it is only one among the many new interpretations of old facts suggested by a careful study of The History of the Criminal Law.

A HISTORY OF NEW ZEALAND.*

ENGLISH interest in New-Zealand history is centred in the record of the unequal struggle between the white settlers and the native race for the possession of the land, which seems likely to end in the extermination of the latter. In three closely-printed volumes of some 600 pages each, Mr. Rusden, with whose honourable career as Clerk to the Victorian Parliament Australians are familiar, has traced the annals of antipodal Britain from its first colonisation by Hawaiian refugees in the fourteenth century to the close of the past year. His main object has been to show the reckless cruelty and injustice of the treatment which the Maoris have constantly met with at the hands of Europeans, almost from the date of Cook's rediscovery, in 1769, of the islands discovered by Abel Jansen Tasman in 1642. The indictment he has drawn up is a long and heavy one, but ample proof is offered of every count, and the impression left on the mind of the reader is that the proof is valid. The author, though as enthusiastic an advocate of the Maoris as the well-known "Pakeha Maori," to whom we are indebted for that singular and striking book, Old New Zealand, is not unmindful of their faults; and the savagery of the natives, illumined, though it often was, by traits of chivalric courtesy, may, indeed, well be pleaded as at least an extenuating circumstance in favour of the colonists. Allowance, too, must be made for the intrinsic difficulty of the problem, no satisfactory solution of which seems yet to have been attained, save, perhaps, in Canada, of conciliating the irresistible progressiveness of modern civilisation with modes of native life which are more or less incompatible with social and political advance.

The treaty concluded at Waitangi in 1840 conveyed the whole political power and sovereignty of the Chiefs to the Queen, and expressly confirmed and guaranteed to the chiefs and tribes of New Zealand, and the families and individuals thereof, the full and undisturbed enjoyment of all their rights of property, as long as they desired to retain the same. The document was duly executed by a large number of chiefs, but it may well be doubted whether many of them were aware of the real nature of the transaction; in all probability, their principal motive was to escape the annexation about that time threatened by the French. The treaty, in mentioning, seemed to recognise the existence of individual proprietary rights; but it is clear that all lands were, by Maori custom, tribal property, and that the members of the tribe were merely usufructuaries of the plots they occupied, while not even the chiefs could dispose of any portion of the tribal estate without the consent of the tribe. A sort of jus postliminii, too, was recognised by the natives; and a tribe, by the performance of certain formal acts, which was rarely omitted, could keep alive for an indefinite period its proprietary rights in lands which had in any other way than by conquest passed out of the occupation of its members. That the treaty was not adhered to by the colonists in the spirit any more than in the letter is indisputable, but it seems probable that it could not have been adhered to with any strictness, without involving an abandonment of the further colonisation of the country. Quarrels with the natives concerning land were of almost daily occurrence; and the main, one might say the only question of New-Zealand politics, was how to oust the natives from the possession of their tribal districts. The war of 1861 grew out of a dispute concerning the sale of a tract of land, known as the Waitara block, over which rival chiefs claimed "mana," or supremacy. The whole transaction is minutely described by Mr. Rusden, and the upshot of the evidence he presents is that the Chief Rangitake, who was unwilling to join in or sanction the sale, had the better title. It was determined to take the land by force, and troops were sent to Taranaki for that purpose. Rangitake was careful not to begin hostilities; he erected a pah, and refused to surrender, but did not fire until the colonial forces had opened upon the fort with guns and rockets. The colonists felt that the struggle which ensued was one which threatened to overtax their resources; troops were hastily applied for from Australia, and the aid of the mother-country was likewise invoked. Sir George Grey was sent out as Governor, and, after a prolonged investigation of the Waitara matter, was obliged to acknowledge the validity of the native title, and to abandon the claim. The war, however, lasted, with occasional intermissions, to 1865, ending in the submission of the "rebels," the whole of whose lands in the Taranaki province were confiscated. A fresh rising broke out in the same district three years later, but was put down within twelve months. Rangitake himself, better known as Wiremu Kingi, could not be induced to return to Waitara until 1872. Of the further policy of the Colonial Government a disagreeable view is afforded by a despatch from Sir Arthur Gordon, dated February 26th, 1881, and printed in the appendix. The despatch is a very long one, but is especially interesting by reason of the luminous résumé it gives of the history of the land question after the close of the Waitara war. The nominal confiscation of the country north of the Waingongoro was not enforced, and the district, with the tacit approval of the Government, was re-occupied by the natives. Indeed, Sir George Grey expressly stated that it was the intention to restore it to the native owners. Nevertheless, in 1877 the Government determined to sell a portion of this tract, and commenced the survey, without consulting with the Maori occupants, or proposing any arrangement for safeguarding their interests. The natives "had every reason," says the report of a Royal Commission, "to believe that the land would be sold, without any reserves being made for them." A Maori chief, the well known Te Whiti, pleaded the cause of his people; but his arguments were not listened to, and he was driven to the conclusion that a demonstration of some kind was the only means of arousing the attention of the Government. The demonstration took the not very formidable form of ploughing certain plots of land which had been granted to white settlers. Some of these gentlemen proposed to shoot down the natives, others demanded that, should hostilities occur, the land might be declared "free" even of "friendly Maoris." The intruders were, apparently, unarmed, and though they repeated their "trespasses," made no resistance upon being arrested. Some were punished at once, others were kept in prison for years, without being brought to trial. Meanwhile, a Royal Commission pronounced the native claims to be by no means visionary, but real and substantial. A variety of Acts were passed, one of which created the offence of being suspected of an intention (the italics are not ours) to commit the trespasses, &c., mentioned in the Acts. What followed is current history. Te Whiti, who had made various speeches of a mystical, semi-religious nature, was arrested at a great marae, or meeting of his people, near Parihaka. It is difficult to read Mr. Rusden's record of the brutal details of the proceedings without a shudder of shame and disgust. No legal offence could be brought home to him, even under the disgraceful Acts we have referred to; and recourse was had to a Bill of Attainder, by virtue of which he was kept in prison, where, for aught we know, he still lies. It must be remembered, in connection with this history, that neither Te Whiti nor any one of his people had laid a finger upon any white man.

When New Zealand was rediscovered by Captain Cook, the population numbered considerably over 100,000 souls. The northern island was much more thickly populated than the middle island, though the latter seems better fitted to support a large population. The introduction of European diseases and European firearms resulted in the fall of the population to 56,000 in 1858, of whom 53,000 were inhabitants of the northern island. According to the official statistics contained in the appendix, the Maoris numbered 44,000 in 1880, the whites nearly half a million. Of the sixty-seven millions of acres which are comprised within the limits of the colony, fifteen and a half millions have been sold, for £11,524,867. Perhaps Mr. Rusden can tell us how much of this, in money or other value, has passed to the Maoris. The book is well written, in a vein of mingled enthusiasm and indignation that lends eloquence to many of its pages, but occasionally leads to what we cannot but think harsh judgments upon various public men. No pains seem to have been spared in collecting and collating authorities, and the record appears to be, on the whole, as trustworthy as it is minute. But we fear it is destined rather to cause the descendants of the present colonists to be ashamed of their foregoers, than to induce the latter materially to alter their ways.

AN ITALIAN CONDOTTIERE OF THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.*

TOWARDS the close of the thirteenth century, the Emperor, despite Dante's frantic appeal, refused to bestride the saddle of the Cæsars; while the Pope, at a somewhat later date, became a French priest at Avignon. The Republics of Northern and Central Italy were losing or had lost the liberties they had won from Ghibelline Counts and Guelf Bishops. Political power was passing from the hands of the democracies to oligarchies split up into a number of shifting and bitterly hostile parties. According to Sismondi, the tale of enfranchised citizens diminished from nearly two millions in the thirteenth to less than two hundred thousand in the fourteenth century, and at the close of the fifteenth century not more than eighteen thousand citizens, out of a population of eighteen millions, possessed any political power whatever. The energies of the Republics, uncontrolled by Pope or Emperor, were spent in wars with each other, and in domestic quarrels, for which the slumbering tradition of Guelf and Ghibelline, in the absence of other causes, was always sufficient to afford a pretext. The fatal interference of some saviour of society became an annual necessity, and the military adventurers called in alternately by the successful factions, and invested with the title of Podestà, Captain of the People, or Preserver of the Peace, were soon able to convert their temporary dictatorship into a more or less permanent despotism. In M. Yriarte's exhaustive monograph on the great Condottiera house of the Malatesti of Rimini, we have the record of one of the most signal of these usurpations, together with a curious and interesting account of the Court of an Italian mediæval despot, of the life he led, and of the singular state of society which rendered such an existence possible.

It was the policy of the petty tyrants of the time to withdraw their subjects as much as possible from military pursuits, and up to the middle of the fourteenth century the quarrels of the despotised Republics were chiefly fought-out by foreign mercenaries, disbanded Germans, Frenchmen, or Hungarians, led by their own captains, and making their own terms. One of the most celebrated of these free companies was composed of Englishmen, whom Sir John Hawkwood, one of Fuller's "Worthies," took with him into Italy after the peace of Bretigny, and hired-out to the best paymaster. Each man-at-arms seems to have received pay at a rate equivalent to about £8 per month, to which he added considerably by plunder and by the ransom of prisoners. To so lucrative an employment the Italians were soon attracted, and by the end of the fourteenth century hardly a foreign mercenary remained in the country. The service was not a dangerous one. The military tactics of the time consisted chiefly in marching bodies of heavy cavalry up and down the enemy's country until it was exhausted, when they retired, and the people came out of their fortified towns, or castelli, of which the remains are so numerous in Central and Northern Italy, to resume their avocations. Actual fighting was avoided by both the opposing parties, who wisely reserved their valour for the unlucky inhabitants of the invaded districts.

M. Yriarte's account of the origin of the Malatesti is by no means clear. The first of the family is generally said to have been a Ravennese count of the creation or following of Otto III., but the one to whom the surname of Malatesta, or "Wrong-head," was given seems to have been a Count Carpegna la Penna de' Billi. In 1239 his son, Giovanni, whom M. Yriarte makes the first of the Malatesti, was called in to the defence of Rimini, and in due course became podestà of the town. Of his four grandsons, the eldest was the husband, and the second, Paolo, was the lover of Francesca da Rimini, whose sad and tender story is so pathetically told by Dante in the fifth canto of the Inferno. The third son, Malatestino, is the terrible, bloody dog of the twenty-seventh canto. In 1417 the most distinguished of the Malatesti, Sigismondo Pandolfo, a natural son of Pandolfo, great-grandson of Malestino, was born at Brescia. "Of all the Italian princes of the fifteenth century," says M. Yriarte,

* Un Condottiere au XV. Siècle: Rimini. Etudes sur les Lettres et les Arts à la Cour des Malatesti. Orné de 200 Dessins. Par Ch. Yriarte. Paris: Rothschild.

"he was probably the one who best represents the tendencies of a period when, under the high culture of the beginnings of the Renaissance, could still be discerned the harsh traits, the violence, and the savagery of the middle ages." To compass an end or satisfy a caprice he recoiled before no deed of force or fraud, yet he was a discriminating and enthusiastic lover and patron of art, and a poet who wrote verses full of tenderness and sweetness. Morality, however, does not always accompany a fine taste in literature and art, and the position of an Italian despot of the fifteenth century, surrounded by fierce and unscrupulous enemies and doubtful friends, was not one to soften the character or refine the conscience. The most interesting events of Sigismond's life were his love for Isotta, and the building of the so-called "Temple of the Malatesta," now the Cathedral of Rimini. The portraits of Isotta given by M. Yriarte probably do her scant justice, for contemporary writers agree in extolling the beauty of her person as well as the charm of her character. An affecting letter is reproduced in fac-simile, in which she implores her lover to make her his wife, and it is at least one pleasant fact in the history of this truculent condottiere that he acceded, albeit with some reluctance, to her request. Of the celebrated temple, the chief work of Alberti, a very complete and interesting description is given. The building is a sort of architectural tour de force, an outer romanesque construction in coloured marble enveloping and in part assimilated with the earlier Gothic church, which held the tombs of the Malatesta family. The chapels are richly adorned with bas-reliefs, the subjects of most of which are of a classical rather than of a Christian character. Of the more important of these, admirable woodcuts are given, affording a good idea of the singular energy of the modelling, which is neither Classical nor Christian, but rather modern and realistic, both in conception and execution. The dedication of the Temple to "the immortal God" is another sign of the Pagan turn of mind of its founder. The principal Italian States successively availed themselves of the services of Sigismond, but, disgusted with his ambition and violence, finally combined against him and deprived him of all his possessions on the Adriatic, save the seignory of Rimini. There, worn out with disappointment and forced inaction, he died, in 1468, his last moments occupied with devising means for accomplishing the completion of the great Temple, which was designed to carry down his name to posterity. Of the inner life of his Court not much is known, save what can be gathered from the public acts and from the monuments of his reign. Following the custom of the age, he surrounded himself with such of the scholars, poets, and artists of the day as he could induce to attach themselves to his Court. A great name in literature or art was regarded much in the same light as an antique statue or a rare manuscript, and the possession of either category of treasure was disputed with equal keenness by the polished despots of the period. Thus Petrarch had been the guest of the Malatesti of Pesaro, Dante of the Polentas of Ravenna. According to Tiraboschi, the first academy in Italy was established at Rimini, in 1406. Giotto was induced to assist in the adornment of San Francesco, and Ghiberti was employed by Carlo Malatesta to paint the frescoes of his gattolo, while Venturi, the forerunner of Da Vinci, and Battista Alberti were the engineers and architects of Sigismond.

The most interesting chapters of M. Yriarte's sumptuous volume are those devoted to this portion of his subject, which is treated with an amplitude of knowledge and a critical but sympathetic appreciation which leave nothing to be desired. The very numerous illustrations which enrich the book are worthy of equal praise. A few of them are apparently taken from photographs, such as the view of the Bargello at Florence, and these are the least pleasing. But the majority are after sketches made upon the spot, and reproduce with vividness the characteristic traits of eastern Italian scenery; while the numerous fac-similes of miniatures in old manuscripts, illustrative of mediæval life, are extremely curious and interesting. The documents appended to the volume have a philological as well as an historical value. The Ferma, or contract between Sigismond and the Republic of Florence, is a good example of fifteenth-century Italian, and with its repetition of "concio sia cosa" (whereas), &c., its recitals and its tautological accuracy of expression would delight an English conveyancer of the old school, while the glimpse it affords of the Condottiere system is especially valuable. By it the "Magnificent Community" take over the services of Sigismond from the Duke of Milan at the rate previously agreed upon between the latter, of 50,000 florins for one year, payable monthly, for which 1,400 cavalry and 400 infantry were to be provided to fight for the Republic within the limits of Tuscany, as the Balia or their Commissioner might direct.

M. Yriarte writes in a clear, simple style, never striving after effect, but rather avoiding anything like eloquence or enthusiasm. Yet the interest of his pages never flags; so thorough is his knowledge of his subject and so real his sympathy with it, that the fascination of the reader is complete, without any sense of its being sought.

A ROUGH JOURNEY.*

THIS book may be viewed in several lights. If the reader takes it to be a prospectus of new gold diggings on the West Coast of Africa, he would do well to skip the whole of the first volume and half the second. In what remains, a good deal of information will be found, particularly in Mr. Cameron's portion. The veteran traveller and bookmaker Captain Burton is always in too slap-dash and go-ahead a humour to give his readers the information he has to convey in a digested form. But the book may be also taken as the record of a pleasure trip. Then the reader should skim lightly through it, stopping where it interests him, passing swiftly by the dull, stony reaches where there is no relief. In this way, a small modicum of enjoyment may be got from its pages, but we are bound to confess that our own experience has taught us that it is very small. We tried hard to read the book consecutively and closely, and had to give up the attempt in sheer despair. Reading Captain Burton's slovenly, slangy sentences, jumping after him from one topic to another in hot haste, and submitting between jumps to what may be described as random thwacks from his self-opinionative cudgel, fairly broke us down before the end of the first volume was reached, and we had to take the rest in little stages after dinner, cautiously feeling the way. This is why we have described the book as "a rough journey." It was, indeed, that,—the roughest we have taken for a long time.

And yet a certain astuteness of calculation has entered into the design and production of this book. An enterprising gentleman of Liverpool is interested with others in auriferous mining on the Gold Coast, and, no doubt, experienced in the great difficulty there is in attracting public attention to the wealth supposed to lie there. Other people had brought out companies, and in various ways tried to induce mankind to see the golden prospect through their eyes, but with very limited success. Something more was requisite to bring the new El Dorado effectively into public view, and this gentleman seems to have hit upon the idea of getting Captain Burton to accompany Mr. Cameron to the Gold Coast, and to write a book about it, or about his journey to it. The idea was not at all a bad one. Captain Burton is a celebrated traveller, who has written many books,—books read apparently by society and the subscribers to Mudie's. He had been at the Gold Coast before, and he possesses a fine, full-chested, dogmatic way of enunciating his opinions that goes far to convince the thoughtless. At times, too, he describes well, and can be lively. The chances were, then, that his book would be read, that the gold of West Africa would, at all events, get talked about by the public and noticed by the Press in a way never before seen. Such, we say, appears to have been the idea lying at the root of this journey, and the resulting book. Perhaps the event will justify the enterprise displayed in the conception; but whether or not, the book is a bad one, ill-written, flighty, discursive to a degree beyond Captain Burton's usual standard. To some extent, however, these defects can scarcely be ascribed exclusively to the author. His task was an excessively difficult one. In the first place, there was not enough material for a book in a mere record of journeyings to look at mines, actual or possible, within a few miles of the coast at Axim, even when descriptions of the fevers and other plagues of the region were thrown in. Captain Burton had consequently to begin further back, but he has been such a voracious sight-seer, that nowhere in all his route had he new ground to tread upon. He had even been in that very quarter of the Gold Coast before, and had published in 1863 a book called Wanderings in West Africa, so that there was positively nothing fresh for him, except a few mine-shafts and alluvial gold-working appliances. The task, then, was to make a book of two volumes—aggregating more than 700 pages octavo out of old materials, and twice or thrice seen sights. It was too great a task to be done well, particularly as Mr. Cameron plays a very secondary part in performing it, merely describing a few mines that his fellow-traveller was too ill to go and see; and from this point of view, Captain Burton is deserving of a reviewer's sympathy. He undertook the impossible, and failed.

But when all allowance has been made, we must still protest that the chief author of this book has disregarded the fair treatment of his readers, and has sacrificed them too ruthlessly to the exigencies of book-making in forcing them to start with him for the Gold Coast at Trieste, and in taking them first, via Patras and other dull Mediterranean ports, to Lisbon, and for a whole fortnight to Madeira. Ah! that fortnight. If Captain Burton wanted to imbue his readers' minds with a horror of the place, and all that belongs to it, to make them swear an oath, deep and solemn, that, come weal or woe, they never would put foot on Madeira's shore, then is his success great indeed! It is cruel, but the readers must bear with us while we give a sample or two from the records of this terrible fortnight. Opening the book at page 54, we find this:—

"Amongst other things, Governor Farrobo indulged his fair friends with a display of the old jogo de canas, or running at the ring. The Praça Academica had been rigged out to serve as a tilting-yard, with a central alley of palisading and two 'stands,' grand and little. The purpose was charitable, and the performers were circus-horses, mounted by professionals and amateurs, who thus 'renowned it' before the public and their damas. The circlet, hanging to a line, equalled the diameter of a small boy's hat; and when the 'knight' succeeded in bearing it off upon his pole, he rode up to be decorated by the hands of a very charming person with a ribbon-baudrière of Bath dimensions and rainbow colours. Prizes were banal as medals after a modern war, and perhaps for the same purpose—to prevent unchristian envy, hatred, and malice. Almost any trooper in an Anglo-Indian cavalry regiment would have done better; but then he would have couched his bamboo spear properly, and would have put out his horse to speed—an idea which seemed to elude the Madeiran mind. The fête ended with a surprise less expensive than that with which the Parisian restaurant astonishes the travelling Britisher. A paper chandelier was suspended between two posts, of course to be knocked down, when out sprang an angry, hunch-backed dwarf, who abused and fiercely struck at all straight backs within reach."

That is the best description in this part of the book. And now take a taste of the Captain's cudgel. He is speaking of the non-success of sugar-making in Madeira:—

"Here sugar-working in the present day requires for bare existence high protective duties. The Government, however, has had the common-sense, and the Madeirans patriotic feeling enough, to defend their industry from certain ruinous vagaries, by taxing imported growths 80 reis (4d.) per kilo. A hard-grit free-trader would abolish this abomination and ruin half the island. And here I would remark that in England the world has seen for the first time a wealthy and commercial, a great and generous nation proclaim, and take pride in proclaiming, the most immoral doctrine. 'Free Trade,' so called, I presume, because it is practically the reverse of free or fair trade, openly abjures public spirit and the chief obligation of the citizen—to think of his neighbour as well as himself, and not to let charity end, as it often begins, at home. 'Buy cheap and sell dear' is the law delivered by its prophets, the whole duty of 'the merchant and the man.' When its theorists ask me the favourite question, 'Would you not buy in the cheapest market?' I reply, 'Yes, but my idea of cheapness is not yours: I want the best, no matter what its price, because it will prove cheapest in the end.' How long these Free-trade fads and fooleries will last no one can say; but they can hardly endure till that millennium when the world accepts the doctrine, and when Free Trade becomes free trade and fair trade.,,

And so Captain Burton goes on, with opinions equally fixed and nice on all topics, including the amount of gold to be dug up or worked out in West Africa. On the whole, too, the above extracts exhibit his eccentricities and his "cosmopolitan" English in a fair, average way. We could give the reader much more gritty matter, but forbear. What is most irritating of all to the ignorant, untravelled mind is Captain Burton's habit of spluttering along with myriads of allusions to scenes, men, and things he knows and has seen, but of which his readers can know nothing. He talks of the most unfamiliar places in Africa much as a Cockney might talk of Trafalgar Square, and the result is not conducive either to interesting narratives or vivid portrayal. The best thing in the book is an account of an ascent of Mount Atlas. The description of the sunrise seen from the top becomes nearly eloquent, but is spoilt, as usual, by the statement, referring to the rolling-away of the vapour-cloud from the landscape below, that "Martin the Great might have borrowed an idea from the waste of waters, as it seemed to be." Immediately after this journey has been described, we get a chapter called the "Spanish Account of the Repulse of Nelson from Santa Cruz de Tenerife," extracted from a "circumstantial account" published in Madrid in 1798; and so, by one device or another, the due two volumes are in time brought to completion,—the Gold Coast is reached. The part of the book that is filled with Gold-Coast matter may interest a few people, but we are sure that if the gold does not attract men there, the descriptions of the country and of the people will not. Both are set before us in as bad a way as they can well be, and are in themselves most unlovely.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Sunny Lands and Seas: a Voyage in the SS. 'Ceylon.' By Hugh Wilkinson. (John Murray.)—The yachts that circumnavigate the globe are doubtless among the luxuries of advanced civilisation. But the arrangement has its "seamy" side, and we see it in such a book as this. Here is a gentleman who spends five months in voyaging from "China to Peru," writes his experiences to his friends—a blameless, and even laudable act—and then is led away by their polite acknowledgments to publish a bulky volume. Is every such voyage—and they are sure to be multiplied—to produce a crop of these superficial notes of travel? Of all tiresome people, on paper and in talk, the worst are those who lay down the law about strange men and cities, because they have paid them a flying visit. But Mr. Wilkinson is worse than tiresome. He writes the most utter fallacies about Missionaries and native populations, because he spent a week or so among the Islands of the Pacific. It must be either folly or spite that makes him attribute to the preachers of religion the decay due to the avarice and profligacy of traders and adventurers and sailors. The condition and prospects of the South-Sea paradises are bad enough. Does Mr. Wilkinson think they would have been better, if the Missionaries had left the traders and adventurers entirely to themselves? Which does he think the better civilised, Bishop Patteson, or the sea-captain who fires on a native village because it will not send out its young girls for prostitution?

A Child of the Menhir. By Austin Clare. 3 vols. (Tinsley Brothers.)—This is one of the few novels which we can recommend without reserve to our readers. The scene is laid in Brittany, the time is the era of the French Revolution. The hero is a foundling, whom the young couple, just bereaved of their eldest child, adopt. The childhood of Christophe, that is the hero's name, as he grows up among his foster-brothers and sisters (one of whom is a young count), is very prettily described. Then comes a period of darkness and trouble. The beggar who first found him claims him as his son, and forces him to become the companion of his wanderings, and even an accomplice in his crimes. The misery of these scenes forms a powerful contrast to the brightness and gaiety of earlier days. Then come various vicissitudes till he returns at last to the home of his childhood. And all along there is the constant conflict in his mind between the claims of religion, as personified in the person of the enthusiastic young priest Bernéz, and the natural emotions of his age. As the story approaches its dénouement, it becomes remarkably interesting. The disturbed course of French history at the time is skilfully intermingled with the troubles and perplexities of the characters of the tale. And throughout the whole, the peculiarities of Breton manners and customs are touched with no common skill and picturesque power. A Child of the Menhir is well contrived, well written, and thoroughly wholesome in tone.

Ensilage in America. By James E. Thorold Rogers, M.P. (W. Swan Sonnenschein and Co.)—It is just possible that some of our readers may not know that "ensilage" is the practice of storing green fodder in pits—if that may be called a pit which may be wholly, and generally is in part, above-ground—that are air-tight and water-tight, as far as may be. The practice has been largely adopted in the United States, and Mr. Rogers has collected in this little volume a number of facts relating to its economical value. To marshal these facts is one of his objects in this little volume; the other is to discuss the prospects of the method in English agriculture. Certainly, the matter, to an outsider, has a very hopeful look. If the landlords would build, or encourage their tenants to build, silos, it is probable that they might be more usefully employed than in trying to shift the burden of local taxation from the right shoulder to the left.

Of High Degree. By Charles Gibbon. 3 vols. (Chatto and Windus.)—This is a remarkably well-constructed story. Few readers, we imagine, will be altogether satisfied with the conclusion of Mr. Gibbon's narrative; but none will deny that it is reached by a very ingenious process. The opening scene introduces us to the two characters whom we must recognise, we suppose, as the hero and heroine of the story, though they are not the most interesting of Mr. Gibbon's dramatis personæ. Ruth Clark bids farewell to Stephen Meredith. He loves her, and she loves him; but he is embarrassed and she is penniless, and she thinks it well that they should part. The story tells us how her purpose is accomplished, and how also she does not miss her own happiness in the end. It is in this last point that we find the weak places of the story. Ruth finds a wealthy husband, but we cannot see that she finds more. We cannot but feel, too, that Stephen is badly treated. Why should he be made prosperous against his will, if he preferred love and poverty. For all this, the story is excellently well told, and Dahlia Whitcombe, the young woman to whom the unlucky lover is handed over, with her blind, jealous love, is a finely-drawn character. So is the intriguing Raper, the clever schemer, whose elaborate plans we are delighted to find foiled by the energy and vigilance of more honest folk. The third volume, with its rapid action, intricate, without being confused, and carrying on the reader in absorbed interest, does the greatest credit to Mr. Gibbon's ability as a writer of fiction.

The Wonders of Nature. By Professor Rudolph, revised by Alex. Brown, LL.D. (A. Gardner.)—This little book, of American origin, is attractively written. It mainly treats of that popular subject, the wonders of astronomy; but there is a single chapter, "The Wonders of Oxygen," which belongs more strictly to the domain of chemistry, and which should have been revised or omitted. To affirm that elements are substances "in their natural state," that "the atmosphere is a compound of oxygen and nitrogen," and that 1/2 of the solid globe and 1/9 of the air are oxygen, is curiously inexact.

Unspotted from the World. By Mrs. Godfrey. (R. Bentley and Son.)—Mrs. Godfrey has worked up into this novel the situation which Mr. Barrett Browning so pathetically describes in "Bertha in the Lane." As this situation would of itself hardly suffice, she adds some circumstances of a tragical kind to the younger sister's life. Her father hates the sight of her, because he believes her mother to have been unfaithful to him; she loses her heart to a worthless lover, who goes very near to ruining the happiness of her married life, when she has found a really worthy husband. This younger sister's character is drawn with delicacy and discrimination. In her weakness and in her strength, she is genuinely natural. Dorothy, the self-sacrificing elder, fails sometimes to interest us, perhaps because she is preternaturally good and wise. The story of the younger girl's season in London, under the care of her grandmother, a miracle of the cosmetic art, is told with much spirit, though the picture of fashionable life is anything but flattering.

Indian Snake Poisons. By A. J. Wall, M.D. (W. H. Allen and Co.)—This is an interesting account of the action of snake poison, especially of the poison of the cobra. The practical conclusion is given in the sixth chapter, where Dr. Wall deals with the questions of prevention and treatment. He discusses the policy of the rewards given for the destruction of venomous snakes in some Indian districts, and pronounces in its favour, when practised under restrictions. The subject of the treatment does not present any hopeful features. The only chance is in immediate isolation of the bitten part; as 94 per cent. of the bites are in some one of the extremities, this is possible, if only the appliances are at hand. But this "if" is, of course, a very important condition. Potassium permanganate absolutely neutralises the poison chemically by oxidation, but injected into the system it is useless, because it oxidises not the poison specially, but everything with which it comes into contact. We cannot help remarking that no practical result whatever seems to have come from the experiments on living animals which are here recorded.

My Heart and I. By Elinor Hume. (Bentley and Son.)—A heroine who tells her own story seldom tells it well. She is generally self-conscious, telling us, for instance, that she is very selfish, while she really thinks herself self-sacrificing; and that she is plain, while she evidently cherishes a secret belief in her own beauty. Nina, Miss Hume's heroine, is full of these affectations. A more tiresome person, with her perpetual protestations, self-accusations, and self-justifications, we have seldom met with, even in fiction. The plot is not very clearly developed. At one time we think it is to be another repetition of "Bertha in the Lane;" then the tables are turned, and the elder sister triumphs over the younger. One thing is plain, that a less interesting set of people than the characters of My Heart and I have seldom been brought together. This is the more to be regretted because Miss Hume has undoubtedly some literary power.

Bid Me Discourse, and other Tales. By Mary Cecil Hay. 3 vols. (Hurst and Blackett.)—Miss Hay's powers do not appear to much advantage in the short tales collected in these three volumes. We can see that she knows how to contrive a plot, for now and then we come upon a dramatic situation, and there are occasionally forcible touches of character. But for the proper development of this, there is not sufficient space or opportunity. We may take as an instance the tale entitled "Kenneth." Something might be made of the leading idea. A young woman is forced by circumstances to hide her real character from the man who is ready to love her; an accident reveals it, and all ends well. But in "Kenneth," the development of events is almost ludicrously hurried. The two young people have been as distant, not to say as rude to each other as possible, and then we have the transformation scene of the avowal of mutual attachment. One is irresistibly reminded of the "wholesome aversion" which a famous character recommends as the beginning of love. It is perhaps the result of the constraint thus put upon the writer, that the sentiment of these tales is somewhat sickly and wanting in reality. Miss Hay ought to know that in England magistrates have not the power, even if we could suppose they had the will, to sentence a child to "solitary imprisonment for two years."

Facing the Footlights. By Florence Marryat (Mrs. Francis Lean). 3 vols. (F. V. White and Co.)—There is some better work in these three volumes than we have lately seen from "Florence Marryat's" pen. All that concerns the heroine's training for and appearance on the stage is well told; the girl, too, bears herself with spirit and good-sense, and awakens the interest of those who follow her fortunes. The theatrical follies of fashionable amateurs and the silly curiosity of audiences who come to see not a skilful actress, but a celebrated beauty, are justly denounced. The surprise of the book, the mystery that surrounds the end of Mrs. Gerome, is ingeniously contrived, though it does not lead to anything, as far as we can see. We half expected that it would have resulted in the discomfiture of the worthless husband and his favourite. How would things stand with a man who married again on the strength of his wife having given herself out as having died? All this writer's practice in writing has not given her a perfect command over English. Envoys, not facts, are said to be "accredited," and an "infinitesimal" run is not a thing that theatrical managers desire.

We have also received The Evolution of Christianity. (Williams and Norgate.) An elaborate treatise, which has for its object to prove that the present creed of Christendom was developed in the course of the first three centuries.—The Gospel according to St. Matthew, with Notes, critical and practical. By the Rev. M. F. Sadler. (Bell and Sons.)—Importance of Faith in Scripture Miracles. By an Associate of King's College. (Houghton and Co.)—Many Voices. By Marguerite Tollemache. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.) A sketch of eminent personages in Christendom of the first sixteen centuries, beginning with St. Clement of Rome, and ending with Reuchlin.—Romanism; or, Doctrinal and Practical Examination of the Creed of Pope Pius IV. By the Rev. NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE Russian Czar reached the suburbs of Moscow on Sunday by train, and on Tuesday made his state entry into his ancient capital. He rode in on a white horse, preceded and followed by a procession miles long, including all the representatives of Europe, his subordinate Kings in Asia, his own family, the chief nobles of Russia, the great officials of the Empire, hundreds of Generals and other officers, and hundreds more of the servitors of the Court. The Empress sat with her little daughter in a large carriage which looked like one mass of gold. The way was lined with soldiers, and guarded by great bodies of cavalry, cuirassiers, Uhlands, and Cossacks, and the scene was full of an original kind of pomp, half military, half Asiatic. No accident whatever occurred, except that a Court chamberlain was thrown and broke his head, and the reception by the people was most enthusiastic. The devotion, it is specially noted, extends to the Imperial family, the Grand Duke Sergius in particular being followed everywhere by admiring crowds. The actual coronation will not take place till Sunday, after which the Emperor must ride unattended among his people; but so far, nothing has been heard of the Nihilists, though the Police continue to make numerous arrests. The time of danger is now short, and it is most probable that the extreme precautions taken will prove successful, more especially as assassins are always affected by the popular mood. Nevertheless, the Ides of March are not yet passed.

It appears to be settled that Major Evelyn Baring, the Indian Chancellor of the Exchequer, shall succeed Sir E. Malet as Consul-General in Egypt, though as yet no official announcement has been made. Indeed, we are not sure that a vote will not be needed, as Major Baring is to receive special powers, and as he surrenders £8,000 a year in India, a special salary. He will, in fact, be Resident, and we hope will be marked by some special designation, such as "Envoy Extraordinary to the Porte resident in Egypt." That will give him the necessary rank. The selection is a very good one, as Major Baring has great experience, both of general political business and of Egyptian finance, thorough knowledge of Egyptian personages, and a strong will. He will be able not only to guide and support the Khedive, who is surrounded by rascals intent on speculation, but to neglect trifles, the great difficulty of a man in his position. Every European in Egypt thinks that his special affair is the pivot of the universe, and that the Resident who does not listen to him fails. Major Baring can be deaf when needful, a form of strength which is rapidly becoming more scarce.

The Italian Premier, having on Saturday obtained a direct and unqualified vote of confidence, by 348 to 29, on Sunday placed his resignation in the King's hands. His object in taking this step is to rid himself of certain members of his Cabinet, who consider his policy too Conservative, and resent his acceptance by the Right. He has, of course, been asked to form a new Ministry, and in spite of some hitches will, it is believed, retain all his colleagues except two, and replace them by two Conservativish men, who are not by party Conservatives. He is quite absolute in the present House, but believes that the Radicals are strong out-of-doors, and will have a much stronger party at the next elections. As his intention is to govern with any majority obtainable, he does not wish to break with the Radicals more abruptly than he can help, and would gladly retain their more moderate men. No Minister in Europe occupies quite the same position, though it has analogies with that once occupied by Lord Palmerston. The difference is that the Italian Tories give S. Depretis open instead of secret support.

A great Liberal demonstration took place at Hengler's Circus, in Liverpool, yesterday week, the chief speakers being Mr. S. Smith, the Liberal Member for Liverpool elected last December, and Mr. John Morley, M.P. for Newcastle-on-Tyne. Mr. Smith made a very weighty and impressive speech on the great difficulty of the day,—the block of business in Parliament,—which he ascribed to three causes,—the immense multiplication of local business which ought to be dealt with in local bodies; the loquacity of Members; and the definite wish to obstruct. He did not believe that anything short of completely new rules limiting the time allotted not only to each speaker, but to each great debate, would adequately put down the loquacity and the obstruction. In speaking of the Affirmation Bill, which he eloquently defended from the religious point of view, Mr. Smith expressed his hearty confidence in the Government; while, on the Irish question, he was disposed to adopt more or less Mr. Mitchell Henry's view of our duty to that country. He thought that we ought to develop Ireland as we develop India, by applying a considerable sum to the construction of public works.

Mr. John Morley's speech was less social and more political in its drift. He defended the Affirmation Bill, on the ground that all opinions on religious questions—whether they might be called religious or irreligious—should be treated as wholly outside politics; nay, he went further, and said the same of all social opinions. Now, surely there are social opinions which it ought to be penal to propagate. A teacher who should be found inculcating on his pupils, even out of school, contempt for the sacredness of marriage, ought to be ineligible as a teacher in State schools; and we can see no reason why the House of Commons has not a perfect right to take notice of a book propagating immoral doctrines, and written by any of its Members, if it should think that course wise and expedient. Mr. Morley expressed very frankly his belief that Ireland would never be pacified till there was much greater freedom of local self-organisation in Ireland, and much more regard paid to Irish opinion on Irish topics in the House of Commons, than there is at present. And on what is called "non-intervention" he expressed very sweeping views indeed, which go far beyond any in which we can concur. Nevertheless, his speech was full of manly and vigorous Liberalism,—Liberalism partly, perhaps, of the past, mostly of the future.

The Liberal meeting at Wolverhampton yesterday week was important, as showing that the Liberal party in the country have seen the importance to be attached to Sir Stafford Northcote's "Thermopylae" speech, and have interpreted it just as we interpreted it on the day after it was spoken, as meaning that the Tory party are prepared to force triennial dissolutions on the country, by obstructing to the last point of their ability measures cordially accepted by the constituencies only three years ago. Mr. H. Fowler, the junior Member for Wolverhampton, insisted that triennial Parliaments might now be regarded as part of the programme of Tory democracy, and urged the Government, on the reassembling of Parliament this week, to appropriate Tuesdays and Fridays for pressing forward the Government measures now before Parliament. Mr. Osborne Morgan made some caustic remarks on the new Tory Elisha, and his attacks on the "honourable" Tadpoles by whom, in that prophetic person's opinion, the Tories of the House of Commons are now led; and also upon Sir Stafford Northcote's attempt to immortalise the tactics of Mr. Warton as akin to those of the Spartan King Leonidas. It is clear enough that the Wolverhampton Liberals understand precisely the exact issue now before the country, and are determined to fight it out on the true lines, "though it take," as General Grant said, "all the summer."

Mr. Stanhope's speech at King's Lynn on Monday shows either a curious dullness of financial mind, or else a very unfair desire to mislead his audience as to the actual expenditure of the last and the present Government. He actually asserted that "since 1880 the expenditure of the country had gone on increasing every year," and also that the expenditure of the Liberals in India "is £3,500,000 in excess of that of the Conservatives." Mr. Stanhope ought to know that both assertions are absolutely unfounded, unless the incurring of Debt and the repayment of Debt,—which last is, in fact, saving,—are not to be counted. In India, the last Government heaped up Debt for the most mischievous and disgraceful of wars, and in England they borrowed what Mr. Gladstone has ever since been painfully paying back. Mr. Stanhope also took much pains to convince the farmers that the present Government are hostile to their interests, but had the candour frankly to admit that the principle of the Bill for compensating tenants for unexhausted improvements is quite sound.

Mr. D. Plunket, in his speech at Chelsea on Tuesday, was still more wild in his hitting than Mr. Stanhope had been at King's Lynn. He remarked, in relation to South Africa, that "it was plain that all the old respect for the dignity, the power, the permanent policy, and the resistless will of the English people, which had so long dominated the wild people in Africa, had vanished away." How "old" is the respect to which Mr. Plunket refers? Is it older than 1879? In that year certainly, when Cetewayo fell upon the British forces at Isandlana, there was not much sign of "respect for the dignity, the power, the permanent policy, and the resistless will of the English people." Mr. Plunket went on to refer to the condition of domestic questions, and spoke of the present House of Commons as a patient whose fine constitution had been much "knocked about by the hard life and drastic remedies of the doctors who took it in hand." "They had tried the caucus, they had tried the cloture, they had tried a devolution, and they had tried permeation, and he knew not what other quack Radical remedies they might yet apply." Mr. Plunket mistakes. The caucus was not a remedy for the troubles in the House, but a device to get at the true view of the constituencies which was completely successful; and the closure has never been actually tried at all, but only adopted for future trial. Devolution seems to be succeeding fairly well, and "permeation" is no more a specific remedy than the diffusion of gases or any other natural process which no one set of persons can either retard or hasten, is a specific remedy. The "drastic" medicines have not been applied to the House of Commons by Liberals, but by the Irish and the Tories; and of these, Mr. Warton's quack remedy of obstruction is by far the most remarkable, especially since it has been consecrated by the approbation of Sir Stafford Northcote.

The motion on Tuesday for adjourning over the Derby Day was moved by Sir Heron Maxwell, in a very dull speech, in which, of course, he appealed to the authority of Lord Palmerston and his regard for the Derby; and was seconded by Mr. Heneage, who relied simply on the love of holidays, and asked for a whole holiday, just as school-boys ask for the same indulgence. Sir Wilfrid Lawson resisted the motion, on the very sound principle that the majority who want to take a holiday should have some respect for the more hard-working minority who do not. "A great public entertainment, under the auspices of the Blue Ribbon Army, would win his hearty approval; but if any one were to propose the adjournment of the House in connection with that entertainment, he should say, 'No,—let us respect the feelings of the drunkards.'" Last year, the House did not adjourn over the Derby Day, and no one was any the worse for it; and legislative lassitude could certainly not be pleaded this year, since they had only just returned to their labours from their holiday. Finally, there was an ecclesiastical measure down for Wednesday, which he was sure Mr. Beresford-Hope would much rather discuss than go to the Grand Stand at Epsom.

Mr. Labouchere, however, took up the cause of cakes and ale, and regarded it apparently as a moral duty to adjourn over the Derby Day, in order not to appear unsympathetic towards the popular pleasure taken in our great democratic picnic. That is very weak ground, and would, as we have elsewhere remarked, apply much better to an adjournment over the August Bank holiday, which is a universal national picnic, than to one over the merely Cockney festival of the Derby. But, in point of fact, Mr. Labouchere only wanted an opportunity to attack the severe puritanic Radicals of whom we do not think Sir Wilfrid Lawson a very happy specimen for Mr. Labouchere's purpose. However, laziness always wins the day. Sir Heron Maxwell's motion was carried by a majority of 100 (185 against 85).

Mr. Cowen, Lord Randolph Churchill, Mr. Gorst, Sir H. Wolff, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. O'Brien, and lastly Sir Stafford Northcote, baited Lord E. Fitzmaurice and Mr. Gladstone on Thursday night with all sorts of questions as to Mr. Errington's connection with the late Papal letter to the Irish Bishops, while most of them gave notice that they would repeat their questions on future occasions. They only elicited that Mr. Errington, having been regarded by the Government as a man conversant with Irish affairs, and a thoroughly honourable man, had been represented in this light to the Papal See some time ago, but that he had received no official commission of any kind, either then or now, and had received no new recommendation this year; that the Pope had done what he had done, without any urging from the British Government; and that Mr. Errington had done what he had done, without any official suggestion, and, therefore, had received no official thanks. All this, of course, is just as Lord E. Fitzmaurice and Mr. Gladstone state it to have been, though if it had been otherwise,—if Mr. Errington had had an official mission,—we, for our parts, should have seen nothing but common-sense in the appointment of such a mission. However, as it is not so, it is hardly decent to affect to disbelieve everything the Ministers say in the matter. There is nothing creditable in supposing that great officials are always acting as Jesuit negotiators are supposed to act,—with the wisdom of the serpent, but without the innocence of the dove, or, indeed, innocence of any sort or kind.

Archbishop Croke has come back to Ireland, and has tried to make the best of his position as a prelate whose political action has been virtually censured by the Holy See. He has stated that he was listened to both by the Cardinal Prefect of the Propaganda and by the Pope himself with the greatest interest and patience, and that on taking his leave the Pope gave him his blessing and good wishes,—which, of course, is true enough. He added that the Pope is a true friend of Ireland,—he might have said a much truer friend than Archbishop Croke,—and ended his speech at Thurles thus:—"It is needless for me to say that any mandate issuing from the Holy See shall ever be received with filial reverence and obedience by the Bishops and Priests of Ireland, and by none of them more than by myself. I shall say no more." That is equivalent to a submission to the Pope's letter, though a somewhat sulky submission. Archbishop Croke does not admit that he did wrong before, but he does virtually admit that he is not going to do again what he thought it right before to do.

The French Government, if we may trust the Times, has extricated itself in great part from the financial abyss into which M. de Freycinet's desire for grand public works had plunged it. He had committed the State to spend some three hundred millions on a network of additional railways. The incessant demand for these works burdened the Treasury beyond endurance, and on the suggestion of M. Léon Say, a compromise has been made with the great Railways. Each will complete the system which belongs to it, paying over to the State four-fifths of any profit beyond three per cent. The effect of this is to disburden the State, and to postpone, probably for a long time, the State purchase of the Railways, of which the Railway interest has long been afraid. The State, we fear, will suffer; but the Railway Companies have not been exacting, and the people will get their local Railways, which they greatly want. M. de Freycinet, though he over-rated the resources of the French Treasury, was right there. Nothing is easier in France than to send produce on a railway line, and nothing so difficult as to get it across the large spaces where no line exists. We have the same trouble here, but distances are greater in France.

The French have commenced operations against Madagascar. According to a telegram from the French Consul at Zanzibar, confirmed by another from the English Consul, Admiral Pierre on the 16th inst. bombarded the port of Mayunga. The Hova loss was considerable, the French none, and the place was occupied by marines. The Admiral reports that he shall levy all customs on French account, that he has caused all Hova forts in the Sakalava territory to "disappear," and that he has assumed the protectorate of that tribe. This is annexation, and the Hovas will, no doubt, act on their preconcerted plan of surrounding the French posts and keeping up incessant attacks, until the French either retire, or send troops sufficient for an advance into the interior. Should this policy be adopted, there will be a smouldering war most injurious to Madagascar, and of no benefit to France. M. Jules Ferry, with Tunis and Tonquin on his hands, has not 5,000 colonial troops at his disposal, and it would be folly to advance on Antananarivo without 10,000. The Government must, therefore, either call on the Line, which will at once awaken the Chamber, or go on with a murderous kind of pottering, which can create nothing but mischief, and may cause anarchy in the interior.

It is announced officially that Lord Lorne will be succeeded in the Governor-Generalship of the Canadian Dominion by the Marquis of Lansdowne. There is no objection, that we know of, to that appointment. The Marquis, though in English political parlance he is called a "young" man, is thirty-eight years old, has been trained to politics, and has strong hereditary claims upon the Liberals. He is reputed able, and though an occasional deserter from his party, Irish Peers are not expected to be faithful when Land Acts are proposed. He will do as well as another, while his rank will make him acceptable in Canada. It is curious to see, while Democracy advances, how the nobles keep the great appointments. It was so also in Rome, where, though the Cæsar represented the Democracy, the great civil appointments were most frequently filled by members of the Senatorial Houses. Men have never been philosophic about pedigree, and the great families were liked.

Mr. Forster, on Wednesday, made a powerful speech to the Aborigines Protection Society, on the wrongs of the Bechuana Chiefs. He said that the Missionaries had tamed and civilised them, that they were on our side during the war, and that they were now harried and despoiled. The spoilers were English and Dutch freebooters from the Cape, Natal, and the Transvaal, egged on, as appeared from the Blue-books, by the Transvaal Government. They appealed to us for protection, and we were bound to give protection, not, indeed, by any treaty with them, but by pledges to protect the Natives given in the face of the whole world. Mr. Gladstone himself at Leeds, in 1881, stated that the Government "would recollect and faithfully maintain the interests of the numerous and extended native populations." All that is clear enough, but does Mr. Forster mean to say that the Government left itself no choice of the method through which it would carry out its policy? Was it really bound to declare war whenever the Boers impinged on native rights? Would it not be at least as true to say that the Government gave no pledges, but declared a policy, that this policy is subject to the will of Parliament, and that it is useless to ask Parliament to declare war for Bechuanaland? That the chiefs can be defended by less than war, by the direct conquest of the Transvaal, and its subsequent military occupation, we cannot, in the face of the facts, believe.

Herr Laaker, for many years leader of the German Liberals, intends, it is said, to quit political life. He is wearied out and disheartened, as well he may be. There may be much in store for a German Parliament, but for the present, the popular element is distinctly weaker than it was when it was first created. The Liberals have lost the Catholics, and a large section of the workmen, who have drifted over to Socialism, and have not increased their hold over the peasantry. They have been unable to contend against Protectionist proposals, have not been able to affect Prince Bismarck's general policy, and have, in fact, retained only a veto upon his taxing Bills. Above all, they have failed to make their leaders of importance. No orator is in the position of a statesman with whom the Government must carefully reckon. This is not altogether their own fault, but still it is so in part. No party can ensure a supply of first-class men, but it can by rigid discipline make second-class men formidable. The Catholics have known this. We do not see in Herr Windthorst any signs either of genius or of very lofty capacity; but his party follow him with such zeal, that he constantly holds the balance of power, and secures, if not victory, at least a position from which to negotiate.

The reported illness of the Comte de Chambord has given rise to a quantity of speculation in French circles, amidst which a very old story has cropped up again. Modern Frenchmen and Englishmen have always held that in reckoning succession to the old French throne, the House of Orleans ranked as the first cadet branch of the Bourbon stock. Therefore, as the direct Bourbon line ends with the Comte de Chambord, who is great-great-grandson of Louis XV., the Comte de Paris, as head of the Orleans family, is legitimate King of France. That belief is correct, but correct only because the Spanish Bourbons were, by the Treaty securing them the throne, struck out of the succession in France. Louis XIV.'s second grandson, when in 1700 he set out for Madrid to reign, renounced even his Dukedom of Anjou, and every other right as Prince of the Blood, for himself and his descendants. The object, of course, was to prevent the crowns of France and Spain falling to the same individual. That arrangement has lasted 183 years, and has never been challenged; but is it binding, now that the "legitimate Spanish Bourbon has lost the throne of Spain"? If it is not, Don Carlos is heir to all Bourbon claims in France, the throne included, and the Orleans family are shut out. The argument seems almost farcical to Englishmen; but there are men round "Henri Cinq" who urge him to believe it, and to declare Don Jaime, son of Don Carlos, legitimate heir of France. The Comte de Chambord is not likely to yield, and so violate his word to the Comte de Paris; but if he did, he might, after his death, break the Legitimist party in two.

Professor Bonamy Price makes, in Thursday's Times, a very good suggestion as to the best mode of compensating tenants who do not wish to leave their holdings, for their improvements. He says, let them hold on at the same rent, but let the increase of rent which could have been obtained from any other tenants be estimated, and capitalised so as to become a deduction from the compensation to which—when they ultimately leave the holding—they would be entitled. In that way they will gain all the advantage of their own improvements while they stay without any increase of rent being charged for those improvements; and if they should go, they would then be compensated only so far as they had not already been adequately compensated by the extra yield due to their improvements. That seems to us really to meet the difficulty.

The Sunday Closing Movement gains strength rapidly. It is completely triumphant in Ireland, Wales, and Scotland; and on Thursday, Sir W. Harcourt received deputations from Northumberland, Durham, Yorkshire, Monmouthshire, Cornwall, and the Isle of Wight, all praying for the same thing. He promised to bring the views of the deputations before the Cabinet, and added:—"It is no use preaching to a man who is already converted. I was not always of this opinion, but I do not require to be converted now." The union of the teetotalers, the saving workmen, and the people who hold the odd view that it is more wrong to be drunk on Sunday than on Monday, is too strong for resistance. We do not know why it should be resisted; but if the movement becomes universal, all eating-shops and coffee-shops ought to be permitted to stay open throughout Sunday. The people will have nowhere to go, and the streets will be filled with crowds which will soon find walking ennuyant, and take to Morse-play.

There were some sad blunders in our article of last week on British millionaires. We missed, under a false impression, all whose wealth was exactly a million. Counting them as they were counted in the register of the previous decade, we find the total number of millionaires seventeen, an increase of seventy per cent., very nearly the increase we had deemed most probable. That five persons should have possessed precisely a million out of seventeen, ranging from that figure up to £2,500,000, is curious, and points either to some unexplained method of computation, or to a fancy in the millionaires for keeping their personality at the round figure. We under-rated also the number of Peers in the list. It should have been twenty.

Bank Rate, 4 per cent.

Consols were on Friday 102½ to 102½.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

MR. ERRINGTON AND THE PAPAL SEE.

THE attitude of English Protestantism on the subject of our relations with the Papal See always seems to us a little crazy. We cannot pretend to understand either that state of the public mind which appears to make it an unpopular thing for the Government to hold any formal communication with Rome, or the timidity of the Government in not boldly confronting this condition of feeling and challenging its rationality. Of course, if the popular feeling be really as deep-rooted as the timidity of the Liberal Press and the triumphant tone of the Conservative Press in relation to all communications, official or unofficial, between the Government and the Pope, appear to indicate, we should understand the attitude of the Government on the matter, and perhaps approve it, for the good to be gained by official relations with the Holy See is not enough to render it worth while to assume prematurely a saner state of public feeling than would in that case exist. Only, we confess that we do not believe in the least in the reality of the popular panic which is supposed to exist on this subject. Supposing that there were any religious authority amongst the Mahomedans as well recognised and as constantly exerted over the Mahomedans of the world, as that of the Pope over the Roman Catholic Church, we should advocate quite as strongly our sending an official Envoy to the seat of Mahomedan authority, for the purpose of informing that authority rightly on all matters connected with the good government of our Mahomedan subjects, and of using every right influence which could be used to promote their moral and domestic welfare. If the Government could gain anything by explaining fully its fears and hopes for those of its subjects who are Methodists, or Independents, or Baptists, or Positivists, we should encourage it at once to explain fully the drift of its fears and hopes to the highest authorities in the Methodist, or Independent, or Baptist, or Positivist Church. Of course, that is unnecessary, because there is nothing singular and unique, nothing foreign enough about the genius of these Dissenting bodies, to render it in the least likely that special explanations would be explanatory. But that is not so as regards the Church of Rome, and would not be so as regards the Mahomedans and the Hindoos, if there were religious authorities in those Churches of anything like the active and influential kind to be found in the Roman Catholic Church. It is a matter of the first importance that the Papal See should know truly what the Government believe the state of our Catholic population to be, as well as, of course, what those who are opposed to the Government believe it to be; and nothing seems to us gained, and very much lost, by the crazy dread of official communication which once pervaded English society, but which, so far as we can judge, has vanished away almost as completely,—unless it be from that last refuge of dead beliefs, the Press,—as the dread of witchcraft itself.

However, the Government have told Mr. Cowen and Mr. O'Donnell, and the whole gang of Obstructionist orators on this subject, quite frankly that while they spoke to the Holy See of Mr. Errington as a man well informed on Irish affairs, who might, in their opinion, convey much useful information to the Roman Catholic authorities on those affairs, they did not take any responsibility for what Mr. Errington said, and did not use him to get the recent Papal Circular issued, and consequently have not congratulated him on the result of his efforts. What, therefore, we have to consider is the value of Mr. Errington's personal exertions in this matter, and though the Government have not congratulated Mr. Errington on the result of his efforts, we do congratulate him very cordially on that result. It seems to us that the more widely we differ from the Roman Church or any other Church, the more we should value all that it does to promote the cause of what we believe to be genuine morality, and the more warmly we should encourage those of its efforts which seem to us to further the cause of true religion. If the Pope has been very cautious in his declaration on the moral consequences of the Land League organisation in Ireland, the Pope has in this matter only followed the British Government at a respectful distance. The primary object of the Land League was not only legal, but good. It was very long before the British Cabinet could make up its mind that the authority of the Land League organisation in Ireland was so exerted as to promote distinctly immoral and illegal, as well as unchristian conspiracies, which no decent Government could allow. It is natural enough that what the British Government was long in finding out, the Pope, at a great distance from the scene, and receiving all sorts of contradictory accounts of what was going on, should have been still longer in finding out. However, he has found out the truth pretty fully at last, thanks, no doubt, in great measure to Mr. Errington, as well as to Archbishop Croke, and the extreme weakness of the case which that Parnellite Archbishop had to present on the other side. The Pope has heard all sides fully, and has satisfied himself that, on the whole, the British Government were right when they put down the Land League, and right on those clear moral grounds which would have compelled the Papal Government itself to condemn the action of the Land League. In a very important paper published in Rome, confessedly on the highest authority,—the authority is, the Journal de Rome says, that of a venerable ecclesiastic “well known and honoured in Ireland, and who, in spite of all solicitation, has always had the courage to affirm the imprescriptible right of Christian morality, at the risk of being boycotted,”—the moral mischiefs resulting from the action of the Land League are carefully enumerated from the point of view of the moralist, and are shown, on the evidence of the Confessional itself, to be most terrible. The people no longer feel as they used to feel, it is said, the obligation of paying their debts. The No-rent cry has weakened the sense of pecuniary obligation most seriously, and that not only in relation to rent, but in relation to all other debts. The sin of perjury has grown rapidly in Ireland. The sin of lying has grown still more rapidly, and is now almost treated as no sin at all, even though the lies affect the most important interests. The people commit perjury so often that they are prevented from attending the Sacraments of the Church, from their reluctance to confess it. Even in Confession itself, the priests find that their penitents now often tell lies, so greatly has their sense of the sacredness of truth been undermined. “Boycotting” has been the cause of cruelty in many persons, and of ruin to great numbers, and “boycotting” is the confessed fruit of the Land-League agitation. Assassinations, and outrages of all kinds both on men and on the lower animals, have resulted in large numbers from that agitation; and honest priests who condemn these things, as they are bound to condemn them, lose influence with their people, and are no more treated as their moral and spiritual guides as they were before. How is it possible, pertinently asks this Irish ecclesiastic, “with such excesses before their eyes, for the bishops or priests to praise the first author, the chief, of this movement, as if he were the benefactor of his country, deserving a national testimonial?” Of course it is impossible; and it is because the Pope has seen how impossible it is that he has issued his very plain condemnation of the Parnellite testimonial, and instructed all good Catholics not to give their support to that testimonial. If Mr. Errington has been one great means of ensuring this result, Mr. Errington deserves the thanks of every good Irishman and Englishman, whether Lord Granville should ever recognise his merits officially or not.

Nothing can show more clearly that the Pope, in taking the strong line he has taken, is simply acting on the uniform tradition of his See, than the pamphlet which has just been published, containing the various charges and circulars of Cardinal Cullen to the Irish people in relation to similar movements in earlier times. Cardinal Cullen is supposed to have represented the policy of Pío Nono rather than the policy of Leo XIII., and so, no doubt, he did. But the policy of Pío Nono and the policy of Leo XIII. on subjects of this kind could not but be identical. It is impossible for any Church which holds by Christian principles at all to encourage movements which result in assassination, cruelty, perjury, lying, insincere confession, desertion of the Church's Sacraments, and so forth. Cardinal Cullen was as severe on the illegal and immoral practices of the secret societies of his time, as ever Cardinal McCabe has been on the illegal and immoral practices of the secret or semi-secret societies of the present day. “All I insist on,” said Cardinal Cullen, in May, 1870, “is that unlawful and sinful means of obtaining redress, all conspiracies, all violence, all resistance to authority, all deeds of darkness, so well calculated to bring the wrath of Heaven upon us, should be avoided, and that the maxim of Ireland's greatest friend, namely, that any one who commits a crime is a traitor to his country, should not be forgotten. . . . The statesmen now [1870] in power, encouraged by the good dispositions and growing liberality of the English people, have determined to obliterate the memory of past wrongs, to bind up the wounds of the country, and to put us on a footing of equality with all other classes of her Majesty's subjects. By a great measure carried last year, they commenced the good work of conciliation, and they are determined to go on in the same direction, settling the relations between landlord and tenant, and providing protection for the existence and welfare of the great masses of our poor people. This is a great undertaking, but it is surrounded by innumerable difficulties in itself, and is opposed by the interests and passions of many." Can it be doubted that Cardinal Cullen, if he were now living, and had watched the Land Act of 1881 in its passage through Parliament, would have done all that Cardinal McCabe has done to put down the violent and unprincipled men who have endeavoured to defeat that beneficent legislation for the merest germs of which Cardinal Cullen was so grateful? We do not believe that Rome, while it remained Christian at all, could have acted otherwise than it has acted. None the less, every good Protestant, no less than every good Catholic, owes his thanks to Mr. Errington for having urged Leo XIII. to act as he has done. And whether that appreciation is to be expressed formally by Lord Granville or not, all men of sound morality and common-sense will approve; and think that Mr. Errington has done well if he has urged the Pope to act as he has acted, and that the Pope has done well in following Mr. Errington's advice. We suppose that there may still be a few Mr. Newdegates to whom it seems positively impious to say that Rome ever does anything well. But we confess to the belief that there are very few, and that on this occasion English public opinion will cheer on the Pope, and not fall into hysterics at the Pope's name.

THE COURSE OF BUSINESS.

IT is understood that before next week ends, the Government will make an important statement as to the conduct of business, and we do hope it will be a firm one. We do not intend by this that Mr. Gladstone should threaten the House with a protracted Session, or should claim its whole time—though private Members must sacrifice something—or should reopen the endless question of Procedure; but that he should convince the House that the Government holds certain Bills to be indispensable, and intends, whatever the obstacles, either to pass them, or to declare the House in bondage to Obstruction, and dissolve. What Bills should be thus pressed, it is for the Cabinet to settle; but we trust the Agricultural Holdings Bill will not be the only one of political importance. That is a useful measure, which we are glad to see so much better received than we expected; but it will not be seriously resisted by the Tories, and the Radical amendments should not occupy more than three or, at the most, four nights. The principal one will, no doubt, be the total abolition of the law of distress. The Bankruptcy Bill will, of course, be passed, and, we hope, the Patent Bill and the Scotch Universities Bill; but something more is necessary, if the country is not to consider the Session wasted and the Cabinet guilty of unfulfilled promises, and we do not see why the London Bill, so strongly promised at the beginning of the Session, should be abandoned. If, as the rumour runs, there is a difficulty about the Police, let it be postponed till the new Municipality is in working order, when, if the country approves its action, the new body can be loaded with any amount of power. But let us have the Municipality, and not be driven to discuss a London Bill next Session, when everything must be postponed to county government and the new Reform Bill.

We are most anxious about this statement, and desire to warn the Government of a feeling which we can see slowly spreading, and which may prove most injurious. They have lost no popularity for anything they have as yet done—with the exception, in certain quarters, of the Affirmation Bill—and they are not as yet held responsible for any broken promises. The country quite perceives that they have been baffled by a plot to waste time, concocted by the Free-lances, and favoured by Sir Stafford Northcote; and is angry, not with the Government, but with its opponents. But an impression is growing that the Ministry, for some undiscovered reason, is a little half-hearted; that everything is left to Mr. Gladstone; and that the Cabinet does not, as a collective body, show a sufficiently determined front. Nobody sees "the Government" in the House, though they see Mr. Gladstone. The whole body does not declare itself earnestly enough against obstruction, does not press forward enough, does not denounce the wasters of time with sufficient energy. Lord Hartington, in particular, does not make himself felt sufficiently. There is an appearance of lassitude, which may be totally unreal, but which is commented on in acrid terms by those more especially who resent the constantly repeated doubt whether the Premier will see this Parliament out, or not. They say the hesitation about this, however factitious or due to unauthorised and foolish rumour, checks progress as much as Mr. Gladstone's sickness would do, and is as serious a cause of delay as Obstruction itself. That is most unfair, but politicians are often unfair, and the only way to put an end to such talk is to press forward energetically, and compel the House to consider proposals of adequate importance. If they are defeated, well and good; Parliament is Sovereign; and if they are obstructed, the country can be made to see clearly where the offence lies. No blame will be attributed to the Government for over-much energy. It is only in avoiding labour for fear of obstruction that danger lies, and it is from this imputation that the Cabinet should clear itself at once and unmistakeably. If it wants time, let it claim that of Private Members which they only waste on matter fitter for a debating club; and if it distrusts the co-operation of the majority, let it call the party together, and lay the situation before them with frank plainness. After that, the Member who shirks or rats will be marked by the Constituencies, as Mr. Jerningham—the most guilty of all the deserters on the Affirmation Bill, though he is a Catholic—has been marked by the Liberals of Berwick. There is plenty of time still to do much work, and the plotters should be taught that they are powerless whenever the Government is ready and the majority determined. If not, the Cabinet will be accused of weakly yielding to the obstruction which it promised to defy.

THE HEALTH OF THE COMTE DE CHAMBORD.

THE French journals have been full recently of speculations as to the health of the Comte de Chambord. According to some of them, he is dying slowly of the same internal disease as Gambetta,—is unable to walk, and is declared by his doctors past all hope of a radical cure. According to others, he is quite well, about to go out on a hunting tour, and only amused with the anxiety of his enemies that he should pass out of the way. A third group of the well-informed, however, affirm that he is not dying, or near it, but that he has hurt his knee, or his foot, and that the quiescence to which he is unaccustomed seriously injures his health, which, he having the Bourbon appetite, requires constant exercise. This last account corresponds with the few certain facts, and with the testimony of those who saw him arrive at Frohsdorf, and is probably more or less true; while the tendency to exaggerate what at first sight is so unimportant is easily explained. The leading Republicans, and the leading Monarchists of France, like the leading foreign statesmen, are all alike of opinion that the death of Henri Cinq would greatly affect French politics, by bringing fairly to the front a Monarchical candidate who is at least possible, as "Henri Cinq" and Prince Napoleon are not. The rumour that the Comte de Chambord would acknowledge Don Jaime, son of Don Carlos,—the head, if the Salic Law is observed, of the Spanish Bourbons, and, indeed, the eldest of the whole Bourbon Family, if they are considered as an undivided stock,—as his heir, is evidently disregarded in France, and we should think with justice. It is most improbable that the Count would break the compact with the Orleansists, and impossible that the Legitimists, by acknowledging a foreigner whose claims to the French succession are barred by Treaty as the representative of the House of France, should perpetuate division, and make success all but impossible. Deep as their prejudice against the Orleans branch has been, they would adhere to French tradition, and the Comte de Paris, uniting both lines, would become, in certain contingencies, a formidable candidate. The Bonapartes are out of the question while Prince Napoleon lives, and his son's character is as unknown to the people as his person. The Comte de Paris, though not popular, leader of no party, and indeed little known, is understood by politicians to be a man of good, though not first-rate abilities, thoughtful and calm, and free of those fixed ideas which have wrecked all modern Bourbons, except Louis XVIII. It is believed that it would be easy for a considerable General, say, the Duc d'Aumale, to reign under him, or a considerable statesman of the temperate type, and that he would consent to rule upon modern principles and through a Liberal constitution. If, therefore, the Army or the peasantry grew dissatisfied either with internal politics or the position of France, they would have a possible candidate ready to their hands, whose elevation would not preclude the selection as the real ruler of any able man who could accept a dynasty at all. That such a contingency is at present visible, no one affirms; but the lives of nations, it is said, are long, misfortunes always arrive in due season, and the existence of a candidate who would unite Legitimists and Orleanists, the larger portion of "Society," the majority of the clergy, a section of the peasantry—the Bretons, for example—and large numbers of the higher officers, is a new danger for the Republic to encounter.

These ideas, which are freely uttered in French society, are sufficient to explain the otherwise unintelligible interest with which the Courts and the politicians of all parties watch the health of the Comte de Chambord, but we suspect that anxiety predisposes them all to involuntary exaggeration. The defect of French Republicans, as of their predecessors, is want of fortitude in politics. The Monarchists saw dangers in every Liberal movement and every Liberal who gained the popular ear, and the Republicans, with less reason, dread every Monarchical intrigue, and grow frantic with every rumour, or it may be accurate report, of a new combination among the Princes. They seem to fancy that a throne may suddenly be evolved in their midst by the operation of unknown forces. None of them produce the smallest trustworthy evidence that the three permanent forces of France, the peasantry, the Army, and Paris, have grown unfavourable to the Republic. Paris notoriously has not, or if it has, it is only because the Republic is not advanced enough to suit workmen who are out of temper not with this or that form of Government, but with the system of modern society. The Irreconcilables are not wanting Bourbons back again. The peasantry, so far as appears, are contented with the Republic. In France, as in England, it is most difficult to fathom the latent ideas and test the secret feelings of such masses, but those who go to the poll elect Republicans. For the past six years the Right in the Chamber has been slowly dying down, and is now in a minority even in the Senate. The only serious doubt is as to the feelings of the abstainers, who, it is true, are numerous, but who are just as likely to abstain either from content or indifference as from hostility. The reluctance of the ignorant to vote whenever the emergency is not sharp enough to press upon dulled intellects, is of itself sufficient to account for great numbers of abstentions. The discontent must be strong to make great numbers wish for a revolution, and if they wished one, what should make them select "the King," who, in the minds of half the peasantry of France, is associated with traditions they abhor, with the reign of nobles, with the corvées, and with the priestly ascendancy which, and not the existence of priests, the average rural Frenchman dislikes. The French politicians of a certain class forget that the Comte de Paris under the new circumstances would be proclaimed not as the heir of Louis Philippe, or as representative of a Constitution, but as "the King" by hereditary right, that is, as the heir of the old and detested régime. Personally, he is unknown, and his family has, outside the educated, no party. Mr. Hamerton indeed affirmed, in 1870, from his long acquaintance with French peasants, that, though they knew "the Bourbons," and the Bonapartes, and the Republic, they knew absolutely nothing of the separate claim of the House of Orleans. The Comte de Paris would be to them the Bourbon back again, and that they should with any willingness accept that, is to us incredible. They value their suffrage, they revel in their right to elevate a new couche sociale, and they desire the steady peace which, as every Republican would tell them with only too much vigour, they could not expect from Monarchy.

It is from the Army only that the danger could come, and but for the excitement among Republicans, and their readiness to proscribe any Prince whom any section of the Army appears to approve, we should regard this apprehension also as chimerical. What has the Army to obtain from the Bourbons? Position? The King will never make masters of the Marshals as Napoleon III. did, or place military men at the head of society, a course opposed to all Royal traditions, and to all that is known of the character of the Comte de Paris. War? That might be a result of a Restoration, as Prince Bismarck believes it would be, for a successful war would gratify France; but, then, is the French Army, taken as a whole, and not limiting the word to a section of the higher officers, thirsting for a war which, with the Triple Alliance still in existence, must be both great and dangerous? Every one assumes that armies want war, and that the French Army in particular is fretting at finding the prestige of France so lowered in Europe and in the East; but what is there in conscription to make young soldiers differ so radically from the class from which they sprang? That the French Army, if conscious of some new strength, such as the possession of a first-class General, or a new weapon, or a fresh organisation, should desire a war, we can conceive; but a throne will not, to French imaginations, give new military force, the Comte de Paris is not a soldier, and the Duc d'Aumale, though there is no reason to undervalue his capacity, has never done anything to attract the full confidence of an army well aware that the work before it must be of the most arduous kind. A few diplomatists, we imagine, seriously hold that a French Monarchy could secure alliances more easily than a French Republic, and that may even be true; but such a belief as that cannot be spread in a great Army. It is not the tradition of the French Army to "pronounce," except under two circumstances, when called upon by a victorious General who can himself bear rule, or when ordered, as in 1852, by the legal chief of the State; and neither of these conditions exists at present. We do not believe the Army will move, unless discontented on its own account—that is, discontented at its treatment by the Chamber—and no instance of bad treatment can be suggested. There is a tone, no doubt, among the Radicals which an Army conterminous with the nation may not like—the tone displayed in the foolish vote of last week forbidding the Government to appoint any soldier Commissioner in Tonquin—but the tone is not more "pékin" than it has been at any time these ten years. Every vote required for the Army has been granted eagerly. The position of non-commissioned officers has been distinctly improved. The conscription, though wider in area, has been made less severe; and the most advanced Republicans are always urging that the time of service should be shortened. The expedition to Tunis, with its terrible losses from sickness, had, it is true, an evil effect; but then, it was not an effect tending to increase the enthusiasm for war. It is impossible to be certain, but, on the evidence, the only probable effect of the death of the Comte de Chambord would be to increase Republican jealousy of the Bourbons, and perhaps to excite a successful demand for their expulsion. Such a vote would be mischievous, because it would revive Party hatreds, already much too strong; but it would in no way increase the chances of the Bourbon restoration, which some men believe would be imminent were the Comte de Chambord once out of the path.

THE LIBERAL DEMONSTRATION IN LIVERPOOL.

THE Liverpool meeting of yesterday week was neither a mere display of oratory, nor a mere demonstration of Liberal feeling. It was unique in this way, that it elicited something of the statesmanship of the younger members of the Party, something of those formative convictions which are slowly growing in them to a new importance. Hengler's Circus, filled with between five thousand and six thousand eager Liberals, is hardly a place where you would expect to hear any political criticism of the higher kind; but both Mr. S. Smith's speech and Mr. John Morley's did contain a certain amount of such criticism, and nothing apparently was received with more enthusiasm than any indication that the speaker was grappling seriously with political problems as yet unsolved. Thus, when Mr. Smith said that the great increase in the density of our population had forced upon us a variety of complex legislative measures, chiefly for the remedy of social rather than political ills, measures which press very heavily on the resources of our Legislature, and which are an indication that our country is becoming "increasingly democratic," the great assembly cheered as enthusiastically as if they clearly recognised that the reconstitution of society on a more democratic basis is an object sufficiently great as well as sufficiently difficult to excuse a great deal of preliminary confusion without justifying any loss of heart. And again, when Mr. Smith observed that the representatives of great constituencies appear to be much more sensible of what they owe to the House of Commons than the representatives of minute constituencies,—three of whom, Lord Randolph Churchill, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, and Mr. O'Donnell, consume probably more than fifty times as much of the time of the House as any three representatives of the largest constituencies in the country,—the great audience again showed their keen appreciation of the fact that a sense of public responsibility is impressed on Members by the magnitude and importance of their constituencies, a fact which at once suggests in what direction the next Reform Bill ought to proceed. It is not merely for political purposes, it is much more for the purpose of weighting Members of Parliament adequately with the sense of the very great and growing difficulty of social organisation, that it is so necessary to sweep away those petty constituencies whose spokesmen are the freebooters of debate,—men apparently quite destitute of any sense of duty to the House of Commons, or of reverence for those who have gained the confidence of the House of Commons, or even of such an appreciation of the various constituents of public opinion as can alone make irresponsible oratory impressive. Mr. S. Smith was singularly fortunate in impressing on his audience that the greatest difficulties of the day are all the consequence of these new social pressures. The immense multiplication of private Bills,—which ought, of course, to be delegated to new local bodies,—is the first result of this rapid social growth. The demand for difficult and complex measures like the Irish Land Law, and also, though a measure not needing the same amount of revolutionary change, the English Tenants' Compensation Bill for unexhausted improvements, is the product of the same need for a reconstitution of social relations. And in referring to the various measures rendered necessary by the same causes, such as the Factory and Workshops Act, the various Acts controlling the labour in mines and on canals, Mr. S. Smith indicated clearly enough that the rapid growth of population itself, necessarily compels a democratic society to protect the weak against the strong, for the sake not only of the weak, but of the strong. It will be impossible, however, to get these issues properly discussed in a House of Commons in which irresponsible levity, representing no eager pressure of social want at all, can swoop down upon the public time which ought to be sacred to the discussion of the most urgent issues, and waste it in insolent vituperation or more insolent badinage. Mr. Smith showed that he understood the real exigency of the case when he said that something approaching to the rules adopted at public conferences, where the speeches are limited as to time, and a given time only can be allotted to a given discussion, would be absolutely necessary, before the House of Commons could be so reorganised as to get through even the most necessary part of its legislative duties. A democratic reconstitution of society is a big sort of thing, and it is that, and no less than that, as Mr. Smith explained, which is bringing upon us all this legislative pressure, and providing the opportunity for these anarchical conspiracies against the efficiency of our representative Assembly.

Mr. John Morley struck the same note when he said, in his vigorous and masculine speech, that Tory democracy was simply a chimæra, because the very root of democratic legislation must be a revision of the relation of the landowners to the other sections of the population, while no Tory party can be imagined which would be willing to guide that legislation in the democratic direction. And, again, he struck a note to which his great audience heartily responded, when he said that it did not become genuine Liberals,—or, indeed, genuine politicians of any kind,—to fret too much over questions of party tactics,—over the effect which this or that measure might have on the cohesion and loyalty of parties. There were matters, said Mr. Morley, which would be best left to determine themselves, and which should be more or less excluded from the view of true politicians. The true politician should feed himself on principles, and let tactical considerations well alone. We quite agree with Mr. Morley, and find in this remark the real justification of the course of the present Government on the Affirmation Bill. Unquestionably that Bill was a tactical blunder. Quite as unquestionably it was a political duty, which a Liberal Government could not have ignored without betraying its true Liberal principles. Well, then, the Government was right and wise to fling the tactical considerations to the winds, and to fortify the Liberal Party by presenting to the country in the plainest form the true solution of the disagreeable question forced upon it by Mr. Bradlaugh's return for Northampton. If the principle of religious equality requires that even the irreligious,—so far as they are irreligious in the sphere of opinion and belief alone,—should be placed on a perfect equality with the religious, let us carry out that principle conscientiously, even though Mr. Gladstone be right,—and we disagree from Mr. Morley in believing him to have been right,—in facing the fact that such conscientiousness will temporarily lose us many votes, and add many to the votes gained by our opponents. What is the use of preaching against the doctrine that you may do evil if you expect good to come of it, if the moment we are tried we are ready to acquiesce in doing evil for so paltry an end as to keep in Liberal hands the victory which we won three years ago? It may be that we shall lose by being true to our principles. But it is better for our principles, and better for their diffusion, to lose by being true to them, than it is to win by being false to them. And a victory won by adhering to principles in difficult circumstances is worth many victories won by base evasions of principle. Mr. Morley's exhortation to eschew the consideration of party tactics, and to feed our minds with the true principles of the party, was worth more than a whole assemblage of those astute party-cries by which the Tapers and the Tadpoles of political life endeavour to reanimate the failing courage of their party. Political parties, like individual organisations, do not live by that alone which seems most to assuage the appetite. They live by that which stimulates them to higher courage and bolder justice. If Liverpool has only learned from Mr. John Morley to despise tactics and to seek the inspiration of genuine principles, Liverpool will have learned that the secret of political progress lies in political faith.

THE MEDICAL DEPARTMENT IN EGYPT.

SIR WILLIAM MACCORMAC'S defence of his Service, appended to the Report of Lord Morley's Committee on the Medical Department, is ably written, but it misses the true point of the accusation. Whatever the ideas of the Committee, the country is not accusing the Army Surgeons in Egypt of neglect, or of want of sympathy with the soldier, or even of allowing a high rate of mortality; but of a certain helplessness, from which sick soldiers suffer always unnecessary torture, and often unnecessary risks. That this helplessness, however begotten, was displayed in Egypt, follows irresistibly from the evidence prematurely published in the Times. What, in fact, can be the answer to Lord Wolseley's statements, except the impossible one that he is, for some unknown motive, telling deliberate falsehoods? He declared before the Committee that he inspected the hospital at Ismailia, with every desire to make allowances; that he found the sick soldiers lying for the most part on the ground, that they were tormented by the flies, which they had no whisks to keep off; and that the bread served to them was, by the admission of the medical officer in charge, "unfit for human food." Botten dough was, in fact, given to men in diarrhoea and fever. All this while, bread was procurable in any quantity in Ismailia. No one would have objected to an order for good bread, and an application to Lord Wolseley himself would have at once elicited sanction covering any sort of pecuniary responsibility. In Cairo, matters were even worse. The population of Cairo is 300,000, and everything is procurable there, yet,—

"I found very great fault the first day I went to the hospital in Cairo, and I found there again every man lying on the ground. At the same time, I went to see Lady Strangford's hospital. . . . I am not quite certain as to how many days she may have been there. At all events, I found her hospital all ready to be opened, and I found in every room, for the number of patients in the room, a very neat, nice little bedstead allotted to each. I asked her where she got them, and she said, 'I bought them in the town, and I can get you any quantity you like.' I said, 'how much did you pay for them?' and she told me it was three francs apiece—or 2s. 6d. for each bedstead. It was made out of the stalk of a palm-leaf, and a charming bed it was. I cannot fancy a sick and wounded man wishing for a better bed. . . . I was very angry with a hospital doctor the first day I went over the hospital at Cairo. It was on a Saturday, and I found the hospital very dirty. I found the men, as I have already said, lying on the ground, and lying in those filthy dirty clothes that they had fought the campaign in. They had no change of clothes, and they seemed to have very little opportunity of washing themselves. There was a washing room, but it was very imperfectly provided with basins. The ophthalmic cases, too, were put in a tent outside the hospital in a garden, I think about as bad a place as it could possibly be for them, on account of the flies, which were so troublesome that I cannot give you any description of them, except that they were like the plagues of Egypt. They were in myriads and myriads, and they covered everything. You saw the poor sick men asleep, with their faces undistinguishable in some instances by reason of the quantities of flies on them. I have seen a man lying awake, trying to brush them off with his hands, and I said to the medical officer in charge, 'Why do you not go out in the town and buy whisks? Every little dirty Egyptian boy has got a whisk to keep the flies off; why cannot you go and buy them for a few pence?' He said, 'I have not got any myself, but I have applied to the Commissary of Ordnance to get them.' I said, 'Never mind the Commissary of Ordnance; go out and buy them yourself, and I will pay for them.' Several other faults I found with him, and I said the same thing, 'Why do you not go out into the city, and get everything you want?' I said I would come back in a week, and I came back in a week, and I found a small supply of those whisks, but very few with the men, and I naturally was very angry; but he sheltered himself behind the Commissary-General of Ordnance, that the Commissary of Ordnance had not supplied them. And the same thing with regard to the mosquito-curtains."

In the face of statements like that, what is the value of Sir W. MacCormac's argument that the ratio of mortality, especially from operations, was very low? It was low, but the use of surgeons is not only to ward off death. So was the French mortality in Tunis very low. What happened there during those hideous months of the first occupation was not that thousands of conscripts died, but that thousands were invalided, and that the distaste for military service throughout France was intensified to a degree which perceptibly affected the policy of the Government. In every village of the south there was some peasant's son broken for life as a labourer. It was just the same in Egypt. The mortality was not great, the arrangements for carrying off the wounded were admirable; but the soldiers, once sick, were left in so needlessly miserable a condition that an unnecessary proportion were ruined in health, and that wherever the convalescent men may go, a dislike for the service is spread abroad most injurious to recruiting. Soldiers, as the whole history of the campaign in the Crimea showed, do not dread the fighting, but the other incidents of warfare, and in particular the needless miseries of bad supplies and suffering when sick. They feel these more even than their officers do. Englishmen of the lower class, though curiously stupid about some sanitary laws, look upon their strength as their capital, are morbidly sensitive about any decline in it, regard decent food as its first source, and as all hospital nurses can testify, think decent treatment in sickness as of the last importance. They did not get it in Cairo, and as the country and the Army chiefs intended they should get it, it is reasonable to ask why. It certainly was not from any wish to save money, or any impediment of circumstances, or any of that general indifference to the men which prevailed in Tunis, and which will be found by careful observers in every conscript army. The country did not care what was spent on hospitals, money would in Egypt have procured any appliances required—Lady Strangford did procure them—and as to indifference, if there is a fault on the subject, either in the officers or the people, it is that they are too ready to fall into a passion of pity, so ready that a constant feature in the situation, the physical exhaustion of the surgeons, is too often forgotten. We have read complaints of delay in treating the wounded which must have seemed to the surgeons engaged almost infamous, they being simply worn out with thirty hours' of unremitting toil. People talk of a field hospital, and do not realise to themselves what the scene is, when perhaps five hundred men are brought up, each requiring either an operation or scientific bandaging taking nearly as much time, and there are not perhaps six men present competent to perform it all. Their assistants are no help, they must work themselves, and they do, to be told, after perhaps ten hours of the most cruel and responsible labour, that Corporal Blank lay those ten hours unattended. Somebody must wait.

We believe that there are two reasons for the constant failures in hospitals during a campaign, failures not infrequent even in India, where organisation should be perfect. One is, that the headship of the hospital, its internal care, is thrown far too much upon the medical officer in charge, who is worn out with the strictly professional part of his work. He must be absolute, of course, but he needs under him some one much greater than orderlies, a gentleman who can do in the hospital all that a head nurse and a secretary combined can do in a London hospital,—who can be responsible for expense, for cleanliness, for cooking, for everything for which a purser is responsible in a ship. He should be the Medical Commissary on the spot, and his signature, countersigned by the surgeon in charge, should be final warranty for any expense, or any order to a hospital orderly, or any arrangement whatever not forbidden by the General, who, of course, must remain supreme. Whether he should be a military officer, as the Committee suggest, we do not know, though his rank and his liability to court-martial may be convenient; but we do know that he should be a gentleman, and should not be a doctor. If he is not the former, he will not be obeyed; and if he is the latter, he will be drawn off as an assistant in the professional work, which often seems in such a scene, a scene of incessant and cruel emergencies, so much more pressing. The other cause is the "helplessness," as we have called it, of the Medical Service itself. This is not in full measure its own fault. The Surgeons are not liked at Headquarters, they are not regarded as fighting men, their interference is resented, and their claims to rank in the Army are detested, till they come to feel themselves perpetually on the defensive, and grow not only timid about breaking through regulations, but sulkily resolved not to do it. They are made harder by training than civil Surgeons, that is, more accustomed to find certain evils incurable, and to deal with patients in masses, instead of as individual friends; and this treatment hardens them still more, till they grow to care sincerely only about "treatment," the branch of their art in which they feel free and unwatched by non-professionals. The remedy for this is to give them more authority in their domain, and at the same time more responsibility. The medical officer who does not provide beds for his sick when they are procurable should be broke, as an officer would be for crassa negligentia; but his order for pay for them, checked as above, should be as absolute on a campaign as Lord Wolseley stated that his own would have been. He should be encouraged, not snubbed, for spending for his men, and at the same time held responsible if they suffer. At present, the fear of the Regulations is on all surgeons to such a special degree, that the conduct of which Lord Wolseley complained at Cairo would have been the conduct of two men in every three, and the third man would not have been a popular surgeon with the Military Chiefs. He would have been considered one who habitually took too much upon himself. The spirit of independent decision needs to be fostered in the Department, and it can only be produced by requiring and authorising greater independence of action.

We suppose we need not, at this time of day, defend ourselves from the charge of attaching too much importance to this matter. We are not in the least disposed to coddle the men, or to suppose that war can be made comfortable for private soldiers. But in every army sickness is as much to be dreaded as the enemy, and in a modern European army its moral effect is even worse than its effect in reducing numbers. The men know what is possible, they accept wounds not only as things inevitable, but as things carefully and liberally paid for; but there is no requital for sufferings from sickness, and they produce, not only among the men, but in their homes, a dangerous distaste for military service, which it costs us every day more and more to remove. Already we pay more than any people in the world, except the Americans. Already there are signs of a possible agitation against "punishments," which, if it developed, would be an agitation against discipline; and if an opinion once spreads that the sick soldier is a broken soldier, we shall find every difficulty increased threefold. To spare expenditure on the Medical Service, or to allow it to be enfeebled by routine, by want of authority, or by failure to punish neglect when authority has been granted, is one of the worst of follies. The doctor in warfare should have power, and be held responsible for using it with his commission.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY ON IRISH TAXATION.

WE cannot share the emotion with which the Times views Mr. Mitchell Henry's letters. "Downright despair" is not at all the sentiment which they awake in us. Rather, it is a passionate longing that every sentence in them were demonstrably true. If it were, how trifling and transient would the Irish problem become! There would no longer be any difficulty in explaining any obstacle in the way of its immediate removal. "Irish hate" would have been shown to be due to the simplest and oldest of causes,—a sense on the part of a weak nation that it is being plundered by a stronger. Of Mr. Mitchell Henry's three contentions,—the first is that Ireland is greatly over-taxed; the second, that this over-taxation is the cause of the detestation in which the existing political order is undoubtedly held by a large part of the Irish nation. Even if Mr. McLaren had not entirely disposed of the former statement, the latter, we fear, would be altogether baseless. There is not the slightest evidence to show that the Irish people feel themselves over-taxed. They are not unskilled in agitation, and they have of late taken very unmistakeable methods of showing their dislike of specific classes of persons. How is it, on Mr. Mitchell Henry's theory, that throughout the two terrible years between October, 1880, and October, 1882, no tax-collectors were murdered? Granting that the superficial cause of disturbance was different, would it not have been natural that at a time when the great deeps of popular passion and individual hate were so strangely stirred, some reflex hostility to the real Irish enemy should have shown itself? Surely, it would occasionally have occurred to the Irish peasant that though he ought to have killed the land-agent, or the tenant who took a farm from which his predecessor had been evicted, he ought not to have let the tax-gatherer go free. It is not even as if unjust taxation were a peculiarly subtle and recondite cause of discontent. On the contrary, it is one of the simplest and most familiar. In a hundred cases in which Governments have not been to blame and populations have been ordinarily peaceful, the tax-gatherer has been the object of some sudden outburst of hate. What Mr. Mitchell Henry asks us to believe is that in presence of the most genuine and flagrant injustice on the part of the Government, the Irish nation—of all nations in the world—has not been acute enough to see, or resentful enough to take vengeance on, the real cause of its poverty. If Mr. Mitchell Henry's statistics were accurate beyond the possibility of challenge, we should still feel that we were as far off as ever from the particular conclusion he seeks to found on them.

Still, this conviction of ours would not constitute a valid reason for dismissing the question as unimportant. Time spent in removing a real injustice is never wasted, whether the injustice has been recognised or not. It would have been well indeed for England if, where Ireland was concerned, she had spent more time in this way. Though we cannot believe that a reduction of Irish taxation would have the precise result which Mr. Mitchell Henry anticipates, it might have good effects of another kind; and anyhow, if that taxation is unduly high in proportion to the taxation of England and Scotland, the inequality ought to be redressed, whether anything comes of it or not. At this point, the accuracy of Mr. Mitchell Henry's figures becomes all-important, and in the light of Mr. McLaren's criticism they are seen to be wildly inaccurate. Mr. Mitchell Henry puts the taxation of Ireland at eight millions and a half, which, with a population of a little over five millions, gives about 34s. per head. It may be said, in passing, that even if this were true, it would be difficult, in the face of Scottish statistics, to contend that this is the sole and sufficient cause of Irish hate. Scotland, Mr. McLaren says, pays in taxes £7,318,014, with a population of 3,744,679, or about £2 per head. Yet the Scotch do not hate England. If they have any feeling in the matter, it is rather in favour of a stricter and more intimate union with her. Consequently, Mr. Mitchell Henry's argument breaks down under the simplest test that can be applied to it. If both countries were over-taxed, and both hated England, we should not know much about the relation in which the first fact stood to the second. But when both are over-taxed, and one hates England while the other does not, we know absolutely nothing about it. It is not true, however, that Ireland pays about 34s. per head in taxes. The real sum is only 23s. 6d. Mr. Mitchell Henry has overstated the total amount of Irish taxation by nearly two millions and a half. He has done so quite innocently, and Mr. McLaren tells us what it is that has misled him. Irish whiskey is taxed at the rate of 10s. a gallon, and this tax is collected, in the first instance, in the country in which the whiskey is distilled. But, in common with all such taxes, it is ultimately paid by the consumer. Consequently, so much of the tax as is levied on Irish whiskey consumed in England or Scotland really falls on Englishmen or Scotchmen. The whiskey distiller pays the duty, and is repaid it by his English or Scotch customer. Oddly enough, Mr. Mitchell Henry seems to think that this fact makes no difference. "The gist," he says, "of Mr. McLaren's statement is that the Irish taxes have not been doubled since 1853, but have only been increased by somewhat more than one-half,—a correction which, if true, does not touch the rationale of my argument." Mr. Mitchell Henry has evidently forgotten what the rationale of his argument was. In his first letter, it is thus stated:—Originally, "Ireland contributed four millions annually to this country. The amount may have been too small, but the inequality was more than redressed in the year 1853, when, by the imposition of the Income-tax and the equalisation of the Spirit Duties, the Irish taxes were raised to eight millions and a half." But whether the inequality was more than redressed, or only just redressed, is of the essence of the question; and when Mr. Mitchell Henry is proved to have over-stated the taxation of Ireland by considerably more than a fourth, it is more than probable that he has confounded the two processes.

It is fair to say, however, that there is another part of Mr. Mitchell Henry's case which Mr. McLaren has not disposed of,—possibly because he has not attacked it. "In the course of the last three years," he says, "we have paid off twenty millions and a half of Debt, and in 1885 terminable annuities amounting to a sum just short of six millions fall-in." Of the former sum, the Irish people, he reckons, have contributed upwards of two millions and a quarter; and towards the terminable annuities to fall-in in 1885, they have for years been paying annually more than half a million. "Yet during this time there have been misery, famine, and disorder almost unparalleled," and the country has really wanted every farthing that could be raised in it for the execution of productive improvements. Even if this part of Mr. Mitchell Henry's calculation stands in need of the same proportionate correction as the remainder, this will not alter the fact that Ireland equally with England is paying-off Debt. Mr. Mitchell Henry sees in this a wasteful and unjust expenditure of money. England is a wealthy country, and she cannot spend her wealth more profitably than by paying off Debt. But Ireland is a poor country, and instead of paying off Debt, she ought rather to be borrowing more money to provide herself with the means of making herself wealthy. What is sauce for the goose is not, in this instance, sauce for the gander. The gander is lank and skinny, and it will not do to serve him in the same fashion as the fat and well-liking goose. If two men own adjoining estates, one excellently farmed, with all the latest improvements, and yielding a large rental, and one badly farmed, with all the necessary improvements still to be made, and consequently yielding a very small rental, would any prudent solicitor give the same advice to both owners as to paying off mortgages? On the contrary, he may say to the one, "You are well-to-do, you have the means of clearing your estate of all encumbrances, and so saving what you now have to pay in interest, and you cannot lay out your income to better advantage." While to the other he would say, "Your real need is capital, and if you have saved anything out of your income, the wise thing to do with it is to spend it in making your land more profitable. If you pay off your mortgages, you will, it is true, reduce your outlay by the amount of the interest due on them; but if you spend it in making the land more productive, you may not only have the money to pay the interest, but a great deal more beside." This is Mr. Mitchell Henry's plea, and supposing the facts to be true—that Ireland is very poor, and that by a judicious expenditure of various kinds she may be made richer—we do not see how it is to be disputed. Why should Ireland be made to pay off Debt because England does, if the circumstances which make it economical in the one case do not exist in the other?

THE CORONATION OF THE CZAR.

RUSSIANS are much annoyed when told that they are Asiatics, and no doubt the statement, except so far as it is true of all mankind, is untrue of them; but it is impossible for them to deny the Asiatic tone which pervades the wonderful scene on which all Europe has this week been gazing. We do not mean that the accessories of the Coronation festival are Asiatic, that Asiatic costumes are visible in the streets of Moscow, that Asiatic princes are prominent in the Kremlin, that Asiatic customs are maintained in some of the rites. The Czar is a great Asiatic Sovereign—the greatest, except two, Queen Victoria, and the Empress Regent of China, whose name Europe does not know—and when he calls his subjects together for any grand function, much of all that is external must be Asiatic. But this scene in Moscow is Asiatic in more than accessories. If we were asked to state in a word the "note" or central fact which differentiates Asia from Europe, we should answer, "Immoderateness." Nothing in Asia is sufficiently restricted. Empires are too big, populations are too vast, all features of nature are too huge, the arts are too gigantesque, the powers entrusted to men are too awful, calamities are too wide-spread, all things have in them a trace of immoderateness, as if gods and men alike had lost the sense of wise limitation. Forests in Asia cover kingdoms. Mountains occupy the area of large States. Peoples are numbered, like the Chinese and the Indians, by their fractional relation to the whole human race. Mythologies are full of monstrous figures. A cyclone desolates a province. A tidal wave sweeps away half-a-million of men. A famine slaughters out eleven millions. A wall bounds an Empire. One Sovereign is brother of the Sun, another is God's Vicegerent, a third is incarnate deity. Everything, from the powers of kings and the conceptions of men to the forces of nature and the number of mosquitoes, is gigantic, enormous, fatiguing to the brain, in fact, when measured as all things must be measured by a standard of which man is the unconscious unit, immoderate. This characteristic of immoderateness is the dominant one in the Russian Coronation. The splendours of the scene weary imagination. It is not a country, but two continents which are summoned to be present. All nations are in the Kremlin, by their representatives. It is but a ceremonial, but the troops present might invade a first-class State. The procession is one such as Rollin imagined to be following Darius. The festivities are spread over days. The multitudes to be dined are counted in hundreds of thousands, are to eat whole herds and drink out of reservoirs in which men might drown. Roasted mammoths would not be out of place, and the Tun of Heidelberg would seem small. The expenses, 20,000,000 roubles, are those of a little war. The monarch to be crowned claims freedom from restriction like that of a deity, and actually exercises powers which recall Simmons's strained effort to express in verse the prerogatives of the Roman Cæsar, "earth's awful lord,"—

"Whose whispered word
Fills like pervading Nature land and flood;
And if but syllabled in wrathful mood,
Had the swift lightning's soundless power to pierce,
Rending and blasting through the Universe."

A word from the cynosure of that throng, the pale man on the white horse, who, as his people shout their devotion, and all the world bends in reverence, feels chiefly the necessity of fortitude to await what may meet him at the next turning, would precipitate Russia on the West, or submerge Asia under a million of conquering soldiery; and he rides on, expecting, though probably not fearing, instant execution. His risks are as immoderate as his powers, his responsibilities, his roll of peoples and of kingdoms. His Opposition speaks with dynamite, argues with the bullet, satirizes with the knife. He has not to fear loss of unpopularity, or untoward events, or even resistance, but immediate and painful death. If any point is unguarded, if his police have misread a warning, if a soldier is faithless, the Czar, riding there behind the representatives of two continents, amid the Royalties of half the world, before a wife seated on a chariot "like a mass of gold," fenced round with the devotion of millions, and armed with illimitable powers, may stumble dead into an open grave. The immoderateness in all around him, in the number of his guards, the costliness of his feasts, the preparations for his glorification, is also in the faction which defies him, and which responds to his claim of all rights by denying all, even the right to keep alive. All that—the exaggerated grandeur and the exaggerated liability, the awful power and the awful powerlessness—is strictly Asiatic, belonging to the continent where everything dwarfs man, and man, as in revenge, endeavours to overleap restrictions, only to recognise in despair that man is nothing, existence misery, and heaven eternal unconsciousness.

The men of the West, who are accustomed to restriction, and know that there is no buttress to the mind like an imperative law, that even day-dreaming is bewildering unless the dreamer adheres to his self-made conditions, wonder at the vastness of this ceremonial, and think all needful impressiveness would be obtained by one much smaller. Surely, one day, they think, might suffice, and one religious ceremony, a tenth of the expense, and a third of the troops and other adjuncts to the scene, which cannot gratify the Czar, and must in its long protraction greatly increase his danger. The characteristic of immoderateness, they believe, might be cut out, without risk of diminishing the impact to be made on the popular imagination. That is, we suppose, true; and for ourselves, we can imagine for a Russian Czar no coronation more impressive than the ancient Tartar one, the raising of the Sovereign on a shield in the sight of the whole nation, assembled on some vast plain, each morsel of the shield being borne up by the representative of a tribe. Tchengis was enthroned so, and the tradition of the scene has lingered for centuries in men's minds. But ceremonials usually grow of themselves, and it is not difficult to detect the causes which have made this one so separately grandiose. The first idea has been to make it religious, to show the Czar to the people of his faith as the consecrated ruler delegated by the Almighty and by the Orthodox Church to govern them. In nations which do not reject symbolism, great religious functions are always slowly performed, and always tend to accrete to themselves a more and more elaborate magnificence. No precedent must be departed from, and precedents accumulate like paraphernalia,—like Bishops' robes, for example, or the Russian regalia, which were forwarded to Moscow in a special train. A Pope who was elected in a moment would hardly seem a Pope, and the very notion of hurry is inconsistent with the movements of a Church. The Czar is Patriarch, as well as Sovereign; and in his consecration a religious function is performed which, in the eyes of the Russian people, is first of all, and must, as other ceremonials are slow, and costly, and magnificent, be slowest, costliest, most magnificent of any. Otherwise, Czar and Church would alike lack the sense of the becoming. This is indeed the ultima ratio of the Coronation, without which Alexander III. would hardly have encountered its special dangers or sanctioned its enormous expense. Till he is crowned he is not sacred, and as his sacredness is the source of his prerogative, the crowning must be so done as to be past all question, must be known by direct evidence to every person in the Empire. Coronations were arranged before newspapers began, and much of the immoderateness of the ceremonial arises simply from the multitude of witnesses from all the nations beneath the Czar's sceptre whom it was necessary to summon, that on their return they might testify that all had been regularly and solemnly performed. The Kings of the Desert do not come to Moscow to please themselves, but because they are summoned to see, and do homage, and bear witness on their return. And then the Czar is something more than Patriarch or Sovereign, he is also Cæsar, the "elect" and representative of all who obey him. The origin of the dynasty was elective, and the Romanoffs, hated by the aristocratic chiefs, and without a citizen class to support them, have always made it their policy to proclaim themselves representatives of the dim, common populations. They have probably felt that position also. All Kings feel it more or less; and to the Czar of Russia, so far removed above his subjects, the "mass" must always seem the most interesting as well as the most formidable object within his dominions. The second main end of the Coronation is to impress them, and in the effort to reach the true people, to become visible across two continents and to a hundred millions, a ceremony naturally becomes grandiose. It is a people which is to see, not a set of spectators, a people which is to be fed, a people which is to recognise that something has occurred so great that each one even of them bears in it some part. When the tenantry count thousands, the kitchen must be big, the roast oxen many, and the beer-vats deep; and the Czar only increases adequately the preparations of the squire. Add to all the forms necessary to the recognition of a Patriarch, and all the forms essential in the election of a Cæsar, all the forms usual in the crowning of a European monarch, who this time is anxious to outdo precedent rather than depart from it, and we have the materials for a ceremonial which would be magnificent anywhere, and which in Moscow, the capital of Northern Asia, as well as of Northern Europe, the city where East and West have embraced each other, becomes a stupendous function, such as could not elsewhere be performed. In no other city could a coronation be a festa at once religious and democratic, Asiatic and European, modelled upon most ancient precedents, and decorated by all the aid of modern inventiveness and knowledge. Only there could Europeans gaze astonished at a building at once fortress, palace, and basilica—the largest of fortresses, the hugest of palaces, the most stupendous of basilicas—and watch Tartar Princes gazing up thunderstruck under the electric light. And only there, we hope, could the man who is the centre of all be in more imminent risk of a violent death than a criminal tried, convicted, and expecting sentence.

MR. LABOUCHERE ON THE DEMOCRATIC LOVE FOR CAKES AND ALE.

MR. LABOUCHERE was, as he usually is, amusing on Tuesday, when pleading for the recognition of what he called the "great democratic picnic," and upbraiding the stern Radicals with their contempt for cakes and ale. But he was not careful to show why a hearty feeling of sympathy for the people's open-air festival, should tell in favour of the adjournment of the House of Commons over the day of that festival. Would not the million have enjoyed their holiday quite as much without the participation of the working Members of the House of Commons? Might not the thought that these public servants were working away for them in the House of Commons have even enhanced the pleasure of the million in their open-air picnic? Would the absence of any group of serious politicians from the Epsom Downs have diminished the satisfaction of the crowd in the bright sun and gaieties of the occasion? We doubt whether Mr. Labouchere himself would have been much missed from the great scene, and we are quite sure that the resolve of the House to sit on the Derby Day, had such a resolve been taken, would have had no sort of influence in keeping him away, had he otherwise intended to go. Hence, we find it difficult, not, indeed, to understand the drift of his speech, but to understand what bearing that drift had on the motion for adjournment which he supported. He did not say that it was the duty of a good representative of the people to go and study the demeanour of the people on Epsom Downs, yet that would have been the only connecting link, so far as we can see, between his general position that the people ought to have their gaieties and that those gaieties ought to be held in honour, with the particular motion for the adjournment of the House over the Derby Day for which he spoke. This would, however, have been a very poor argument, even if he had brought it forward, for the serious-minded Members would certainly never have used their holiday to go to Epsom, while the Members whose delight in such amusements is more nearly that of Mr. Labouchere himself would have very little to learn, and would, besides, be pretty sure to learn that little, whether the House adjourned, or whether it did not. Except as an act of abstract homage to cakes and ale, the adjournment of the House of Commons over the Derby Day cannot be said to embody any particular feeling of respect for the great picnic of the people. The Bank holiday in August is a still greater occasion for open-air popular enjoyment, since it affects the whole kingdom, but no one ever proposed to adjourn over the Bank holiday in August as a mode of showing the sympathy of Parliament with the open-air enjoyments of the people.

Perhaps, however, all that Mr. Labouchere intended to say was this,—‘Don’t set up for being virtuous Catos who despise pleasure; people will not like you at all the better for it, and may like you the worse. If you would win the favour of the people, you should own to being rather too much given to such pleasures, instead of prone to despise them. The people like large, sunny men, who are not strait-laced in such matters; not earnest, high-souled men, who affect a puritanical devotion to duty.’ If that was all that Mr. Labouchere meant, he was partly right. For though, if the Wednesday were worth saving for the sake of the measures put down for discussion on that day, it ought to have been saved, whether the devotees of the Derby were thereby excluded from the debate or not, it would have been a complete mistake for any Member to suppose that he would gain popularity by voting against the adjournment over the Derby Day as a mere demonstration against the Derby Day. No attempt would be less likely to gain the favour of the people, who do not at all admire stern-minded patriots for giving themselves airs as to the political virtue they display in defence of the people. The members whom the Democracy usually like best are certainly the men who share their tastes as well as their opinions, and who are not above enjoying what they enjoy, and craving for a holiday just as the people crave for it. They will not like Sir Wilfrid Lawson the less for his laughing attack on the laziness of honourable Members, but they will like Mr. Labouchere all the better for his open confession of sympathy with the enjoyments of the Derby Day. And if the only question were as to the course intrinsically best adapted to win a commonplace popularity, we should be inclined to prefer Mr. Labouchere’s course to that of Sir Wilfrid Lawson. It is always more popular to confess a sympathy with popular weaknesses, than to assume a superiority to them. Indeed, the assumption of any virtue is unpopular, even though the assumption be founded in truth.

Nevertheless, we cannot agree with Mr. Labouchere, if he means that Englishmen will always admire a statesman of the higher rank who affects cakes and ale, better than the statesman who, in the unconscious sincerity of his heart, ignores cakes and ale without affecting to institute a crusade against them. Lord Palmerston was very popular, and Lord Palmerston somewhat paraded, perhaps, his love for cakes and ale, and lost nothing of his popularity by doing so. But the two last party chiefs, Lord Beaconsfield and Mr. Gladstone, have neither of them been in any sense at all devotees of pleasure, Lord Beaconsfield openly preferring ambition to pleasure, and declaring that in his belief the two pursuits were incompatible; while Mr. Gladstone’s pleasure has always consisted in his eager and ardent devotion to political duty, the feature in his career which the people have always regarded with the utmost enthusiasm. We should say, on the whole, that what is most popular in England is a strong nature, freely and impressively displayed in its public aspects, so that it really takes hold of the imagination of the people; and that it matters comparatively little whether that strength of nature exhibits itself most characteristically in care for the public interest or in sympathy with the public recreations, so long as that care and sympathy are genuine and their expression adequate. Sir Robert Peel and Earl Russell both deserved the greatest gratitude from the English people, but we doubt whether either of them obtained as much as they deserved, and simply for this reason,—that there was something frigid and reticent about the manner of both which partly cut them off from popular sympathy. Mr. Disraeli was, perhaps, more truly reticent,—that is, less really known by the public,—than either of them; but little as he displayed his inner mind to the people, there was nothing of dryness and frigidity about his political attitude; he was always at his ease, and always seemed perfectly frank in his political confessions. Consequently, both Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Gladstone managed to impress their own image on the people with much more effect than either Lord John Russell or Sir Robert Peel, and hence, doubtless, their much wider popularity. The people gained a vivid impression of what they were, which they never gained adequately of either Sir Robert Peel or Lord John. And they certainly came to place as much confidence in Lord Beaconsfield as they had ever placed in Lord Palmerston, and more confidence in Mr. Gladstone than they had ever placed in Lord Palmerston. This seems to show that the English people do not insist on the love for cakes and ale as in any degree a sine quâ non of popularity. We are disposed to think that Mr. Labouchere would make a great mistake, if he were to imagine that a frank love of the common pleasures of life is at all essential to popularity. What the Democracy does dislike is any sign of superciliousness; what it does love is largeness and strength of nature made visible and conspicuous to the people. Nor will they object much to the particular manner in which largeness and strength of nature are expressed, so long as they are expressed, and expressed vividly. The notion that a democracy likes fastness for its own sake, we believe to be an absolute mistake, though it undoubtedly dislikes for its own sake anything in the least approaching to priggishness or virtuous assumption. What it heartily admires is genuine character strongly displayed. We believe, for instance, that the Constituencies will be quite as much inclined to applaud Sir Wilfrid Lawson for his chaff of the pleasure-seekers, as they will be to like Mr. Labouchere for his chaff of the moralists. They would admire Mr. Gladstone much more for an earnest appeal to the moral feeling of Parliament not to waste a Government night, than they would Mr. Lowther for denouncing such an appeal as Pharisaic strategy. Genuineness, force, and strong public feeling are the qualities to impress a democracy, and it matters very little whether amongst those qualities a certain amount of sympathy with lighter gaiety be or be not visible. If it is there, they like to see it frankly acknowledged. But if it is not there, they like their stronger leaders all the better for not professing sympathy with it. It is all nonsense to say that because the people at large love cakes and ale,—as, of course, they do,—they will not tolerate any one who does not love cakes and ale, too. They will not tolerate anything that looks like ostentatious virtue. But they will love all the better the man who, not being in love with such delights himself, shows himself simply as he is, without the smallest depreciation of those who care more for such indulgences than he cares. The popular mind is wonderfully catholic in its tastes. Greatness of any kind, even of the purely intellectual kind, easily “fetches” it, as the phrase goes. Prince Bismarck is popular in Germany, General Grant in the United States, Lord Beaconsfield and Mr. Gladstone in England, Garibaldi was popular in Italy, all without any well-marked sympathy for the pleasures of the people, just because all of them managed to show strong character strongly identified with the national welfare. No doubt, Mr. Lincoln and Lord Palmerston both gained popularity partly by their known sympathy with the easy-going side of the people’s mind. But we question whether even Mr. Lincoln, with all his jokes, would, but for his assassination, ever have been as popular in the United States as Mr. Gladstone, without any special sympathy with the humours of the people, has long ago been in this country. No prig can ever become popular. But one whose instincts really range higher than the instincts of the majority of the people, does not lose, but gain by his genuine indifference to the pursuit of the minor indulgences and pettier excitements of life.

WILLIAM CHAMBERS.

THE death of Dr. William Chambers, which occurred at Edinburgh last Sunday, brought to a close a life which was not only long and useful, but rich in biographical interest of a kind which seems to be becoming rarer every year. The Dick Whittington of legend, who in boyhood could find no resting-place more luxurious than a milestone, but who in manhood reclined in the Lord Mayor's chair of state, died long ago, and has not many present-day successors. Even the traditional hero of later times, the possessor of the solitary half-crown which, by a careful practice of the self-regarding virtues, grows into a million of money, is heard of more frequently in popular lectures than in real life; and the so-called successful man of our day finishes his career near the top of the ladder partly because he had the good-fortune to begin it some distance from the bottom. Apart, therefore, from other and better reasons, the life of William Chambers is interesting because it vitalises the old traditions, and justifies to the imagination such wise words as certain of the proverbs of Solomon and the maxims of Benjamin Franklin, which have of late been rather generally discredited in practice, even by people who respect them in theory, and find them admirable for purposes of hortative quotation.

Few people who have left their mark upon the world have been more heavily handicapped at starting than the boy William Chambers. His father, a good, intelligent, fairly-cultivated, but thoroughly shiftless man, was a hindrance, rather than a help, to his sons, and did little for them beyond entangling them in a law-suit, which in their early days of struggle robbed them of money that they could ill afford. William and his brother Robert had not even the advantage of a decent education. Such schooling as the former had, terminated when he was thirteen years of age, and in his fascinating autobiographical reminiscences he calculates that altogether it cost, "books included, somewhere about £6." Of the first of his schools an account is given which is more amusing than satisfactory. It was "kept by a poor old widow, Kirsty Cranston, who, according to her own account, was qualified to carry forward her pupils so far as reading the Bible; but to this proficiency there was the reasonable exception of leaving out difficult words, such as 'Maher-shalal-hash-baz.' These, she told the children, might be made a 'pass-over,' and accordingly it was the rule of the establishment to let them alone." The educational limitations of the other schools were less startling, and probably William Chambers got a full return for his father's money; but, at the best, six pounds' worth of education can hardly be considered an adequate intellectual equipment. Both the brothers had, however, been born with a passion for culture; and though the means for gratifying it were terribly scarce, every means was made the most of, so that when William Chambers, at the age of nineteen, conceived the bold idea of beginning business as a bookseller, it is probable that his acquirements were equal, if not superior, to those of most youths in his own rank of life. He was, as far as money was concerned, better off than the favourite heroes of self-help treatises, for his capital consisted not of one half-crown, but of two; and this sum—his wages for the last week of his apprenticeship—was devoted to the purchase of wood, with which the young tradesman himself constructed all the shop-furniture he required. A stock of goods, small, indeed, but not contemptible, had been secured by one of those accidents to which even the scorners of happy chances sometimes owe so much. A bookseller's sale was to be held at an Edinburgh hotel, and the agent in charge, to whom young Chambers had been recommended, engaged him as an assistant, and was evidently favourably impressed by the way in which he went about his business. "On the day succeeding the bibliopolic festival," wrote William Chambers, more than fifty years afterwards, "I attended to assist in packing up, in the course of which I was questioned regarding my plans. I stated to the friendly inquirer that I was about to begin business, but that I had no money; if I had, I should take the opportunity of buying a few of his specimens, for I thought I could sell them to advantage. 'Well,' he replied, 'I like that frankness; you seem an honest lad, and have been useful to me; so do not let the want of money trouble you; select, if you please, ten pounds' worth of my samples, and I will let you have the usual credit.'"

It is interesting to recall this beginning of a career the middle and end of which are known to all the world. The kindly agent's samples were sold and paid for, and the little business grew from week to week. Robert Chambers was taken into partnership; printing was added to bookselling, and publishing to printing; and on February 4th, 1832, appeared the first number of Chambers's Edinburgh Journal, to be followed rapidly by the "Information for the People," the "Educational Course," the "Miscellany of Useful and Entertaining Tracts," the "Encyclopædia, a Dictionary of Universal Knowledge for the People," the "Cyclopædia of English Literature," the "Book of Days," and other hardly less important works, which have made the name of William and Robert Chambers familiar in every place where the English language is spoken and English books are read. The undertakings of the two brothers were followed, not only by success of the real and best kind, but by that special result to which the name of success is more generally given; wealth was well-earned and well-distributed; and Paisley and Edinburgh have substantial memorials of the liberality of the man to whom the former gave life and the latter the means of living.

It is not, however, by his benefactions that William Chambers will be longest and most warmly remembered. It is not, we think, even as a pioneer in the movement for providing cheap and wholesome literature that he has the greatest claim upon our regard. Others, Charles Knight, for example, did almost as much as he in bringing books and periodicals within the reach of the humbler class; but it was William Chambers who, in the fullest sense of the word, popularised literature, by making it not only accessible, but attractive. To the cheapness which was such a boon to the studious artisan or junior clerk, he added the literary charm which attracted the artisan or clerk who was not studious, and by whom reading was regarded less as recreation than as a form of labour, differing from other labour only in being entirely unremunerative. It would be grossly unjust to speak in even a mildly depreciatory tone of such works as the publications of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge; but it is a fact which cannot be ignored, that their general solidity and weight—we do not say heaviness—were better calculated to satisfy than to excite intellectual hunger. The Brothers Chambers seem to have felt instinctively that the classes to whom they specially appealed needed something more than a supply of literature,—an intellectual stimulus to avail themselves of the supply; and that the wide utility of the former was dependent upon the existence of the latter. We do not mean that attractiveness was pursued as an aim in itself; had it been so pursued, William Chambers and his brother would, like others, have fallen into such popular literary vices as sentimentality or sensationalism, from which their work has been conspicuously free; but it was achieved in pursuit of another end—the propagation of a wide love for wholesome and elevating literature—and while this end was kept steadily in view, it was impossible to miss the indispensable means.

The literary work of William Chambers, of his brother Robert, and of such collaborators as caught their tone, was characterised by what may be best described as sublimated common-sense. In his delightful and suggestive book, "Companions of My Solitude," Sir Arthur Helps makes Ellesmere speak of common-sense as the distinguishing quality of Gretchen; and he goes on to say—we quote from memory only—that the common-sense of the vulgar is hard and materialistic, but that Gretchen's was the common-sense of an imaginative person, with a keen sense of the ridiculous. This is a just and helpful distinction. What Ellesmere called the common-sense of the vulgar is, indeed, too common, and its effects in literature are as baneful as those of the pseudo-culture which is its latest rival. The higher common-sense, compact of imagination and humour and a general sanity of the intellect which is more easily recognised than defined, is as beneficent an influence in literature as it is in life; and it is to be found nowhere more free from alloy than in the pages written by William Chambers. The potency of its action in the mind of the man in whom it is either a native gift or an acquired accomplishment, is illustrated by the one fact that it preserved him alike from the narrowness of the sectarian partisan, and the supercilious indifference to great interests of the person who makes it his boast that he "sits apart, holding no form of creed, but contemplating all." He was a safe thinker, not because he thought timidly, but because his thought always turned in the direction of practice, and was thereby saved from the extravagances of the mere doctrinaire. His matter and his manner were alike characterised by the lucidity which Mr. Matthew Arnold has so feelingly commended to us; by an utter absence of the "note of provincialism;" by freedom from affectation, eccentricity, or spasm; and by the natural grace which cannot be acquired, because it is the outcome of a well-poised and harmonious nature. That William Chambers died before his baronetcy was gazetted has naturally provided matter for mention, but it hardly provides matter for regret. He will be ranked with worthier peers than municipal magnates who have had the luck to entertain Royalty.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

A KERRY EMIGRATION SCENE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I witnessed yesterday the departure of some 400 emigrants from the South of Ireland, in the steamship 'Lake Manitoba,' which steamed up the Kenmare River on her way from Queenstown to Quebec, for the purpose of taking the fifty-one families of the Kenmare contingent on board. These emigrants, consisting exclusively of unbroken families, are being sent out by the Guardians of the Poor, under the Emigration clauses of the Arrears Acts. It was high time that they should move in the matter, for the rates in the Kenmare Union amounted to 6s. in the pound, and I was assured that in winter-time the poor habitually got food but once a day. Yet the workhouse, capable of holding 600 inmates, actually contained but 106, so deep-rooted is the abhorrence in Ireland of entering its doors. And, indeed, although its cubic capacity may be sufficient for 600, a portion of the building itself is utterly unfit to receive inmates, from its neglected condition.

It was by the merest accident that I learned from the public car-boy of emigrants leaving Kenmare, through which place I was intending to pass hurriedly, in the usual tourist course, on my way to Killarney. Instead of the one hour, which the public car allows for lunch, I spent nearly forty-eight in and about Kenmare, mostly devoted to gathering particulars about the causes of its pauperism and the circumstances of the intending emigrants.

I was greatly assisted in these inquiries by the kindness of Captain Colomb, the energetic chairman of the Emigration Committee of the Kenmare Union, who permitted me to accompany him during the various processes of preparation for equipping and despatching the emigrants, with whom I conversed freely. I was likewise fortunate enough to make the acquaintance of Major Spaight, the Inspector of the Local Government Board in the South-Western division of Ireland, of Captain Samson, Government Emigration Commissioner, and Captain Christian, Board of Trade Inspector of Emigrant Ships, all of whom gave me valuable information. But, in the limited space which I can reasonably ask for in the Spectator, I had better confine myself to the particulars gathered from the emigrants themselves, and to a description of the scene at the workhouse, where they assembled, and of their conveyance to and embarkation on the 'Lake Manitoba,' which lay off the point where the Blackwater joins the Kenmare River, some seven miles from Kenmare town.

Throughout the day—Friday, 18th—families kept dropping into the workhouse—the children mostly barefooted, and in a ragged condition—bringing the one box which contained all that remained of the family effects, on an enlarged sort of costermonger's cart, drawn by a half-starved horse or donkey. What would be the ultimate fate of this last vestige "of live and dead stock" of the small holding, I regret that I omitted to inquire particularly; but I conjecture that the incoming tenant would, in most cases, take it at a valuation. The first family I became acquainted with was that of Michael Godfrey, consisting of father, mother, five girls and three boys, all under twelve, ragged and barefooted. The mother, too, was only half-clad, dark, with straight, black hair, sharp, pointed features, high cheekbones (reminding me strangely of the Mexican-Indian type), and nursing an infant. The four elder girls were the very image of the mother; the boys favoured the father more, whose face was less pointed, but equally pinched. I accompanied them upstairs to the clothing department, where a very kind and gentle-mannered matron handed each a complete suit of brand-new clothes, hat or cap, and boots, even including the baby, somewhat in advance of her immediate requirements. After the lapse of the best part of an hour—the ladies were long in dressing—the whole family reappeared, wholly transformed, and hardly recognisable. The father had been brought to ruin partly by his own improvidence, partly by the barrenness of the plot of ground on which he had struggled in vain to get a living. He paid £12, rent of a small arable bit of land and eight cow-runs, which plot and cow-runs his brother would now take over and add to his own holding. This arrangement seemed eminently satisfactory, and was just what I was hoping to hear.

The next family was that of Patrick Leary, consisting of father, mother, four boys, and two girls. These I had not seen in their chrysalis state; but as butterflies in their new clothes, they looked highly respectable, and Mrs. Leary had cheap artificial flowers in her black bonnet. I have every reason to believe, though it was too delicate a subject to inquire into, that this bonnet was not provided by the Guardians, but was the gift of a charitable lady, who was seeing them off. As far as I observed, it was the only bonnet worn by any woman present, most of whom made their shawls do double duty, for shawl and bonnet. Patrick Leary likewise had been brought to the verge of starvation, by the impossibility of getting a living out of a barren mountain-side, where for every rod of cleared ground is at least an acre of boulder-strewn bog. Leary had given up the hopeless attempt some years ago, even when agriculture was less depressed, and had since hired himself out as a cowherd to a master, from whom he produced an excellent character. Both Leary and Godfrey had made previous trips to America, without their families; and both were provided with letters from friends there, without which the United States Government will not allow Irish emigrants to land.

The next case I inquired into was that of Margaret Lynch, a respectable, quiet-looking widow, a fact proclaimed by no outward sign of cap or bonnet, for she had nothing but the usual shawl drawn over her head. She supports three children exclusively by her needle. A workhouse official gave her an excellent character. Her husband, she told me, had been a car-driver, but, to use her own words, "his three horses died one by one, and himself died after them." Although present at the workhouse yesterday, Margaret Lynch will only leave with the next batch of emigrants on June 1st.

The gathering at the workhouse for the cars and emigrants was fired for 5 a.m., Saturday, May 19th. By 5.15 the first family had mounted the first of the line of cars, of which there were six large and about as many small. The whole fifty-one families were conveyed in two trips, and the whole were despatched by 7.30 a.m., so excellent were Captain Colomb's arrangements, and so docile were the emigrants in general. From time to time an occasional howl was raised by some, I think, semi-professional howler; and not a few women shed tears quietly at quitting their friends gathered round the workhouse, but during the embarkation I did not see a tear shed, except by a little girl, who was "sure she was going to be drowned."

Nor did I see but one case of drunkenness, and that was in the case of the only single man of the party. A striking example was made of him, for he was ejected by the fellow-occupants of his car on the road to the point of embarkation, and left behind.

The embarkation itself was effected in the most orderly manner, owing to the fact that the boats of H.M.'s gunboat 'Britomart' were told-off for that service. Nothing could exceed the kindness of the under-officers and sailors to the women and children, and the whole two hundred and seventy-three souls were got on board without the slightest accident. The weather was brilliantly fine, and the occasion was made a sort of fête by the whole neighbourhood, who swarmed round the 'Lake Manitoba' in boats. Not till the ship had got some half a mile off did the priest arrive, wearing a very shiny tall hat, in a boat with some ladies. From beginning to end, he had taken no part in the whole proceedings, so far as I could observe.

There can be no question as to the eagerness of the poor people to fly from starvation and stagnation to a land of abundance and enterprise. It is the change of moral atmosphere, which will be just as potent for good in America as the bettering of their material condition. An emigrant recently wrote back to his friends,—“Let priest and agitator say what they please against emigration, do you come out.” Another wrote,—“If you worked as hard in Ireland as we do out here, you might get on at home.” But the fact is that the spirit of work hardly exists in Ireland, and the priestly incubus, encouraging idleness, weighs heavily on the land. The driver of one of the cars, who gave me a lift for a short distance, had caught the infection of the emigration-fever, and exclaimed, “It’s too enticing, sure I’ll be off myself next trip!” Unhappily, the £100,000 voted by Parliament is all but exhausted, and several Unions who were late in their applications will, I fear, get no Government assistance, unless a fresh sum is voted. The urgency of the need is unquestionable.—I am, Sir, &c., W. H. (BULLOCK) HALL.

Killarney, May 20th.

P.S.—I may add that Ireland is crying out for tourists, that the weather is magnificent, and that you are as safe here, and far more welcome, than in Bond Street.

MR. BRIGHT ON THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE “SPECTATOR.”]

SIR,—A little imaginative sympathy, enabling us to realise another’s stand-point, would often save us from misunderstanding and misrepresenting those who hold different opinions from our own. A larger measure of that quality would have given to the hastily written letter of “H. J. V.” a different tone. His criticism of Mr. Bright’s strictures upon the Archbishop’s thanksgiving prayer is based upon an inaccurate idea both of the prayer and the denunciation. “H. J. V.” tells us that it was upon the Church of England Mr. Bright poured out his indignation for the errors of the prayer, whereas he dealt with the Archbishop of York as solely responsible for that production, and carefully discriminated between its authorship and those clergymen who were so shocked at its mercenary spirit that they refused to use it in their churches. The severest censure upon the thanksgiving I have read came from the Spectator, for whose opinions “H. J. V.” cares so much. The last thing we should expect to come from an “Anglican” is that the Archbishop of York is the Church of England. “H. J. V.” blames Mr. Bright for refraining from condemning the Government, and yet censuring the Archbishop. But this blame is entirely undeserved, for in retiring from the Cabinet, Mr. Bright stated that he did so because, in his judgment, the bombardment of Alexandria was a violation of international and moral law. In his speech at Glasgow there was also an implicit condemnation of the Egyptian war, and it was repeated in his latest address. As the strongest disapproval of the Egyptian policy had been expressed by one whose object throughout his life has been to honour God rather than worry a Government, it is doubtful what purpose could have been answered by public expressions of his dissent. The relation, however, of the dignitaries of the Church to the war had not been dealt with; and as the annual meeting of the Liberation Society presented the only opportunity when this could be appropriately done, that relation was fair matter for discussion, in an assembly whose first question would naturally be, “What is the moral and religious utility to the State of an Established Church?” That Mr. Bright’s censure of the action of the dignitaries of the Church in relation to our aggressive wars generally, and of the Archbishop’s prayer in particular, was justifiable, is the opinion of many who do not hold the doctrines of the Peace Party. What shocked the moral feeling of many in the Archbishop’s address to the Supreme Being was its cold blooded indifference to the sufferings of the conquered, and its Jacob-like utilisation of the political advantages of the situation. The Archbishop did not merely thank God when the war was over, or because the war was over, but mainly because our highway to India had been secured, and because God’s power had been manifested in our camp, and was the cause of victory. It was a prayer worthier of the times of the Judges than of the nineteenth century. It practically praised the Infinite One for holding down one section of his family, while another attempted to kill it; and for strengthening our cavalry to pursue and cut down the flying fugitives of Arabi’s army. Can any one for a moment suppose that he whose presence is so spiritual that he dwelleth not in temples made with hands, but in the sanctified thoughts and hearts of the good, could manifest himself in the passions, and storms, and ravages of a battle-field? The Apostle James, when he asked, “Whence come wars and fightings?” returned a very different response. The day is gone for such anthropomorphic nationalisation of the divine as makes the militarism as well as the sanctity and philanthropy of a people equal expressions of his working. The Christian spirit views the sufferings of Egyptians and Englishmen as part of that martyrdom of humanity which has marked the generations that have gone, and cries, in sadness, and yet hope, “How long, O Lord! how long?”

I am not one of those who concur in Mr. Bright’s view of the Egyptian war. I think Mr. Gladstone had sufficient reasons for his action, and I trust his feeling and judgment in this matter. At the same time, I can understand how, from Mr. Bright’s stand-point, the war was unnecessary. Every student of philosophy knows the ambiguity of the word “necessary,” and its implications. To Mr. Bright, that only is necessary which ought to be, which is in harmony with the moral law and the moral sense of man. His ethics are Kantian; he must have a categorical imperative for a certain course, or he cannot commend it. Now, politics are mainly based upon ideas of utility and tradition; they are determined in their evolution by what has preceded them. It is inevitable that collisions should arise between such a statesman as Mr. Bright and the organisers of national opinion into national measures and acts. The defenders of the Egyptian war would not claim that their policy was “necessary,” in the Bright sense of necessity. Their arguments at the most maintain that it was so far expedient, from various considerations, as to make it their duty to declare war. That the war was absolutely necessary, so as to be unavoidable, so that the opposite of a state of war was utterly inconceivable to human intelligence, or impossible to finite power, is a proposition which I venture to think few would assert.

One word more, and I close. “H. J. V.” says “we care not a brass farthing for Mr. Bright’s opinions, but we do care for those of the Spectator.” If we are to accept without qualification the first of these statements, we must ask,—If so indifferent, why write half a column upon Mr. Bright’s opinions, a half column full of veiled concern about the effect of these opinions, on the public mind? The Spectator for years has, with admirable wisdom and largeness of view, and with that variation which must mark independent thought, taught its readers to admire Mr. Bright’s eloquence, and to appreciate many of his political principles. The English race will admire that eloquence and will reverence those principles as long as the English language is spoken,—as long as human liberty is sacred,—and as long as sympathy with the oppressed and suffering remains the noblest passion in the heart of man.—I am, Sir, &c., Holmea, Barnet.

EMPLOYMENT FOR GEORGE WILSON.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE “SPECTATOR.”]

SIR,—George Wilson, the miner (now a student at St. Andrew’s), on whose behalf the readers of the Spectator have so kindly interested themselves, is anxious, during the present long vacation, to find some employment. He would be well suited to teach and have the care of young boys, or might act as private secretary. Communications may be addressed to me.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

IN some ways, this has been an unfortunate year for the old Society. The blare of trumpets and general success which attended the opening of the rival Society—of the Royal Society’s new Galleries in Piccadilly—attracted attention from its older rival, and the tide of picture-seers has to some extent deserted the neighbourhood of the National Gallery, for the neighbourhood of Burlington House. These things are very much a matter of fashion, and it seems to be the fashion now-a-days for picture-seers not to go east of Waterloo Place. It was to be regretted I thought, as indeed, I said at the time, that the Old Society did not accept the offer of the Institute, to make one great Water-colour Exhibition, and so do away with all the past jealousies, and heart-burnings which have hitherto existed between the two institutions. However, the error, if error it were, will bring its punishment with it; and it is more important at the present time to draw the attention of the public to the fact that the members of the Royal Society do not paint the worse because their policy was short-sighted. Well, it does not follow that because there are nearly a thousand works in water-colours in the galleries of the New Institute, that the three hundred in the room of the Old Society are less worthy of notice. I wish, indeed, that I could say that this is a better exhibition than usual, but such is certainly not my impression; it is, on the whole, slightly inferior, though there are several pictures of considerable merit, and though the average is, on the whole, decidedly higher than that of the Piccadilly Gallery. The real defect in the constitution of this Society has always been its ultra-conservatism, and the niggardliness which has been shown in admitting younger members; this has resulted at the present time in causing the Society to consist chiefly of artists who have passed their prime, and it must necessarily follow, unless there is a considerable change of policy, that for the next few years the exhibition of the Society will decrease in interest. There is no sufficient body of younger members to take the place of those who are passing away. However, I have said all this before. Let me rather note a few of those pictures which seem to be the best of this year.

"The Invincible Armada" (10), by Mr. Albert Goodwin. On the whole, this is the best picture in the gallery, though it is only a repetition by this clever artist of a former motive. If I recollect right, it was last year that he exhibited a drawing of similar title and somewhat similar treatment. The present composition shows one of the great galleons of the Armada stranded upon a rocky coast, and showing dark against a stormy sunset; it is, indeed, a very beautiful drawing, instinct with a stern, almost savage poetry, a pictorial equivalent to one of Kingsley's declamations on the same subject. I must just pause to note here that Mr. Arthur Marsh, who is to the figure painting of this Society what Mr. Goodwin is to its landscape, sends this year nothing of importance. "A Comfortable Seat" (1), by Mr. E. K. Johnson. This deserves notice as one of the prettiest little pictures we have seen for a long time; it represents the painter's little daughter, sitting in an old-fashioned garden, with a big Persian cat on her knees; it has all this painter's well-known delicacy of execution, and its simple motive is exactly suited to the style of his work. Mr. Thorne Waite's work is rapidly losing its chief meritorious qualities,—those of freshness of impression and ease of manner; it has long been evident that his sketches were far superior to his finished work, and this year he shows this still more plainly.

Mr. Moore has half-a-dozen drawings here, all interesting, and all on his usual subject and in his usual style; they call for little remark, except the one I have made so often, that for painting of the sea, as distinguished from the painting of waves, and painting of the sea-coast, Mr. Moore is our most accomplished artist, despite all his faults of over-roughness of execution, and his leaving too much to the spectator's imagination in the forms of his waves and clouds. His paintings and drawings of the sea possess all the freshness and healthiness of the scenes they depict, and have, too, no small share of the mystery of the sea. It is notable, too, that he is one of the very few painters who, having worked for years in an unnaturally low key of colour, has deliberately set himself to remedy the deficiency, and who is rapidly succeeding in so doing. "Fleet Street" (9), by Mr. Herbert Marshall. On the whole, this is the best picture of London which this artist has given us; it is on a rather larger scale than usual, and is full of figures, omnibuses, and carts. Mr. Marshall will have soon to take out a patent for the smoky poetry with which he has surrounded London life. It is far too good to be allowed to be imitated at random, and as Ruskin once said of another artist, "to be degraded by the fallacy of its echoes." It is interesting to note that this is the first drawing of any real merit, which has taken in the new Law Courts, and the site where Temple Bar once stood. As a contrast to this, it is worth while to look at its next neighbour, Mr. Goodall's "Cairene Mosque," shooting a slender minaret up into a sunny sky; a fair, but not a first-rate example of his work. "Waiting for the Boat, Scheveningen" (217), by Mr. R. Bevis. A fine, industrious, careful composition, well drawn and well painted, but not remarkable for any great amount of imagination, or any very minute observation of nature; in fact, industrious and accurate, and a trifle uninteresting. Mr. Collingwood Smith's "Rome, from the Pincio," should be looked at as a survival of a form of art which is rapidly passing away, and should be contrasted with Mr. Glennie's "View of the Palazzo del Popolo," the same place from a lower point of view.

I find it excessively difficult to select a single figure picture as being worthy of special praise. Probably the best is one by a new Associate, who is, we hope, a comparatively young man, William Wainwright. This gentleman sends three drawings, all of which should be carefully looked at; but his most important is called "The Singers," and represents some youths in mediæval costume singing to an unseen audience. This drawing shows very plainly the marks of foreign teaching, and has a good deal of that somewhat unpleasant ability which marks much of the French work; but it is well and strongly drawn, is full of power, and has a definite style and meaning in its painting; in fact, it is by a man who knows his business, and is neither namby-pamby nor trivial. Whether it is not insolent is another question, and if Mr. Wainwright means to become a great artist, he must guard against that coarseness both of feeling and execution of which his work at present shows distinct traces.

Mr. Carl Haag's large picture (130), of a "Sheik in Cairo Receiving a Deputation from the Desert," at the door-way of a mosque, is not a good example of his work, in anything but technical skill; the figures are singularly uninteresting, and the architecture, though beautifully painted, does not compose pleasantly with them. The elaborate style of this artist always borders a little upon the artificial, and, in the present instance has overstepped the line. On the whole, the most interesting landscapes in the exhibition, after those of Mr. Albert Goodwin, are by Mr. W. Matthew Hale, no relation to the figure painter of the same name. These are very tender, delicate studies of atmospheric effect, and the finest of them is called, "Just as the Setting Sun Made Eventide," a picture of a woodland glade against a faintly-pink sky. This last is, without exception, the most perfect piece of harmonious colour in the Gallery, and is absolutely true to an effect of nature which is as beautiful as it is difficult to reproduce. Mr. John Parker is an artist who has taken up the waistcoat, if not the mantle, of the late Mr. Pinwell; and though his work fails in the eerie charm of his predecessor, and fails too, in its over-prettyness and its lack of other meaning, it has several meritorious qualities. "The New Milkpail" is a good example, both for its excellencies and defects; it is very cleverly and elaborately composed, is full of pretty things prettily drawn, and has a pleasant, almost idyllic character; it lacks, however, the "one touch of Nature," and it lacks any reason for the collection into a focus, of the incidents and what may be called the furniture of the picture. The things, and the people seem to me to be there, not because they were on the spot, or ought to have been, but because the painter wanted to make a pretty picture. Mr. Tom Lloyd and Mr. Ernest Waterlow are again two artists who suffer from this disease of unmeaning prettiness. They will stick gracefully dodged-up studio figures into their really delicate landscape studies; they seem to me absolutely incapable of understanding that there must be a certain relation between a figure and the landscape in which it is placed. If they could be shut up in the Luxembourg, and fed on François Millet, and Jules Breton for a month or so, they might, perhaps, do some good work; as it is, their painting has been for years of a kind which impresses me as futile beauty.

Mr. Alfred Newton's drawing of the "Propylæa, Athens," is a refreshing contrast, and errs only in its over-severity. Like all his work, it is a little stern, and tells us a little too plainly that art is a serious business; in this respect, perhaps, it may be compared with Mr. Ruskin's water-colour drawing of the "Duomo at Lucca," a delicate study of various-coloured marbles, in details of architecture. Mr. Holman Hunt's "Plains of Esdraelon" is at once over-brilliant, over-laboured, and unattractive, dwelling upon detail with no apparent object, and giving me no pleasure either as a whole or in part. It seems natural to mention Mr. Boyce along with Mr. Hunt, if only because both are such staunch pre-Raphaelites; but we need not speak of Mr. Boyce's work at length this year; it is as minute and as refined in quality as ever, but as in the exhibitions of the last three or four years, it is far less interesting than of old. Indeed execution has grown to be with Mr. Boyce an end, rather than a means; his pictures therefore suffer.

HARRY QUILTER.

THE INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

"THE Institute of Painters in Water-colours, which has now been in existence more than half a century, has this year taken a new departure in its history. The exhibitions of the Institute have hitherto been confined to the works of its own elected members, the Galleries which the Institute occupied in Pall Mall having been sufficient only for that purpose. The members have, however, long felt that it was important for the interests of the art that there should be in London an exhibition open to all painters in water-colours, and with this object they have erected their present Galleries in Piccadilly. They have also organised free schools for the education of students in the art of painting in water-colours, instruction in which will be given by the members of the Institute, whose aim and endeavour are to afford the same advantages to painters in water-colours that painters in oil have derived from the Royal Academy."

The above quotation expresses, with tolerable preciseness, the nature of the change which has been made this year in the constitution of the "Institute," and it is only fair that those who have inaugurated and carried out such a much-needed reform should have the merit of their work. Let me say at once that the present exhibition bears to former "Water-colour Galleries" a similar relation to that which the Royal Academy bears to our other exhibitions of oil-paintings. It is not the collection of the work of a small clique of artists, but is, to some considerable extent, fairly representative of Water-colour Art. I cannot spare the space to dilate further upon this alteration, but with the brief assertion that this is, upon the whole, the most complete water-colour exhibition which I have seen in England, pass to the consideration of the principal pictures. I will take them as nearly as may be in the order of the catalogue, and have only to premise that since there are nearly a thousand works in the Gallery, this notice must be necessarily imperfect. I do not profess to mention all the pictures, or even all the best, but to give a note here and there, upon work which is either first-rate of its kind, high in its aim, or remarkable for its truth to nature. M. Jules Lessore's "La Grosse Horloge, Rouen," is a good example of that grey French manner in which the chief attraction is the observation of "les valeurs." It is a delicate, silvery drawing, of somewhat slight execution, but very refined and quiet in its effect; it has, too, a certain "style," which is rare in English painting. Compare with this No. 646, by Mr. Anderson Hague, a composition in greyish-green of an English hayfield, and it will be noticed that the two pictures have exactly the same charm, and that it is in both cases due to the same cause. Carry the comparison a step further, and look at "Waiting" (746), by Joseph Israels, and it will be seen how enormously the merit of this last great painter's work depends for its effect on this same observation of "the values" which gives the sole attraction to the two former pictures. "The Rouen Clock" and "The Hayfield" have this merit alone, and it suffices to make their work interesting. Herr Israels adds this to his sense of pathos and dignity, and in so doing compensates us for his abnegation of colour.

Mr. Alfred Parsons has sent several landscapes of great interest, in which the only great defect appears to us to be the over-heavy quality of the colouring; he affects a peculiar, dull, deep green for his meadows and foliage, and gets an unpleasant, "pudding" sort of look into the actual painting; it seems rather as if it had been mixed with a trowel, and had a good stirring-up before it was placed on the paper; but when this is said, nothing remains but praise. The work is elaborate and careful, and at the same time perfectly bold; and the way in which the artist paints the flowers in a garden, or the rushes in a stream, has very many of the pre-Raphaelite virtues, with none of the pre-Raphaelite failings. Of his four drawings here, the last, entitled, "Market-day at Lechlade," is an excessively pleasant, unaffected piece of work. The others, which have figures by another artist named Abbey, are, we think, less interesting from that very cause; it is but rarely that two painters can work in the same picture with perfect success, and I infinitely prefer both Mr. Parson's landscapes and Mr. Abbey's figures unadulterated. A small drawing of "An Autumn Wood" (26), by Mr. W. B. Gardner, deserves notice for its fidelity. It is just a little bit overworked, and the mossy tree-trunks, which are painted with great minuteness and success, are a trifle flat, but, nevertheless, the drawing is very delicate and good.

Mr. C. E. Johnson, who has just been elected an Associate of the Royal Academy, has also become a member of the Institute and sent two large drawings. The most important of these is called "The Black Coolins," and is a vivid sketch of a Scotch mountain scene; it is a very bold and striking study, but it has hardly enough truth in its rock-forms to give real pleasure; indeed, it fails, from being neither a picture nor a study; it has not enough interest for the one, or veracity for the other. A very elaborate drawing, entitled, "Wanderers" (41), by Mr. Edwin Bale, should be noticed for its almost microscopic work, but it is singularly tepid and uninteresting as a whole. Over-sweet, over-refined, and over-laboured, the chief impression that it gives is one of wasted time and wasted skill.

Those who care sufficiently for Art to notice how the charm of the "Old Masters" can filter through to modern times, will do well to look carefully at the four drawings by Mr. Spenser Stanhope. They are all badly drawn, affectedly composed, overstrained in their meaning, and confused in their expression; but they have, notwithstanding, defects that a Kensington student would be innocent of, a beauty of colour, a sincerity of purpose, and an appreciation of the dignity of Art, such as is powerful to vulgarise nine-tenths of the work by which they are surrounded. Compare with these the "Spring," of Mr. Walter Crane, and one sees at once the difference between real and sham feeling for ancient art. Mr. Crane's "Spring" is almost as frankly ill-drawn as any of Mr. Stanhope's figures, and is painted in a rough, sham-fresco sort of way, which is archaic enough in all conscience; but I try in vain to discover therein any of the compensating qualities of colour or meaning, such as I find in Mr. Stanhope's compositions. A certain grace of line there is in the arrangement of its draperies, and there its merits begin and end.

Perhaps Mr. Lionel Smythe's "Field of the Cloth of Gold" is the pleasantest landscape in the exhibition; it is certainly the brightest. A half-mown field of waving corn, a long stretch of English landscape behind it, the brightest of skies above, and the brightest-coated reapers, make up a composition as bright as one of Mr. Brett's seascapes. Mr. Smythe has possibly a little exaggerated the brilliancy of his labourers and his corn-field, but the picture is wonderfully true to atmospheric effect, and I seldom remember to have seen the distance of a flat landscape indicated more cleverly, more simply, and more clearly. Mr. Smythe is a worker in the same school as the Wylties, and has probably only one great defect, in which they, to a certain extent, share. He is just a little over-clever; he gets too easily up to a certain point, and cares too little to carry his work further.

I cannot afford space in this article to describe the many fascinating sketches of water and shipping which Mr. W. L. Wylie sends. They are eight in number, they are all bright and pleasant, and all instinct with a certain clear, fresh poetry of their own. Mr. Keeley Halswelle, who has just joined this institution, is also in great force, and his water-colour painting is, in my opinion, immensely superior to his oil. His most important work is called "In Flood-time," a picture of stormy weather on the Thames, or some kindred stream, and is a very strong, fine drawing, not quite free from the artist's dullness of colouring, but less faulty in that respect than usual; but his finest picture is "A Wet Day at the Sea-side" (245), a very patient and beautiful little sketch in pure water-colour; it is delicate, and rather old-fashioned in style, and greatly preferable to Mr. Halswelle's larger pictures. Worth while to note is the unaffected manner in which the reflection of the light through the bow window is indicated, and the suggestion of the wet pavement, and the muddy look of the sea is full of truth, and brilliantly simple in its execution; note, too, the knowledge with which the scraps of pure colour are introduced; the drawing, as a whole, has all the breadth and delicacy of early water-colour work.

Mr. E. J. Gregory's little genre picture of "The Sanctum Invaded" (325) is probably the most perfect work of its kind in the exhibition; but I notice with great regret that this artist is, to some extent, neglecting his power of colour, and becoming as dull and domestic as most of his Academic brethren. It would be better for him to paint to the end of his days in the old, slapdash manner, than to degenerate into the chronicler of a child's stockings and a housemaid's duster; we have plenty of such painters, and Mr. Gregory can do better work.

Mr. George Clausen has a curious small picture of "A Shepherd with Lamb,—Early Morning" (417). The drawing has considerable pleasantness of colour, and that tinge of quiet poetry which is the artist's specialty; though why Mr. Clausen should think it necessary to work in this scrubby manner, I cannot conceive. The paint seems to have been laid on with a hay-rake.

Mr. Andrew Gow sends a very spirited sketch for the large picture of "Montrose at Kilsyth," which was exhibited at the Academy last year. The sketch is better than the picture, and it is curious to note that Mr. Gow's work in water-colour is, as a rule, finer than his work in oil.

The most important picture in the whole exhibition, and, taking into consideration the height of its aim, the best, is "The Admonition" (484), by Mr. W. J. Linton. It is another of his scenes from mediæval life, and represents a Bishop admonishing a young woman, who, by the extreme dejection of her attitude, must have been guilty of some heinous offence; but, whatever may be the interpretation which Mr. Linton desires us to put upon this scene, of the manner in which it is painted there can be no doubt. It is in this respect a work of the very highest merit, skilful, laborious, thorough and original in the manner of its execution, and possessing many fine qualities of colour, much observation and variety of character, and a good deal of sound drawing. The only drawback to the picture is a certain lack of spontaneity; it is too evidently composed; it is just a trifle dull, like the German translation of a French novel; all the elements of the drama are there, the indefinable "go" of the original has somehow faded. I must here close this first notice of the Exhibition of the Institute of Painters in Water-colours, leaving for another time the mention of more than half the most interesting work. HARRY QUILTER.

THE LAND OF MORNING CALM.*

THE peninsula which we call Corea, first noticed in Western writings by an Arab geographer of the ninth century, who called it Sila, was known to the Japanese as Shinra, and afterwards as Korai (whence Corea); the latter being the official title of the nation from the eleventh to the fourteenth century. It is probably the least familiar portion of the great Eastern world to travellers, and in imagination the least known to the general reader. Here is its position, briefly stated:—"The peninsula, with its outlying islands, is nearly equal in size to Great Britain. Its area is between eighty and ninety thousand square miles. It hangs down between the Middle Kingdom and the Sunrise Land (Japan), separating the Sea of Japan and the Yellow Sea. When looked at from the westward on a map, Corea resembles the outspread wings of a headless butterfly, the lobes of the wings being toward China, and their tips toward Japan." The Chinese now call Corea the Eastern Kingdom, but the native name of the country, which appeals strongly to the imagination by its immense antiquity and its resolute seclusion, is the poetical one of Chō-sen, or "Morning Calm," bestowed upon it by Ki Tsze (Kishi, or Kicius), who invaded the unknown region of the north-east of China, after the deposition of the Yin dynasty, B.C. 1122, accompanied by several thousand Chinese emigrants, and became its king. If anything could ever conquer the sense of strangeness, of other-planet-like unapproachability, in all things Chinese, that leaves them curious, indeed, but hinders them from being heroic or pathetic to us, it might be the story of Ki Tsze, for he was a scholar, a sage, a great soldier, a wise counsellor to a cruel and foolish tyrant, and so loyal that when Chow Sin, "the Nero of China," perished in the flames of his palace, he would not serve the conquering usurper Wu-wang, but set forth to carry the civilisation of China to the aboriginal tribes whose history is lost in the mists of time. The people whom he found in the north-east were ignorant savages; they lived in caves and holes, dressed in leaves, and were ignorant of morals, manners, cooking, and agriculture. Kishi taught them reading, writing, medicine, the political principles of feudal China, and many of the arts. The country over which he reigned, and where his descendants ruled until the fourth century before the Christian era, was destined to give Buddhism to Japan, a country for a long period far inferior in Chinese-originated civilisation to Corea, whence it also derived literature, the art of printing, and in comparatively recent times, the art of pottery, afterwards carried to such perfection by the workers of Satsuma and Hizen. The names and the deeds of the forty-one generations of Kishi's descendants, making a blood-line of eleven hundred and thirty-one years, are unknown; but the sage and soldier is accepted and honoured as the founder of Korean social order; a civilisation that is one of the very oldest in the world, being contemporaneous with that of Egypt or Chaldea. The contempt of the natives of "the Little Kingdom" for Western civilisation is as the contempt of the Hindoos and Chinese. "When the American Admiral, John Rodgers, in 1871, entered the Han River with his fleet, hoping to make a treaty, he was warned off, with the repeated answer that 'Corea was satisfied with her civilisation of four thousand years, and wanted no other.' The perpetual text of all letters from Seoul to Peking, of all proclamations against Christianity, of all death warrants of converts, and of the oft-repeated refusals to open trade with foreigners, is the praise of Ki Tsze as the founder of the virtue and order of the Little Kingdom, and the loyalty of Corea to his doctrines."

In one of the titles of the ancient sovereigns of Corea, "Lord of Ten Thousand Isles," we have an indication of the physiognomy of the hermit kingdom. The archipelago contains an amazing number of fertile and inhabited islands, rising out of deep water; the mainland consists of eight provinces, and the rulers of the country have striven to convert it from a peninsula into an inaccessible island:—

"Corea," says Mr. Griffin, "has not built a great wall of masonry, but a barrier of sea and river flood, of mountain and devastated land, of palisades, and cordons of armed sentinels. Frost and snow, storm and winter, she hails as her allies. Not content with the sea border, she desolates her shores, lest they tempt the mariner to land. Between her Chinese neighbour and herself, she has placed a neutral space of unplanted, unoccupied land. This strip of forest and plain, twenty leagues wide, stretches between Corea and Manchuria. To form it, four cities and many villages were suppressed three centuries ago, and left in ruins. And only wild beasts, fugitives from justice, and outlaws from both countries, have inhabited this fertile but forbidden territory."

The aggressions of Japan upon Corea, and the fixed Japanese idea that the Land of Morning Calm is, and always has been since the invasion of Queen Jingu (A.D. 202), a tributary and dependency of Japan, form a large portion of the history of the two countries, and are illustrated by the leading features of the pictorial and plastic art of both, in whose designs we find the Korean tiger, the dragon of the Western Kingdom, and the Japanese dog, repeated in a multitude of fantastic forms. On the whole, the history is a prosaic one, and tedious to follow; but it has its gleams of romance, and its touches of poetry, in the legendary time, and in the later days of the Dutch explorers, whose tales were no more believed than those of the long-suffering, late-rehabilitated Mendez Pinto, or those of the Jesuit missionaries who first "caught something like a Pisgah glimpse of the country which, before a century elapsed, was to become a land of promise to French Christianity." It was but a glimpse then; the French priests were forbidden by the Emperor to cross the Tunen (in 1707), and when the Mission afterwards made its way in, it was destined to encounter and record some of the most awful trials and sufferings that find a place in the long roll of Missionary experiences. Here is a passage which puts a vivid picture before us:—

"At Hun-chun, on the Manchian and Kion-wen, on the Korean side of the river, once a year, alternately, a fair was held, up to 1860, where the Koreans and Chinese merchants exchanged goods. The lively traffic lasted only half a day, when the nationals of either country were ordered over the border, and laggards were hastened at the spear's point. Any foreigner, Manchian, Chinese, or even Korean suspected of being an alien, was, if found on the south side of the Tunen, at once put to death, without shrift or pity. Thus the only gate of parley with the outside world on Corea's northern frontier resembled an embrasure or a muzzle. When at last the Cossack lance flashed, and the Russian school-house rose, and the church spire glittered beyond the Tunen, this gateway became the terminus of that 'underground railroad' through which the Korean slave reached his Canada beyond, or the Korean Christian sought freedom from torture and death."

Through all the centuries of Chinese suzerainty, and those of Japanese occupation, succeeded, in 1627, by the withdrawal of the Japanese from the peninsula, and the acknowledgment by the Korean King of the Manchu supremacy; through the two centuries of peaceful self-government and absolute isolation which were disturbed by the Missionaries in 1866, and the Japanese in 1875, the author carries his readers, conveying an impression that this hidden people have remained unchanged since they first received the Chinese impress. Of the eight provinces, six are poetically named; these are, the Province of Serene Loyalty (the scene of frightful cruelties practised on the Missionaries and the native Christians), the Province of Peaceful Quiet, that of Complete Network, that of Respectful Congratulation, and the River Meadow and Complete View Provinces. Only the Capital and Yellow River provinces descend to common-place. The mountains have also poetical names, which reveal the fears and the faith of the people, for we find among them the Yellow Dragon, the Hidden Dragon, and the Flying Phoenix. There is much natural beauty in the country, the beauty of mountain, forest, and prairie, of profuse vegetation, and plentiful rivers and cataracts. And the people are not indifferent to these beauties; they are a "seeing" race, and proud (among themselves) of their marine and mountain views. The country is fertile, but the climate has great extremes of heat and cold. The Indian story of "the tiger that owns my village" would be thoroughly appreciated in Corea, where a very large and fierce species of that terrible animal abounds, and the idea of it pervades all works of art. To Japanese children, Chōsen is known as "the land of the tiger." Leopards, bears, and wolves are also very numerous, the wild deer and the wild hog abound, monkeys are found in the southern provinces, and alligators and salamanders in the rivers. The people are large eaters, especially of meat; small oxen in great numbers supply them in the south, and dogs are eaten commonly. Tea and rice are rare luxuries, and fish is chiefly devoured raw. Altogether, the "diet" chapter is an uncomfortable one. Sheep are imported from China for sacrificial purposes only, and goats are rare. The poorer classes are meagrely fed; they live, like the Japanese, on millet and beans. All classes use tobacco very much. We may take it that the manners and customs which Mr. Griffis describes as existing now are just the same as they have been for ages; domestic slavery in its mildest form, for instance, the position of women, the fraternal principles on which trades and industries are conducted, and the curious ceremonies of marriage, burial, and mourning. Women are not so ill-off in Corea as in many other less secluded heathen countries. They have no rights, and are disposed of like the other animals; but they are not ill-treated by their owners, and though their personal insignificance actually extends to their having no names, they receive titles of honour in public, their apartments are secure from intrusion, they cannot be punished for any crime, the males of the family being responsible for them, and they are free (and safe) to go about at all hours. Widows of position are not supposed to marry again, and are expected to mourn all their lives, but a man whose wife dies wears half mourning for a very short time. It is a breach of good manners to be vehemently sorry for one's wife, and the sex that makes every law finds that one easy to keep. A Corean king is a rather absurd personage; nobody must touch him unbidden, and any one who accidentally does so has thenceforth to wear a red cord round the neck. Metal, also, must never approach the royal person. The King has despotic power, but it is tempered by many kindly customs; he hears the complaints of his subjects, and is in constant communication with the populace, by means of commissioners. The Royal outings are tremendous affairs, with caparisoned horses, dragon flags, and the sacred fan and umbrella. The nobles are a bad and cruel class, according to all accounts of them: the officials and magistrates are "literary." Literature has from time immemorial been held in honour in Corea, from whence the Japanese adopted printing in the twelfth century, when a work of the Buddhist canon was printed from wooden blocks. "A Corean book is known which dates authentically from the period 1317-1324, over a century before the earliest printed book known in Europe." The Coreans are Buddhists, but Shamanism has never lost its hold upon them, and the old gods are revered still, just as the old myths remain in modern Greece. The air is not empty for a Corean, and every month has its three unlucky days, the fifth, the fifteenth, and the twenty-fifth. The worship of ancestors, and the Chinese system of ethics, or Confucianism, are their ruling principles, and the fulfilment of the parental and filial relations in an admirable manner is the distinguishing virtue of the hermit race.

They accept their tradition of thirty centuries as undoubted history, and it cannot be denied that in the attitude of the people there is grandeur and poetry. They will be forced to change that attitude, no doubt; the several interests of Japan and the United States will lead to a combined pressure which they will be unable to resist; we read already that "the friendly whistle of Japanese steamers is heard in the harbours of two ports in which are trading settlements." Mr. Griffis is hopeful for the future of the strange and hidden country whose ancient story he relates to us in detail that indicates a vast amount of study. "The near future," he says, "will see Corea open to the world. Commerce and pure Christianity will enter to elevate her people, and the student of science, ethnology, and language will find a tempting field, on which shall be solved many a yet obscure problem." The prophetic precedence given to commerce over pure Christianity may be accidental, but we fear it is ominous; for violence and injustice have marked the enterprises of commerce in Corea up to the present time. We are more struck by the cheerful complacency of Mr. Griffis than by his powers of observation and reasoning, when we find him expressing simultaneously his conviction that Corea is the pivot of the future history of Eastern Asia, that on her soil the problem of supremacy by those jealous rivals, China, Japan, and Russia, will be decided, and also his hope that "whatever may be the issue upon the map of the world, paganism, bigotry, and superstition in Corea may disappear, and that the Christian religion, science, education, and human brotherhood may find an abiding dwelling-place." It may be so, but we confess the "friendly whistle" seems to us to pipe all hands to the active preparation of a bad time for the big-hatted people of the Land of Morning Calm.

THIS volume, which belongs to the Eminent Women Series, is to a great extent a compilation from other works already published relating to the Brontë family; and the author's object is to give, as far as possible, a portrait only of the fourth daughter, Emily. So closely was her life bound up with that of her family that the book is necessarily a picture of a group rather than of a single individual; yet, on the whole, to the one whose name it bears has been assigned a sufficiently prominent place to justify her being regarded as the heroine. The leading characteristics which she, her brother, and four sisters inherited from their parents were strong will from the Irish father, and consumption from the Cornish mother. From infancy her circumstances seem to have been of a kind adapted to inculcate that stern self-repression, and intense concentration of affection upon the few people with whom she had familiar intercourse, for which she was distinguished. Living in a small house, where there were an anxious, irritable father and a dying mother to be considered, and where the stone floors echoed to every sound, the children were accustomed to think nothing so necessary as that they should amuse themselves in quiet and keep out of the way. But if this state of hushed calm and restraint reigned amongst them perforce while in the house, it was a very different matter outside, where they could ramble to their hearts' content upon the great, bleak, wild Yorkshire moors, enjoy perfect liberty, and study the face of Nature undisturbed by the society of any human beings except themselves. Thus Emily's earliest recollections were "a constant necessity of keeping joys and sorrows quiet, not letting others hear; the equal love of children for one another, the only five children that she knew in the world; the free, wide moors, where she might go as she pleased, and where the rabbits played, the moor game ran, and the wild birds sang and flew." When Mrs. Brontë died, in 1821, her eldest daughter, Maria, an old-fashioned, motherly little girl of seven, with tender, thoughtful ways, took care of the five younger babies, "protecting her little family with gentle love, and discussing the debates in Parliament with her father." Even at that early age the children had developed an aptitude for writing stories and plays which denoted imaginations rather precocious than healthy. Their mother's sick-nurse says:—

"You would not have known there was a child in the house, they were such still, noiseless, good little creatures. Maria would shut herself up in the children's study with a newspaper, and be able to tell one everything when she came out; debates in Parliament, and I don't know what all. She was as good as a mother to her sisters and brother. But there never were such good children."

Mr. Brontë, though not unkind, troubled himself but very little about his young family. He forbade their having meat to eat, or associating with the village children; but seems otherwise to have left them to do as they pleased, with the moors for a playground, newspapers for literature, and the seven-year-old, loving Maria for chief guardian. So we read that "they devised plays about great men, read the newspapers, worshipped the Duke of Wellington, and strolled about the moors at their own sweet will, knowing of and caring for absolutely no creature outside the walls of their own home." Altogether, Emily's early life seems to have been peculiarly adapted to help to mould the solitary, shy, silent woman that she eventually became; unswerving of purpose, rugged; passionately attached to liberty, to all animals, and to her family; so fond of home that whenever away she could not help being heart-sick for it, and never getting reconciled to the jarring strangeness of other places.

A year after the mother's death, a new element was introduced into Emily's life by the arrival of a prim, snuff-taking, maiden aunt, from Penzance, who taught the girls sewing, dusting, pudding-making, and similar domestic duties, and probably laid the foundation of the talent for housekeeping that Emily developed in later life. Then, when only six years old, she and her three elder sisters were sent to the horrible Cowan's Bridge School, which supplied the original of Lowood in Jane Eyre. At this grim, cold, and hungry charity school, managed by a man who "deliberately ignored the apple-and-peg-top side of child-nature," and where the miserable scholars were ill-fed, ill-lodged, ill-clothed, and harshly treated, everything must have tended to increase rather than to counteract the stern, self-concentrated, repressing influences of her earlier training; and, by proving fatal to her two eldest sisters, the school did yet more to confirm her in her previous habits, by thus cutting off two from the already narrow circle of those whom she loved, and in whose company her nature could expand itself. So wild, unsociable, and untractable had she become by the time she was sixteen, that her sister Charlotte could not, without great misgivings, send her out walking for the first time alone with Miss Nussey, Charlotte's own friend, and on their return from the walk immediately drew aside the visitor, to ask eagerly, "How did Emily behave?" A young lady of this disposition could hardly be expected to prove otherwise than formidable to Mr. Brontë's curates, and we are told that if by chance they found her instead of her father in his study, they would beat a retreat so hastily as to make it an established joke at the parsonage that she appeared to the outer world in the likeness of an old bear. Notwithstanding this ruggedness, however, fidelity to old friends was a marked feature in her character, as well as in that of her sisters, as was shown by their conduct when their old servant Tabby broke her leg:—

"She was already nearly seventy, and could do little work; now her accident laid her completely aside, leaving Emily, Charlotte, and Anne to spend their Christmas holidays in doing the housework and nursing the invalid. Miss Branwell, anxious to spare the girls' hands and her brother-in-law's pocket, insisted that Tabby should be sent to her sister's house to be nursed, and another servant engaged for the Parsonage. Tabby, she represented, was fairly well off, her sister in comfortable circumstances; the Parsonage kitchen might supply her with broths and jellies in plenty, but why waste the girls' leisure and scanty patrimony on an old servant competent to keep herself? Mr. Brontë was finally persuaded, and his decision made known. But the girls were not persuaded. Tabby, so they averred, was one of the family, and they refused to abandon her in sickness. They did not say much, but they did more than say—they starved. When the tea was served, the three sat silent, fasting. Next morning found their will yet stronger than their hunger—no breakfast. They did the day's work, and dinner came. Still they held out, wan and sunk. Then the superiors gave in."

The practical and the imaginative were ever curiously blended in Emily, and both kept in constant action by the resolute, energetic spirit that made determined work as natural to her as breath. A capital housekeeper was this woman of remarkable genius; her bread was famed throughout Haworth for its lightness and excellence, and whilst she kneaded the dough she would study German from a book propped open in front of her, and have a scrap of paper and pencil at her side wherewith to jot down any thought worth remembering that might occur. There was a sort of double life always going on in her, of which Miss Nussey appears to have derived some inkling from observing the way in which Emily would be affected by wild Irish tales of horror, which Mr. Brontë loved to relate at breakfast, and which made the visitor's blood run cold as she listened. Far different, however, was their effect on Emily, for Miss Nussey tells us that,—

"Sometimes she marvelled as she caught sight of Emily's face, relaxed from its company rigour, while she stooped down to hand her porridge-bowl to the dog: she wore a strange expression, gratified, pleased, as though she had gained something which seemed to complete a picture in her mind. For this silent Emily, talking little save in rare bursts of wild spirits; this energetic housewife, cooking and cleaning as though she had no other aim in view than the providing for the day's comfort; this was the same Emily who at five years of age used to startle the nursery with her fantastic fairy-stories. Two lives went on side by side in her heart, neither ever mingling with or interrupting the other. Practical housewife with capable hands, dreamer of strange horrors: each self was independent of the companion to which it was linked by day and night."

We have dwelt so long on the impressions which Emily's nature received whilst in its earliest and most malleable stage, that we have no space here to follow the processes by which it was subsequently shaped and developed. Yet we cannot conclude this notice without alluding to the evil genius of the family, her brother Patrick, dissolute, drunken, opium-eating, and good-for-nothing. Painful as the subject is, it is none the less necessary to be taken into account, by whoever seeks to understand the history of the sister who ever gave him sisterly love and loyalty, in spite of sin, degradation, and excesses which she abhorred, and for which she was forced to suffer. A baneful and abiding element in her life, it was from him that was partly taken the character of Heathcliff, the weird, unique hero of Wuthering Heights, a book which, whether or no wholly satisfactory to all tastes, must at all events be universally admitted to be entirely original; a novel standing by itself, and neither founded on nor borrowed from, any other work. Weak as Patrick was, yet he showed himself in death to be not altogether destitute of the strong family will. When the last moment came,—

"He would die as he thought no one had ever died before, standing. So, like some ancient Celtic hero, when the last agony began, he rose to his feet; hushed and awe-stricken, the old father, praying Anne, loving Emily, looked on. He rose to his feet and died erect, after twenty minutes' struggle."

The nature of Miss Robinson's theme makes her book at once sad and interesting, as any account of Emily Brontë must inevitably be. It is the record of the life of a rarely-gifted, loving, lonely woman, of indomitable will and dauntless courage. Wealth, ease, pleasure, domestic joys, success in plans, fame, all these things were denied her; and she might well have echoed Faust's bitter cry that "Entbehren sollst du, sollst entbehren" was the doom imposed upon her. Yet she never gave way under her troubles. She would seem always, like Goethe's Iphigenie, to have been impelled onwards by the thought, "Der vorwärts sieht, wie viel noch übrig bleibt," and so to the last breath she fought gallantly with soul and body, and was true to herself.

"Yes, as my swift days near their goal,
'Tis all that I implore;
In life and death, a chainless soul,
With courage to endure," she writes, in one of her poems; and to such a soul as she desired, she seems in truth to have attained. Is it admiration, love, or pity, that should predominate in the feeling of posterity towards her, as they learn to know her as she really was?

AN ANTI-VIVISECTION NOVEL.*

MR. WILKIE COLLINS, as his custom is, gives in the forefront of his latest book a semi-descriptive, semi-critical preface, which is, unlike the majority of such compositions, certain to be read. "In the abstract," as Sydney Smith's Scotch young lady would put it, a preface to a work of art is a work of supererogation, possibly an impertinence; for such a work ought not to need explanation or supplement, while, as for criticism, readers can supply that for themselves, and resent it as cordially as they resent unsolicited advice. Mr. Wilkie Collins, however, can do for a preface what Swift, according to Stella, could do for a broomstick,—he can make it entertaining, which he does partly by the sheer force of a bright and perfectly lucid style, pleasantly salted with the special kind of humour which never fails him, but mainly by his delightfully confidential manner, which probably leads some simple-minded readers to think that, having been told how the books are written, they could write them for themselves, "if they had a mind."

In this particular preface, Mr. Wilkie Collins returns to an old theory of his, and insists that the qualities in fiction which find most favour with the British public are character and humour, and that incident and dramatic situation only find a second place in their favour. He tells us that he has "always tried to combine the different merits of a good novel in one and the same book," but that he has "never succeeded in keeping an equal balance," and that in the present story we shall "find the scales inclining, on the whole, in favour of character and humour." Perhaps Mr. Wilkie Collins hardly states the case quite correctly. The ordinary novel-reader of the day does, indeed, value character and humour, but he values also incident and dramatic situation, as is amply proved by the continued popularity of the writer's own book, The Woman in White; and we are inclined to think that he values most of all the simple skill in the art of narration which is one of Mr. Wilkie Collins's strongest points. Whether there be much or little story in a novel, the reader demands that it shall be well told, and it is in this telling of a story that Mr. Wilkie Collins is supreme. There is less plot in Heart and Science than in many of the writer's previous works, but we do not find this out until we have closed the third volume; for what there is of story is so deftly managed, that we have in reading it the feeling of plot, just as in reading such an unrhymed poem as "Tears, Idle Tears," we have the feeling of rhyme.

* Heart and Science, a Story of the Present Time. By Wilkie Collins. In 3 vols. London: Chatto and Windus.

When we began to speak about this preface we were, however, thinking not of such matters as these, but of the announcement that Heart and Science has been written partly as a contribution to the literature of the Anti-vivisection movement. We are not sure that this announcement is not a mistake, for if a novel have a distinct purpose apart from mere entertainment, it is, perhaps, better for several reasons that it should be left to reveal itself; but Mr. Collins has probably sufficient confidence both in himself and his cause to feel that he will lose little by thus showing his hand. We have never been able to see the force of an objection frequently brought against the polemical novel, that it attempts to substitute an appeal to the imagination and the feelings for the logical arguments which are asserted to be the only legitimate weapons in controversy. The heart, the conscience, and the imagination have their own arguments, not less than the reason; and when Mr. Collins traces in one of his characters "the result of the habitual practice of cruelty (no matter under what pretence) in fatally deteriorating the nature of man," he is making as genuine a contribution to the settlement of a vexed question as that made by the physiologist who proves, by hard fact, that vivisection has been misleading to science, as well as repulsive to morality.

Dr. Benjulia, the vivisectioning surgeon, is not only an impressive figure, but a curiously interesting psychological study. Nothing could be truer to human nature than this picture of a man in whom the lust of knowledge has become as purely selfish and degrading as the lust of gold. Even granting, as in fairness we perhaps ought to grant, that a man like Benjulia begins his experiments with the desire of obtaining through them some knowledge which may be of use in relieving human suffering, it seems clear that indifference to suffering anywhere—say in a tortured dog or rabbit—must in the nature of things result in indifference to suffering everywhere; and knowledge which had been but a means to a beneficent end becomes an end in itself, and an end pursued in the manner which is purely selfish. Benjulia's supreme aim at the time when we make his acquaintance is not that a beneficent discovery should be made, but that he should be the man to make it; and he dissuades his friend Ovid Vere from visiting Italy, and sends him to Canada instead, because he fears that in Italy he may meet with physiologists who may put Vere on the scent which he himself has so long been following. This seems to us an entirely truthful conception, having behind it an irrefutable argument; nor does Mr. Collins stray from the path of psychological certainty, when he goes still further, and represents Benjulia, in the absorbing passion of his unhallowed quest, as allowing Carmina, the charming heroine of his book, to reach the very gates of death, in order that he may study, under favourable conditions, the phenomena of "simulated paralysis."

The portrait is rendered at once more truthful and more impressive by the fact that Mr. Collins does not yield, as an inferior artist would have yielded, to the temptation to make Benjulia wholly repulsive. There is something in the loveless solitude of his life, cut off as it is not only from human sympathy, but from the simple amenities of ordinary human intercourse, which irresistibly compels pity, even for a man who is himself pitiless; and the strongly-conceived picture of the last day of a wasted life—the day in which Benjulia discovers that the prize he has been seeking has slipped from his grasp—is an adequate and powerful realisation of Aristotle's often-quoted definition of the scope of tragedy. In one of the medical journals which are supplied to him every week, and which he examines, but never reads, Benjulia has at last found the thing that for years he has been fearing to find,—the review of a new book in which the problem upon which he has been working is solved. In the darkness of the winter evening, he starts for London, driving furiously, as if upon an errand of life and death—as indeed he is—and secures a copy of the fatal book. He drives to his club, and the library waiter finds him busily engaged in reading:—

"The man whose business it was to attend the fires went in during the night, from time to time, and always found him in the same corner. It began to get late. He finished his reading, but it seemed to make no difference. There he sat—wide awake—holding his closed book upon his knee, seemingly lost in his own thoughts. This went on till it was time to close the club. They were obliged to disturb him. He said nothing; and went slowly down into the hall, leaving his book behind him. It was an awful night, raining and sleeting; but he took no notice of the weather. When they fetched a cab, the driver refused to take him where he lived on such a night as that. He only said, 'Very well; go to the nearest hotel.'"

The bed at the hotel is unslept in, and the next day Benjulia sallies forth, to return home for the last time, staying only to make an attempt to see once more the little girl, Zoe Gallilee, the only human creature who has ever stirred in him something like affection. The attempt is unsuccessful; the family has left the house; but the old woman in charge admits him, and nothing that Mr. Wilkie Collins has written is fuller of pathetic power than the story of how Benjulia visited the deserted school-room, bringing away from it as a relic of his little friend a torn paper cover, "which bore on its inner side a grotesquely-imperfect inscription,—'my cop book zo.'"

Benjulia returns home, and until night he remains inactive. His pipe is unlit, the so-called laboratory outside the house where his mysterious experiments are made is unvisited, and only one demand is made upon the servants, that one being, however, sufficiently startling. They are called up to receive written characters and their wages in lieu of notice, and two of them are requested to witness the signature of their master's will. Then, when the darkness has fallen, Benjulia and his footman carry out into the still, cold starlight "the big basket for waste-paper, three times filled with letters and manuscripts, the books, the medicine-chest, and the stone jar of oil from the kitchen," and set them down at the door of the strange, dark building, the secret of which has been so well kept. Benjulia himself carries everything inside, and when the door is shut, the footman, bent upon discovery, posts himself close to one of the side walls:—

"Now and then he heard—what had reached his ears when he had been listening on former occasions—the faint, whining cries of animals. These were followed by new sounds. Three smothered shrieks, succeeding one another at irregular intervals, make his blood run cold. Had three death-strokes been dealt on some suffering creatures, with the same sudden and terrible certainty? Silence, horrible silence, was all that answered. In the distant railway there was an interval of peace. The door was opened again, the flood of light streamed out on the darkness. Suddenly the yellow glow was spotted by the black figures of small, swiftly-running creatures—perhaps cats, perhaps rabbits—escaping from the laboratory. The tall form of the master followed slowly, and stood revealed, watching the flight of the animals. In a moment more, the last of the liberated creatures came out—a large dog—limping as if one of its legs was injured. It stopped as it passed the master, and tried to fawn on him. He threatened it with his hand. 'Be off with you, like the rest!' he said. The dog slowly crossed the flow of light, and was swallowed up in darkness. The last of them that could move was gone. The death-shrieks of the others had told their fate."

The footman sees his master retire into the building, and hears him bolt the door behind him. He goes back to the house, and to bed, but, horror-stricken at his discovery, he can get no sleep. The thought of the dog torments him, and he wonders if the maimed creature has found a refuge. He steals downstairs, and gently opens the house-door:—

"Out of the darkness on the step there rose something dark. He put out his hand. A persuasive tongue, gently licking it, pleaded for a word of welcome. The crippled animal could only have got to the door in one way,—the gate which protected the house-enclosure must have been left open. First giving the dog a refuge in the kitchen, the footman, rigidly performing his last duties, went to close the gate. At his first step into the enclosure he stopped, panic-stricken. The starlit sky over the laboratory was veiled in murky red. Roaring flame and spouting showers of sparks poured through the broken skylight. Voices from the farm raised the first cry,—'Fire! fire!'"

Such is the end of Benjulia. The chapter in which the terrible story is told has a more powerful effect upon the imagination than anything we can remember in recent fiction; and vivid as the picture is, it cannot be said that it owes its vividness to partial or exaggerated presentation. Benjulia is consistent throughout,—consistent with himself, consistent with human nature, consistent with that law of conscious being the operation of which is seen in the reflex influence of action upon character. He is shown to us as a man utterly devoid of imagination, and this one fact alone suffices to account for his life and his death, and to give to the record of both a terrible homogeneity. We have heard it said that the portrait is drawn from life. We do not know whether this is so, and the question is not one of much interest. A picture so drawn is not necessarily lifelike; but whether Benjulia has or has not a living original, he is himself alive, we know him and understand him, and the conception owes its impressiveness to its imaginative veracity.

We have left ourselves without space in which to speak of the story itself, and of the subsidiary characters. The former is, it need hardly be said, thoroughly interesting, though a little slighter in conception than is usual with Mr. Wilkie Collins. The latter are, for the most part, average specimens of the writer's workmanship; but the delightful child, Zoe, represents the high average, while the more elaborately drawn portrait of her mother, Mrs. Gallilee, represents the low one. If we are intended to regard Mrs. Gallilee's devotion to science and her combined cunning and cruelty as standing in the relation of cause and effect,—and it seems to us that something like this is intended,—then Mr. Collins is guilty of the exaggeration which is so conspicuously absent from the portrait of Benjulia. Mr. Mool, the lawyer, is admirable, and Mr. Gallilee is very amusing, though not nearly so good as Zoe, whose reminiscences of her Scotch visit, in the third volume, are intensely funny. Quite apart from its special purpose, Heart and Science is a most fascinating story, and is certainly none the worse as a novel because, to quote the words of the preface, it "pleads the cause of the harmless and affectionate beings of God's creation."

We should not review a pamphlet which embodies so many of the opinions on Art which Mr. Quilter has expressed in the Spectator, did we not think that a criticism even of our own Art critic, by one who accepts many of his principles, while often differing from him on the application of them, might be of real advantage to our readers. In the following article, we shall endeavour to speak with perfect freedom and independence of the pamphlet before us. We do not think that Mr. Quilter will object to our assuming that his writing on Art has certainly had the effect of increasing rather than of lessening the standing feud which exists between the artist and the critic. We believe Mr. Quilter would prefer being accused of any amount of barbarity to an artist, to its being thought possible that he would cede too much to the sensibilities of any one. He likes to startle us with abrupt truth, truth in its most naked form. But the artist who is criticised and condemned naturally asks, "What is truth? Why must it be what Mr. Quilter says it is?" Mr. Quilter treats his mission as an Art critic with an almost Biblical solemnity. He prefaces his pamphlet with the following quotations,—

"More is it than ease,
Palace and pomp, honours and luxuries,
To have seen White Presences upon the hills,
To have heard the Voices of the Eternal Gods;"

and,—

"Leonato.—Are these things spoken, or do I dream?
Don John.—Sir, they are spoken, and these things are true."

More moderate are the following remarks of Mr. Quilter as to his own conceptions of his task:—

"At best, the pamphlet only pretends to be a Liebig's biscuit of Art, compressed food in a somewhat unpalatable form. The sole merit I claim for it is that it attempts to tell plain truth in plain English. It may be that the opinions herein expressed are erroneous, and even absurd; but, at all events, those opinions have a definite meaning, are susceptible of a clear statement, and are firmly believed by the present writer. I pretend to no critical infallibility."

Mr. Quilter states his general drift in the following manner:—

"In these notes an attempt has been made to describe the character of English painting during the last ten years, and to mention, as far as was possible within the limited space, a few of the merits and peculiarities of the most notable pictures. It is no part of my object to frame an indictment against the Academy, but it would be simply cowardly, in professing to estimate the work which has been lately done therein, and the influence which the institution has exercised over English painting, to conceal my conviction that the Royal Academy, in its present constitution, exists for the good of itself rather than the good of the nation, and is detrimental rather than favourable to many of the best interests of English Art. It is, in plainest words, a private club administering public functions, and irresponsibly applying public interest and public money. That in such a position it fails of acting with regard to the good of the governed many, rather than the governing few, is only to say that its administrators are men, not angels. The blame rests with those who permit such administration to continue. The blame rests with the English people."

We entirely agree with Mr. Quilter in thinking it unfortunate that the Academy has not centred all the different branches of Art which have been developed during the last thirty years within the interests of its own body. All artistic industries ought, we think, to have found a generous patron in the Royal Academy. Surely the idea of South Kensington and the many branch schools for teaching art and design should have emanated with the Academy. The particular purpose for which the Grosvenor Gallery was started should have been thought of and fulfilled by the Academy. The new Water-colour Institute should long ago have been made unnecessary by the Academy's interest and encouragement of that branch of painting. Many of the Royal Academicians would, we believe, agree in wishing that the genius of such artists as Du Maurier, Linley Sambourne, Walter Crane, W. Morris, and William de Morgan was associated with their own institution. Probably there are rules, unknown to outsiders, which make it difficult to incorporate into their system the branches of Art in which these artists are so distinguished, and certainly the red-tapeism must be difficult to get over, if the present President does not succeed in doing so. Sir Frederick Leighton has shown his appreciation of all kinds of genius in a very practical way, and would, we believe, certainly make the Academy as catholic in its sympathies as any one could wish. But we feel that the more difficulties there are inside the Academy in making its spirit elastic and sensitive to merit in every line of Art, the more should the public outside clamour for more real sense in the governing of such a national institution, and for a change in all those rules which create the difficulties. They should not be allowed to stand in the way of the real importance which such a body ought to have as an influence in the country.

Mr. Quilter's second chapter is entitled "Traditions and Changes." In this, though there are many interesting passages, we do not feel that Mr. Quilter meets what he says "is a great need in England just now, of art-writing which can be definitely traced to its first principles." We do not feel that his standing-point is so high that he can get a sufficiently wide horizon for a comprehensive view of his subject. Not that he does not touch every side of his question, but he does not so command it that he brings it harmoniously into a whole. Like the light of a bull's-eye lantern, his criticism strikes one point startlingly, but leaves the surrounding space all the darker. Hence, we believe, the inconsistencies in his expressions of opinion. As one example of the want of a truly comprehensive grasp, we might cite the way in which Mr. Quilter is constantly suggesting it as possible to separate the excellence of the technique in a work of art from the value of the feeling. Our opinion is that the one dominates the other so entirely in the work of a born artist, that it is most misleading to disentangle the power of the workmanship from that of the intention, as Mr. Quilter does in such sentences as the following:—"The perfection of Sir Frederick Leighton's technique will not save his dainty-skinned damself from the oblivion that awaits them." There are also strangely inaccurate statements of facts made to play part in Mr. Quilter's arguments, which remind us of a story told of a famous lawyer who instructed his pupil in this wise,—"Never make a mistake in your logic, you are sure to be found out. The facts remain at your disposal." Speaking of the irresponsibility of the Academy, Mr. Quilter says, in a note, "The best proof of this is that the Academy as a body has never deigned to answer, much less to remedy, any complaint which has been made against its proceedings." It was only last winter that the Academy, finding that Rossetti's pictures were not hung to the taste of many of his admirers, had them rehung, though they had been hung in the first instance with the greatest care, and on the principle that to break the view of them altogether by screens would be an advantage, considering the similarity in the type of the faces delineated. Again, to our minds nothing could be further from the truth than the following statement with reference to Mr. Watts's portraits:—"The painter has never mastered his method, or, rather, he has never had a method that was not an experimental one." The late exhibition of Mr. Watts's works will, we think, to those who recall it, be a sufficient proof of the inaccuracy of this sweeping assertion. His pictures painted years ago prove how good and safe has been his method. They become fairer, lighter, and clearer the older they are. The famous picture of Daphne is a notable example of this.

The present writer quite disagrees in Mr. Quilter's verdict expressed at the end of chapter ii., namely, "that there is no very great Art in England just now." In chapter iii., Mr. Quilter begins his criticisms of the yearly Academy exhibitions, from 1872 to 1882. We find in them much with which we heartily agree, much from which we dissent. He is not, we think, sufficiently alive to the untrue and ugly side in the workmanship of the pre-Raphaelites, the workmanship in which each spot in the nature represented seems to have been put under a microscope, and there and then accentuated in vivid hue, irrespective of all surrounding influences. To us, such painting, skimming, as it were, the bloom of atmosphere from colour, even as workmanship, seems as little to represent the truth in the beauty of Nature's colour as an écorché figure in which the muscles are denuded of the skin impresses us with the beauty of the human form. We often regret the form in which Mr. Quilter puts his criticisms. We think his opinions are too often deformed by the positiveness of his style, especially when his reasons are not given. We are convinced that Mr. Quilter's criticisms are most sincere. They are sometimes remarkably clever, and, as isolated opinions, often true. Nevertheless, he makes a mistake, we think, in somewhat naively feeling that entire confidence that his desire and intention to be honest must insure the result that "these things are true." "What is truth?" is as difficult a question to settle with respect to Art, when once the teachable qualities are mastered, as it is with respect to religion. Every one who feels keenly and fervently on matters of Art believes his view to be the truth. There is no provable right or wrong, when once the boundaries of the teachable qualities are passed, and we believe the writing on Art which does not fully realise the inevitable variety in human tastes and impressions, cannot treat the subject sufficiently sympathetically to influence the public in a wholesome and truly enlightening manner. No two people's eyes see exactly the same, not only because colours affect the actual vision differently, but because there will be in different people unconscious preferences, affected by unconscious memories and associations; so also will certain aspects and renderings of Nature affect the moral and spiritual side of our nature in a wholesome manner, or the reverse, according to individual associations and sensibilities. We know of work by contemporary artists which very genuinely appeals to the most refined, delicate, spiritual side of many natures, whereas to other natures, the very same art as genuinely affects them as sensuous and maudlin in feeling and affected in expression. The skill of the critic is proved by his meeting the first and obvious necessity of his art, namely, expressing his individual opinions in an entirely sincere, honest, and unbiassed way, while, at the same time, he frames those opinions in a form which proves his mind beyond and above narrow dogmatism, and by intelligent reasoning and by reference to general principles he inspires his readers with a desire to think with him. Criticism, like all other arts, depends partly upon its form for its influence and power. Our own experience is that true-born artists do not resent hearing any honest expression of opinion about their work. The standard they are aiming at, the conception of their own artistic natures, is far beyond and above what even any art critic might require of them, and they are the first to know that their work never can, never will reach it. At the same time, the manner in which their achievements impress other minds of any intelligence must be a matter of great interest to them. But what reasonable artists do condemn is that any critic should direct the public taste in any degree merely by dogmatic assertions maintained by no adequate reference to generally-acknowledged principles. Such assertions may often be true, but what the artists feel is that the critic's style is unwarrantable, if it be such as to suggest that, before having proved his accuracy of judgment, he should himself take his right to dogmatize for granted. We all know when the Times or the Spectator speaks on subjects such as Art, it is an individual speaking, though, perhaps, under slight editorial correction; it is no synod of wise minds evoking judgments out of weighty evidence and principles. Still, the popular mind, which has never come into intimate relation with the real producers of art and literature, is, perhaps, unduly impressed by the importance of what the papers say on such matters. The creative mind resents the probability that an individual opinion on matters which are very difficult to discuss with perfect fairness and fullness will gain the undue prestige wielded by the Press. The real grievance of the artist as against the art critic lies in the former's belief that the more dogmatic the style of the critic, the more will the simple-minded public fall under its influence. Really valuable influence among the more cultivated minds has been lost by the wrong form in which critics have expressed their opinions. We cannot too much regret the influence that even Mr. Ruskin has lost by the form in which he has expressed some of his sweeping, even if at times jocular condemnations. Certainly, if any one has made for himself a right to speak dogmatically, it is the author of Modern Painters, a classic for all times, in which the author has proved, not only that he has profoundly studied his subject, but that his genius and fine instinct for perceiving, enjoying, and analysing the sources of the impressions which beauty produces is as great as that possessed by the best artists themselves. Mr. Ruskin has, so to speak, won his spurs in that field where all great poets, artists, and writers have won their glory. To do anything as well as he has done it is impossible without the rare fibre of true greatness; but to descend to a lower level, all who have ever tried their hands at art and criticism must know how comparatively easy the one is, compared to the other. Mr. John Morley, in returning thanks for "Literature" at the Royal Academy banquet this year, said:—"As I look round these walls, it is with humiliation that I contrast the energy and industry, the patient and arduous apprenticeship that have gone to the production of these works, with the comparatively superficial manner in which men of my own profession perform their work. What amazes and humiliates me is the contrast between the industry and study that precede success in Art, and the comparatively superficial preparation that achieves a kind of success in literature." We believe firmly that much good might be done if a more genuine sympathy existed between those who follow art and those who follow art-literature; but such a sympathy is not likely to come about while the form in which the Art critic puts his opinions in is that of, "I am Sir Oracle, and when I open my mouth let no dog bark." We agree with many of Mr. Quilter's criticisms so often, that we regret the more the undue dogmatism by which his censure is sometimes disfigured.

We think the mistake Mr. Quilter makes is that he asserts an opinion, and instead of using his very uncertain, though often great literary power, to prove it true, takes it as already proved when once asserted. The following are a few out of many examples in the pamphlet before us where assertions are made without being explained:—"Mr. Fildes is not a great painter;" or, again, with reference to a picture by Mr. Orchardson, "With nearly every defect of subject and method a painting could have," &c. In speaking of Mr. Frith's "Road to Ruin," "This is not fine art, not even nature. It is simply cheap shoddy, manufactured sentiment, sentiment of the scene-shifter and the costumier, and the sooner it is estimated at its proper value, the better." And of Sir F. Leighton's "Elijah,"—"Elijah was large, ambitious and unsatisfactory, unpleasing in the attitude of the prophet, and uninteresting in the angel." Of Mr. Rooke, "Neither a great painter nor a good draughtsman." Of Mr. Long's "Diana or Christ," "his least meritorious picture, utterly failing to tell its story, or to realise the scene intended." These may or may not be right criticisms, but they are not verified in any way, and they are not only vexatious to the painter, but are of no value to the public without being verified. A truth, we feel, is not the truer for being bare, still less is it the truer for being roughly expressed. On the contrary, one isolated truth is falsified, if it be accentuated into prominence; whereas, were the subject treated exhaustively, it would take a relatively almost subordinate place. It is a temptation in current literature to condense a subject without reference to the relative importance of its many sides. The striking and startling element is retained in its entirety, often at the expense of a sense of balance, the firm strength of reserve, of all "sweetness and light," in fact. In conclusion, we believe that if Mr. Quilter could change his too dogmatic style, his criticism on Art might not only be clever, which it generally is, and sound, which it often is, but be of much more value to the public.

OLD AND NEW EDINBURGH.*

THIS is not a perfect book, for Mr. James Grant is by no means a perfect writer. Incessant production, for a generation, of novels of the "romantic" kind does not conduce to accuracy of thought or of style, and Mr. Grant has not got beyond the Cavalier and other convictions or prejudices of his early Yellow Frigates and Black Dragoons. He evidently still considers Argyll—the Argyll who was the rival of Montrose and the correspondent of Cromwell—as a canting traitor. After all that recent historical research has proved, he has no better description for one of the ablest monarchs that ever ruled England—although he quite misunderstood the character of the forces that resisted him in Scotland—as "the cruel and treacherous Edward I." There is, too, a note of guide-book provincialism in his estimates of men and things. All his Scotch geese are cosmopolitan, or at least Imperial, swans. The rocks in the vicinity of Edinburgh are "stupendous crags;" the professors she "raises" or houses are almost all "distinguished," or "eminent," or have "world-wide reputations." Considering everything that has been said and written of late years, one gets a little tired of "the Edinburgh through the noble streets of which Scott limped in his old age, white-haired and slow, leaning often on the arm of Lockhart or the grey-haired Ettrick Shepherd; the Edinburgh where the erect and stalwart form of the athletic 'Christopher North,' with his long locks of grizzled yellow—his 'tawny mane,' as he called them—floating on the breeze, his keen, blue eye seemingly fixed on vacancy, his left hand planted behind his back, and his white neckcloth oft awry, strode daily from Gloucester Place to the University, or to 'Ebony's,' to meet Jeffrey, Rutherford, Cockburn, 'Delta,' Aytoun, Edward Forbes, and Carlyle; the Edinburgh where Simpson, the good, the wise, and the gentle, made his discovery concerning chloroform, and made his mark, too, as 'the grand, old Scottish doctor,' whose house in Queen Street was a focus for all the learned and all the litterati of Europe and America; the Edinburgh of the Georgian and Victorian age."

On the other hand, the preparation of this work has obviously been to Mr. Grant a labour of love. Nothing but indefatigable industry, stimulated by unflagging enthusiasm, could have produced three large and closely-printed volumes on Edinburgh. He has read all that has been written about the place—a library in itself. He has made a street-to-street, a house-to-house visitation of it. Every "land," every monument, every "cairn," every church, has been forced to give up its historical secret. Edinburgh is besides, a city of a size quite manageable for the purposes of such description as we have here. Mr. Grant, indeed, talks of "the Edinburgh of the Victorian age" as "a vast city stretching nearly from the wild and pastoral hills of Braid to the sandy shores of the Firth of Forth." But, after all, a town with a population of less than a quarter of a million cannot in these days be described as "vast." Besides, Edinburgh is not likely to increase much or rapidly. It is no longer what Mr. Grant would style "a focus for litterati;" the railway has brought it too near London for it ever to play that part again. The overshadowing commercial importance of Glasgow, and the rapid growth of Dundee and Aberdeen, will prevent its ever being a capital again in any real sense. Its natural beauty, and what its inhabitants delight to call its "advantages," clearly indicate its future as a city of education, and retirement, and pleasant, if somewhat "superior" bourgeois society,—a combination of Oxford and the Hague. Such a city is not likely to increase to unwieldy dimensions. It is bound to live essentially in, if not on, the past. But it will always be "very interesting," as the lady globe-trotter whom one is sure to meet at a Continental table d'hôte styles every old town under the sun. It is possible to write a perfect "Old and New Edinburgh," it is hardly possible to write a perfect "Old and New London." It may certainly be said of this work that, between Mr. Grant's letterpress and the abundant and admirable illustrations, ranging from maps and views of Edinburgh, at all stages of its history, to the inimitable though widely different portraits of Kay and Raeburn, and the productions of modern photography, it is much better and completer than anything of the kind that has preceded it. In all essential respects, it is a model work of the kind.

Edinburgh, as the city of beauty and violence, of tragedy and letters, of conviviality and religion, of Mary and Bothwell and Knox, of Nichol Muschat and Major Weir and Deacon Brodie, of the Porteous mob and the Burke and Hare murders, of the Countess of Eglinton, Miss Nicky Murray and Dr. Alexander Webster, of the Hellfire Club and the Free Church, of Jeffrey and Wilson and Russel, is far too well known for us to require to dwell upon the main points and special excellences of any work descriptive of it. There is no central idea in these volumes. Mr. Grant's method is simplicity itself; after giving the general history of Edinburgh, he visits every street and square, wynd and close, and tells the story of all the houses in each. But then there seems to have been no central idea in the history of Edinburgh, properly—that is to say, municipally—so styled. Its burghal life is singularly poor. It has produced no man of the calibre of the Artevelde, or of the De Witts, or even of Alderman Beckford. Its citizens at no time played even such a spirited part in the national history as did the men of Aberdeen, who fought and fell in repelling Celtic invasion at that Battle of Harlaw which was at least as great a deliverance for Lowland or Saxon Scotland as Bannockburn itself. They seem, indeed, from the days of the Bruce to the days of Charles Edward, to have gone on their way trading and making money, and going to law, and to have taken but slight interest—save, indeed, when Knox and his successors called the whole Scotch middle-class to arms—in the foreign invasions, Holyrood intrigues, and "Clean-the-Causeway" butcheries, which passed for the history of Edinburgh and of Scotland. One rises from these volumes with a painful sense of the servility of the Edinburgh burghers to the nobles that bickered and swaggered in their midst, although, as Carlyle writes in his diary, those were "a selfish, ferocious, famishing, unprincipled set of hyænas, from whom at no time and in no way has the country received any benefit." "Persons of distinction" appear to have been allowed to do almost anything they chose, in old, and even in new Edinburgh. Tolerably far on in its history, the leader of a band of riotous schoolboys shot a leading magistrate dead, but got off scot-free, because he was "a gentleman's son"! In 1739, but little seems to have been thought of the eccentricities of James, second Earl of Rosebery, the ne'er-do-well of his house, who published in the Edinburgh newspapers an advertisement relating to the elopement of one Polly Rich, who "had been engaged by him for a year," in which he offered a reward of three guineas to any one who would return Polly to "her owner," either at John's Coffeehouse "or the Earl of Rosebery's, at Denham's Land, Bristow, and no question will be asked. She is a London girl, and what they call a cockney." It may be true that the struggle for existence was so keen in Scotland, that no time was allowed for the growth of a spirit of burgher independence in towns like Edinburgh. If so, then "pity 'tis, 'tis true."

CURRENT LITERATURE.

A Visit to Ceylon. By Ernest Haeckel. Translated by Clara Bell. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—Professor Haeckel's volume may be read with unmixed pleasure by the scientific and the unscientific, the evolutionist and the non-evolutionist alike. It is a masterpiece of description. Even the beauty of Ceylon, one of the loveliest spots in the world, receives an adequate treatment at his hands. And he describes man, as well as nature. The gift of humour, with which his countrymen are not commonly credited, is abundantly present. To this he often gives a peculiar point by a delicate railery of his own scientific pursuits, or even his own theories. Thus, he tells us that his cook, Babua,—

"Seemed to fancy that I, as a zoologist, must take an equal interest in every class of animal life, and that, therefore, the end and purpose of curry must be an important natural problem. So, if on Monday the vertebrata were represented by some delicate fish in my curry, on Tuesday this was replaced by some noble prawns and shrimps, or by small crabs, as representing the Crustaceæ, on Wednesday, cuttle-fish (sepia, or loligo) would appear, the most highly organised of the Mollusca; while on Thursday we condescended to some edible univalve, or to baked oysters. On Friday, the worthy race of Radiata were represented by starfish or echinodermata, the eggs of the sea-urchin or the gelatinous texture of a holothuria (trepan). On Saturday, I fully expected to come down to the Zoophytes, and to find medusæ or corals, sponges or actinæ, in my bowl of curry. My cook, however, clinging to an antiquated system, evidently regarded Zoophytes as plants, and supplied their place with some winged creature, bats or birds, or sometimes the fleshy body of a horned beetle."

So, again, he thinks that when Babua tried to make him eat shark's flesh, "he reckoned on the philogenetic interest attaching to these primal forms—the survivors of the common progenitors of the higher Vertebrata, including man himself." ("Sharks, and bays," in this passage, should surely be "sharks and rays.") He is much amused to find himself presiding within a very short interval at a Buddhist festival and a Wesleyan Mission festival, and he remarks, with admirable gravity, à propos of the astonishment with which the Cinghalese regarded his dredging operations, that while the majority believed him to be a magioian concocting philtres of mysterious power, "the more judicious regarded him simply as an European madman." Humorous, too, in another way, is his generalisation about hotels. The "dynastic," such, that is, as have the "Czar of Russia," "Prince Carl," &c., for their signs, are bad and dear; while the "Zoologico-botanical," named after the "Golden Lion," "Golden Vine," &c., are good and cheap. But the crowning stroke of humour is when he contrasts German moderation in eating with English voracity. Our travelled fellow-countrymen will regard this comparison with stupefaction, till they recognise its true character. We may conclude with a sincere tribute of praise, which all will read with satisfaction:—"The opportunities afforded me during my journey of observing the English colonial system raised it infinitely in my estimation." The translation seems to be well executed.

A Peeress of 1882, and other Stories. By Mrs. Alexander Fraser. 3 vols. (F. White and Co.)—The novelettes which Mrs. Fraser has collected in these volumes are certainly not edifying reading. "Omnia vincit amor" is the motto and a heart the emblem with which she adorns her covers; but the love is not the heavenly Aphrodite, and the heart, if not "desperately wicked," not a little way removed from innocence. Yet we may suppose that she means well, and is even fully persuaded that she is a persuasive advocate of goodness and purity. If it is so, we would suggest that she should reconsider the wisdom of her methods. Warnings against the song of the Sirens or the wiles of Calypso may be so given as to do more harm than good.

With the Poets. By the Rev. F. W. Farrar, D.D. (Suttaby and Co.)—No one will quarrel with the modest conclusion at which Canon Farrar has arrived, as he tells us in his preface, that he "can at least do no harm by publishing the following selections." It is so much gain, if the favour with which his name is received among a certain circle of readers is made the means of bringing about a wide knowledge of these masterpieces of the English muse, and a distinct debt of gratitude is due to him for his preface, for his sympathetic criticism of the ballads which he quotes, and for the manly energy with which he claims for Milton the moral pre-eminence among English poets. There is a tendency now-a-days to disparage the "Puritan poet," and it is well to have a voice raised on behalf of a sounder standard of judgment. The principle of arrangement is to class the poets by the centuries to which they belong, dividing each class into "Poets" and "Minor Poets." (Canon Farrar, by the way, seems to think that the years 1400, 1700, 1800, were the first years of centuries.) In the series themselves there is necessarily little or nothing that is not familiar to readers of English literature. The volume is handsome in appearance, but not sensibly increased in value, we should say, by the illustrations.

The King: a Book for Boys. By L. G. Gillum. (David Stott.)—This is a history of David, an unpretending little volume, but bearing on every page the evidences of intelligent and sympathetic study. Mrs. Gillum looks at the history in a free and independent spirit, but she has evidently no liking for a destructive criticism. With the subject of her book she deals frankly and candidly. The motto on her title-page, "The heir of hopes too fair to turn out false," expresses her way of looking at David's character. A great life marred by great failures, but, on the whole, faithful to duty, would be something like the impression left by the whole account. And, indeed, any other view is something like an insult to the intelligence of mankind, which has agreed to regard him as one of its heroes. One of the valuable features of the book is the illustration from the Psalms. Such illustration is familiar enough to Biblical students, but ordinary readers are surprisingly ignorant of it. A parent or teacher who wants to interest young people in David's life, and has not the opportunity of study, cannot do better than take The King for a text-book.

German Culture and Christianity. By Joseph Gostwick. (F. Norgate.)—Mr. Gostwick points out in his first chapter the importance of Lessing's attitude, the acceptance of revelation, together with the belief that the revelation of Christianity is not final. He thus indicates his own view. In the second chapter, he begins the orderly discussion of his subject with an account of English Deism; and in the third, he points out how, by a remarkable movement, which has assuredly had its converse in more recent times, this deism introduced rationalism into Germany. The early Germany rationalists are noticed, Semler and Bahrdt at some length; then follows a more detailed discussion of the philosophy of Lessing. Separate chapters are allotted to Herder, Jacobi and his friends, Kant, the uncertainty of whose utterances on the connection between ethics and religion is very properly dwelt upon, and Fichte. We would especially commend to the notice of our readers the account of the later philosophy of Fichte, a philosophy, as Mr. Gostwick says, ignored by Carlyle, who did much to popularise his earlier ethical teaching. Carlyle himself forms the subject of the next chapter. The treatment which Mr. Gostwick gives to this great writer is not only fair, but sympathetic; but he points out forcibly that, however much the world has learnt from his teaching, its conclusions were unsatisfying. Human freedom was the central article of his creed, but he ended by worshipping despotism. And, indeed, it is quite possible that despotism may be the more endurable alternative to a freedom that is not Christian. The connection of much that we find in the following chapters with the main subject is not evident, perhaps we might say not existent. We are not disposed to undervalue Mr. Gostwick's literary judgments, but they seem out of place in this particular volume, and they materially swell its bulk, a result to be much deprecated, when the public is not too favourably disposed to apologetic literature. Still, there is much in the latter part of the book, especially when the writer comes to treat of Schelling, Hegel, and Schleiermacher, which is both appropriate and valuable. The volume concludes with a chapter on "Christian Evidences," written on the same lines as those followed by Mr. Rowe, though, as the author tells us in his preface, independently. We heartily thank Mr. Gostwick for a laborious and able contribution to "Christian Defence."

The Bibliography of Thackeray, by Richard Herne Shepherd (Eliot Stock), is an appropriate "companion and supplement to the édition de luxe." Thackeray's greater works most readers know, but there is a large body of contributions to periodical literature much of which is necessarily obscure. Other things there are, too, published in early days, of which few people have heard, the "Flora et Zéphir, Ballet Mythologique, par Théophile Wagstaff," for instance. Mr. Shepherd has done his work carefully and thoroughly.

Stray Papers on Education. By "B. H." (Kegan Paul and Co.)—This little book is more than a memorial of one to whom many generations, as generations are reckoned in the life of a school, owed a debt of gratitude. It contains the expression of a ripe and kindly wisdom, which can hardly fail to teach others something, at least, of the secret which made "B. H." a successful teacher, or, rather, for that may be a misleading phrase, an educator in the best sense of the word. "Kindness," "Religious Teaching," "Punishments," "Emotion," "Obstinacy," "Truth," are the titles of six out of the seven Papers on Education. The seventh is "Cricket—its Uses in Education," and shows, taken in conjunction with "Cricket" which is one of the "Scenes from School Life" (papers of a lighter cast, which form the second part of the volume), a quite remarkable power perhaps the most valuable that a teacher can have, of viewing things from a boy's point of view. Cricket, of course, is a thing in which the ordinary master does not find it difficult to sympathise with his pupils; but that a woman should so thoroughly enter into the game is a proof of a vivid sympathy which must have shown itself most strikingly in other things. These "Scenes," of which it is easier to speak in a brief notice than of the more serious essays, are capital. The boys who disown with pathetic humility the charge of having lamed a duck—they could not possibly have hit it, for stone-throwing was a forbidden act—Dot, who wants to be a missionary, rather to the consternation of his friends, but explains that he "does not mean to have any natives," but to be shipwrecked on a coral island, these and other like passages are very amusing. And here, too, we find that there is nothing that forbids "ridentem dicere verum."

NOVELS.—The Admiral's Ward. By Mrs. Alexander. 3 vols. (Bentley and Son.)—The merits of Mrs. Alexander's last novel are considerable, but they are to be discerned in what may be called its accidents rather than in its substance. The "Admiral," though he could be spared from the story without any material injury to its development, is more interesting than his ward; and Mrs. Crewe, who fills the humble rôle of giving a home to the heroine, for a proper consideration in money, is a happier effort of the novelist's art than either. There is something peculiarly life-like in this fussy, kindly old lady. Her portrait is almost worthy of a place in Miss Austen's gallery. Indeed, the painting of a life which seldom passes out of ordinary limits is worked throughout with a skill which reminds us of the author of Pride and Prejudice. As for the story, we must own that it does not set off the characters to much advantage. The heroine is jilted by her lover, who deserts her for a friend, and finds her revenge in bringing him back to his wife, when he is preparing to desert her, by exercising over him a power which circumstances put into her hands. While this is going on, her own happiness is being properly provided for, and the tale ends with a poetically just but not too strict distribution of punishments and rewards.—The Hands of Justice. By F. W. Robinson. 3 vols. (Chatto and Windus.)—There is ability in this story, as there is in all that the author writes, but the effect of the whole is depressing. A feeling of gloom and mystery prevails from the beginning to the end, and the reader is not sensibly relieved by the usual ending of the marriages which, according to the conventional ideas of the novelists, are supposed to secure happiness. It must be allowed that the author keeps the secret on which the plot turns very well. A murder is committed early in the tale, and the criminal is not discovered till nearly the end. The reader meanwhile is kept in the dark successfully, though he may be inclined to excuse his own want of perspicacity by questioning the probability of the solution. But it is not a great attraction in a novel to keep a dismal secret of this kind perpetually present to the mind. The central figure of the drama is finely conceived. John Woodhatch is a man who has worked his way out of the slough of crime into which he was plunged by the associations of his early life. He devotes himself to the work of rescuing others similarly situated; his self-sacrifice is admirable, but it is marred by the defect which does often, we fancy, mar such lives, that he will have things work themselves out in his own way. "Farm Forlorn," where this strange philanthropist gathers together the scum of prisons and reformatories, is scarcely a possible place, and the record of its history is unpleasing, but the figure of its master is drawn with genuine force.—Mongrels. By T. Wilton. 3 vols. (Hurst and Blackett.)—The first and third volumes of this story display, though in different ways, marked literary power. The descriptions of the early part, and the development of the tale in the later chapters, deserve high praise, praise which is the more significant if, as the blank title-page seems to show, this is a first effort. The lonely childhood life of Tom Wilton, spent with the savage old miller and his wife, is a fine picture of the gloomier sort; while, on the other hand, we have seldom seen anything dramatically finer than the scene of Marjory's death. The catastrophe is happily contrived, because the reader, upon whom it comes, of course as a surprise, yet owns that the author has been leading up to it. At the same time, he feels that a very difficult personage is conveniently removed. As for the working-out of the scene itself, the pathos of the girl's last hours is very effective indeed. Our only adverse criticism on this part of the story concerns the lost letter. Men do not allow letters of transcendent importance to slip into the linings of old coats. It is quite impossible that the hero should not have remembered, in such case, that he had not actually posted the letter. Between the beginning and the end, the story sinks to a level which is really surprisingly low, considering the power displayed elsewhere. If this part could have been,—the episode of Clara, which is neither entertaining nor instructive, being, for instance, omitted, Mongrels would have been a more striking success than it is.—Society Novelties. By F. C. Burnand, H. Savile Clark, and others. 2 vols. (Vizitelly and Co.)—A number of clever novelists have combined to produce these two volumes, and have not achieved a noteworthy success. A dish of scraps is seldom very good, and Society Novelties is no exception to the rule. Of course, Mr. Burnand is bound to be amusing, and the author of "A French Heiress in her Own Chateau" to write a good story, but neither they nor their collaborateurs, all of them, we fancy, more or less practised in literature, show to much advantage. The best story is, we think, the second, "An Entr'acte." The subject is a single incident, the struggle in an ambitious woman's mind between love and fame. It does not, therefore, suffer from compression. Most readers will feel that it is powerfully given. For the most part, a somewhat bewildering effect is produced by the rapid succession of the personages introduced to us. Like other books of the season, these volumes must be read continuously, and the consequence is that they tire.—The New Mistress. 3 vols. (Tinsley Brothers.)—The young lady who, under pressure of family misfortune, takes up the occupation of a national schoolmistress, seems likely to become a favourite heroine. The author of The New Mistress does not commit the mistake of making Hazel Thorne pass per saltum from a drawing-room to a school-house. She knows what she is writing about, as she proves both in this and in other matters, and provides that her heroine goes duly through a training college. But there is little more to be said in praise of her tale. Hazel is provided with an overwhelming number of lovers. There are two who survive from the previous state of existence, both of whom come down to annoy her, and to make the village talk. And there are four who belong to the new life, to wit, the master of the boys' school, the vicar, (why not, for the sake of completeness, have added the parish clerk?) the neighbouring squire, and a wealthy ex-butcher, the chief supporter of the school. The poor girl has other troubles. The maiden ladies of the parish naturally hate her. Her brother robs his employers, and her mother, who is, perhaps, the silliest person that we ever have seen in fiction—for even Miss Nickleby had lucid intervals—appropriates the school pence. The complication of these troubles is too great to be borne, and as there seems to be no way out of them except by Hazel marrying the ex-butcher, whom the writer has been ridiculing throughout, typhoid fever is called in to cut the knot, and the tale ends with a dismal surprise.—Moncrieffe's Second Wife. By "Lolo." (F. V. White and Co.)—Mr. Bruce Moncrieffe marries a second wife, not so much because he loves her, as because he wants some one to look after his daughters. Constance de Vere marries Bruce Moncrieffe not so much because she loves him, as because she wants a home. Of course, trouble springs out of this arrangement, the more readily because one of the daughters has a vile temper, and the other is the most deceitful of womankind. The luckless young stepmother—why did not so dispassionate a wooer as Mr. Moncrieffe look out for a woman of more suitable age?—fights with these wild beasts through a large part of these three volumes. The struggle scarcely makes pleasant reading, but it is certainly well told. "Lolo" writes with an ease that few writers of the ordinary novel attain; and her characters, if not very profoundly studied, are natural. The deceitful Julia is, perhaps, too unredeemably bad; and Mr. McMickie, of Drum, too intolerably disagreeable. On the other hand, the "agreeable rattle" of the story, Sir Eldred, is a very entertaining personage; and his relation to Constance is touched with a good deal of delicacy and tact. Some fairly good comic business is furnished by the loutish "Josh" de Vere, though the scene in which his cousin makes an electioneering speech in his stead is suited to farce rather than to comedy.—Honest Davie. By Frank Barrett. 3 vols. (Bentley and Son.)—The first volume of this book is very pleasant reading. Mr. Barrett has caught with singular felicity the style of the period to which his story belongs. There is just the touch of formality in it which belongs to the writings of eighty years ago. The resemblance is all the more hard to secure, because the characteristics imitated are not strongly marked. The early scenes, too, between the hero and his Delia are very pleasantly described. Altogether, we thought that we had found a novel far above the average in Honest Davie. Nor, indeed, does Mr. Barrett conspicuously fail in the after-part of his story. But he comes to be entangled, so to speak, in his story, which is not very happily conceived, and much of the charm of the early chapters disappears. Still, this is a good novel, the work evidently of one who knows something of the literary art, has studied good models, and knows how to profit by what he has seen.

SPECTACLES v. BLINDNESS.

"Spectacles can only be perfectly adjusted by those having a thorough knowledge of the anatomy of the eye, combined with optical experience."

WE have the highest Medical Authorities, confirmed by daily experience, that imperfect glasses, together with the haphazard plan of selection generally employed by the mere vendor, is the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Sir JULIUS BENEDICT writes:—"I have tried the principal Opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have adapted suit admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others,
is really surprising." The Rev. Professor W. A. Hale, M.A. Cantab., 2 Minford Gardens, West Kensington Park, writes:—"The Spectacles are perfect, and a most decided boon. I had occasion on Monday to write to Lord —, and took the opportunity to mention your name, and the wonderful power of your Spectacles." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age
right eye." Testimonials from Earl and Countess Lindsay; F. D. Dixon Hartland,

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE Czar got through alive. That is, in blunt language, the foreign event of the week. Either the Revolutionary party were daunted by the enthusiasm of Moscow, or they waited to see if any concessions would be forthcoming, or the precautions of the Russian police were most successful. At all events, the Czar was crowned on Sunday, in the regular place, and with full formalities, dined in state clad in robes and crown, and drove out, unescorted, among his people, and suffered nothing worse than tedium. Not only was he not blown up, but no attempt was made upon his life, and to all external appearance he was as safe in his capital as any other European Sovereign. His escape will be a sore blow to the Nihilists, whose hold upon the public mind is based upon the belief that they can always, when resolved, find agents who will at least attempt to perform their task. This is evidently not the case, and the revelation deprives the party of much of its evil fascination. It should be observed, moreover, that although great precautions were taken, the Emperor was not secluded. He rode miles through the city in procession, he walked round the tower of Ivan the Great under thousands of eyes, he attended the opera, and he drove out to see the illuminations nominally, at all events, unattended. Still, he was unassailed, and must be pronounced in the pitched battle with the Nihilists, on ground they themselves chose, completely victorious. Even if they should assassinate him afterwards, they failed to keep their threat that if the Emperor remained obdurate, he should never be crowned.

We have said all we have to say of the Coronation elsewhere, but may note here that unless the Correspondents are unusually courtly, the ceremonial was exceptionally well arranged. Nothing appears to have gone wrong, the magnificence was uniform and sustained, and no accident occurred among the vast crowds who assembled to see the ceremonial. The illuminations impressed even experienced spectators as something marvellous, and the only defect in the ecclesiastical ceremonies was their excessive length. The Ambassadors, many of whom are well up in years, were compelled to stand the whole time, like all others within the cathedral, and at last mustered up courage to fidget perceptibly. All the narratives, indeed, leave on the mind two impressions,—first, that the Russian people are cordially favourable to the Government; and secondly, that the governing mechanism works with unusual precision and force. The difficulty of organising so grand a festival, with its concourse of dignitaries, its aggregation of troops, and the mobile multitudes who attend it, is inconceivable, and we suspect the impression of danger to the Czar which pervaded Moscow lent unprecedented earnestness to the officials entrusted with the preparations. It will be observed in the accounts that the Czar's brother, the Grand Duke Vladimir, was throughout treated as the second man in the Empire, and that no Russian not royal makes any separate figure at all. For the moment, the absence of any great personage among Russian statesmen, governors, or soldiers is a noteworthy feature in Russian politics. No one stands much above the crowd save the Czar himself.

A meeting of Liberal Members was held at the Foreign Office on Tuesday, and was attended by two hundred and eighty gentlemen. Mr. Gladstone made the only speech, and announced that the Government, seeing the time which had been consumed, partly through "unfavourable circumstances," such as the protracted debate on the Address and the Affirmation Bill, which was "introduced from a deep sense of the necessity of maintaining the order and dignity of the House of Commons," propose to abandon the London Bill for the Session. They would, however, make an "energetic" effort to carry the Tenants' Bill and the Bill for Corrupt Practices, and the Bills, such as the Bankruptcy Bill, the Patents Bill, and the Bill for Criminal Appeals, which had been referred to the Grand Committees. These Bills he thought could be passed, with the assistance of the party, though he warned them that it might be necessary to deal with that "tempting opportunity for obstruction," the return of Bills from the Grand Committees. We have remarked on the speech elsewhere, but may mention here that it was approved by many representative men, such as Mr. Whitbread, Mr. Forster, Mr. Dillwyn, and Sir J. Lubbock. It was disapproved by Mr. Jesse Collings, who ridiculed the word "energetic," and wanted stronger pressure applied to the House; and by Mr. Firth, who bewailed the fate of the London Bill. It really is hard on him, after all the pains he has taken, but his work will not be thrown away. Mr. Gladstone replied to Mr. Jesse Collings that "he could not threaten the House of Commons," and to Mr. Firth that he saw no reason why this Parliament should not deal with London,—rather a sanguine view of its vitality. The speech in the House in the afternoon only confirmed these arrangements.

Sir Stafford Northcote held an unreported meeting of his party at the Carlton Club, on the same day. His ideas have not transpired, but it is said that he pressed on his audience the expediency of "jealous criticism" upon all proceedings of the Government, which is, we note, the hint also given in the National Review by Mr. Balfour. That gentleman condemns obstruction by Parnellites, but approves criticism by Tories. The difference in idea, no doubt, is great, but we fear the difference in practice will be small, and should like to see how compact the criticism would be, if it were expressed on paper, and taken as read.

The Daily News of Thursday, following the lead of Wednesday's Standard,—how is it, by the way, that official hints to Liberal malcontents so often ooze out through the Standard?—speaks with a sort of airy caudour of the steady growth of a feeling below the gangway on the Liberal side of the House unfavourable to the National Debt Bill,—Mr. Childers's Bill, that is, for re-creating long annuities, in place of the five millions about to expire in 1885, and for the ultimate cancelling of £170,000,000 of Debt within the next twenty years. Of course, our Liberal contemporary is aware that this proposal is one of the principal elements of the Budget, that it has received the sanction of the Cabinet, and that the Liberal constituencies in the country have accepted it with the utmost cordiality. Does the Daily News really mean to smile on this new attempt to hollow out a very formidable cave, which might very easily result in a political crisis? If it does not, it should have treated this growing disloyalty to a most important Liberal measure,—if growing disloyalty there be, except in the imagination of one or two intriguers,—with rabuke and displeasure. If it does, how are we to distinguish the tone of the Daily News, on this important question, from the tone of the Standard?

At yesterday's sitting of the Grand Committee on Bankruptcy, opposition was threatened in the interest of the country bankers on a vital point of the Bill; and the Government are likely to be defeated on the point, unless mercantile men and the public generally bestir themselves. This point was the payment of money by trustees in bankruptcy to an account of the Board of Trade at the Bank of England. By having such an account, the Board of Trade hope to obtain a large balance, which will help materially to defray the expense of the new administration in Bankruptcy, which may otherwise cost the country £30,000 to £40,000 a year. Balances, if accumulated, though each one of them is small, will amount to a large sum, so that the administration, if the clause passes, would be provided at little or no loss to the creditors in each case. The country bankers, however, will not let their interests be touched in the slightest degree, so that the Government, if the scheme is to be worked out, must either impose new charges on creditors, or face a new burden on the Exchequer. The drift of the Committee on this point is as unintelligible, on the supposition that they want a good Bill, as it is unfortunate.

The Government Bill for Tenants is, at all events, a success in one respect. All parties accept it as a reasonable compromise. On Tuesday, the Bill passed its second reading without a division, and, as Sir M. Hicks-Beach said, amid "practical unanimity." The severe discussion will, of course, be in Committee; but the Government, through Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, expressed a clear intention of adhering to the Bill pretty much as it stands. The agrarian Radicals will, however, move several amendments, and two of them, we confess, though we are not inclined towards double proprietorship, have our sympathy. One is the total abolition of the law of distraint, the first effect of which is that the decent farmer is always liable to be overbid by the speculator, who can offer any rent, because he means to pay nobody but the landlord, who, but for this law, would not accept him. The other is the protection of the sitting tenant, who may have his rent increased on him in consequence of his own improvements. One remedy for this is Mr. Bonamy Price's, quoted last week, but a simpler one might be devised. Why should not a rise of rent without formal notice to quit be made illegal? The notice need not be acted on, but the farmer's right to compensation would at once accrue, and could be settled as he and his landlord pleased. The Peers, however, who are submitting to universal reductions, in hope of better times, will certainly reject any clause benefiting the sitting tenant, and the farmers must fight it out with them. The debate was one of the forgotten kind,—solid, temperate, and instructive, and without a single reference to the wrongs of Ireland.

A small disaster, which may have great consequences, has befallen French arms. Captain H. Rivière, a Naval officer of distinction, about April, 1832, succeeded in capturing the citadel which dominates Hanoi, the capital of Tonquin. Here he remained twelve months with a small garrison, vainly imploring the shifting Governments of France to send adequate reinforcements. On the 20th or 21st ult., pressed, it is supposed, by want of supplies, and surrounded by Chinese troops in Anamese dress and under Anamese colours, Captain Rivière led a sortie through some fields of bamboo. His men were surrounded and driven back, leaving Captain Rivière, his second-in-command, and twenty-two men dead on the field. It is rumoured, but denied, that the citadel has since been taken, and the garrison massacred. The news terminated discussion in Paris. The credits were instantly voted, and a force of 3,000 Marines and Colonial troops has been ordered to Hanoi, where they are expected to arrive on July 10th. Twelve hundred men have also been despatched from Saigon, but many of these must be Anamese, and if the citadel has fallen they will be too late. A much larger force will be required, and owing to the difficulty in using the Line regiments, the Madagascar quarrel may be allowed to simmer.

The point of first importance in the Tonquin affair is the attitude of China, which is still uncertain. The Chinese Embassies in Europe all say China will defend Tonquin, but the Court of Peking is slow to take great resolutions. The Empress-Regent has ordered her ablest Proconsul, Li Hung Chang, to his provinces, which touch on Tonquin, and he is at Shanghai, gathering up force to send forward by sea. So far as we can judge from scattered notices, necessarily imperfect, the Peking Cabinet, which has one eye on Russia, has determined to await a declaration of war from France, and to despatch troops to support its vassal King of Anam; but the troops are to fight as Anamese, and not as Chinese regulars. Considerable bodies have already appeared in Hanoi—they arrive via the Songcoi River—and are armed with chassepôts, a portion, no doubt, of M. Dupuis' large importation of those weapons. This policy is convenient for Europe, which thus escapes the annoyances of a French blockade of China, and may not be inconvenient for France. She need not recognise Chinese action, and may fight the battle out in Tonquin and before Hue, the capital of Anam. The campaign will, however, be serious, the season is deadly, and the Government in Paris are incurably averse to make an adequate effort. They want, in fact, to make the Marines and Colonials do, and if they are not exceptionally lucky, they will accomplish very little.

Lord Salisbury made one of his acrid speeches to the South-west Conservative Association on Wednesday, at the Town Hall, Bermondsey, occupying the greater part of his speech with one of those violently partisan reviews of public affairs which no human being not prepossessed by the most bitter political animosity could accept as even pretending to historical accuracy. Towards the close he became a little more rational, and attacked the Government for trying to deal not directly with the evils which were admitted on all sides, but indirectly with these evils, by altering the political machinery by which, in the view of Liberals, these evils are fostered, and even in the view of Conservatives not abated. For instances, he gave the overcrowding in London, which the Liberals propose to reach through a change in the government of London; and the unequal pressure of rates on property, which the Liberals propose to cure by creating new rating authorities in the counties. Surely it is a very reasonable, not a very unreasonable view, that in a place like London, where an unlimited number of different authorities can pull up a street separately,—and where they actually use that authority,—each for their own isolated purposes, to hold that unless you centralise these authorities, you can never deal adequately with local evils. And the same is true of county rating. Finally, Lord Salisbury did his best to depreciate the importance of the Tenants' Compensation Bill.

On Monday, Mr. Cowen renewed, and on Thursday resumed, his attack on Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, in relation to Lord Granville's supposed congratulations to Mr. Errington on the occasion of the Papal letter to the Irish Bishops; and, on the former occasion, was told in reply, by Lord E. Fitzmaurice, that Lord Granville had sent no letter of the kind either to Mr. Errington or to any one else in Rome, and that Lord Granville regretted that his former denial through Lord E. Fitzmaurice had been more sweeping than the question, and had consequently been construed as evasive. This was, we suppose, an amiable way of conveying to Lord E. Fitzmaurice that he had not shown Sir Charles Dilke's tact in answering questions, and no one can question that so it is. On Thursday, a great deal of time was discreditably wasted in this miserable guerrilla warfare; but the Opposition only elicited that Lord O'Hagan and Lord Houghton had both done exactly what Mr. Errington has done,—i.e., conveyed to the Pope on their own authority trustworthy information in relation to the state of Ireland,—and that it is as absurd to speak of Mr. Errington as an official ambassador to the Pope, as it is to speak of Lord O'Hagan and Lord Houghton in that light.

We have spoken of the plague of Questions elsewhere, but must add here that Thursday night illustrated the very grave disposition of Members of the House of Commons to countenance the disgraceful waste of time which these idle interrogatories cause. The Earl of Aberdeen, who has, it seems, been appointed her Majesty's Lord High Commissioner of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, has circulated a letter, signed by himself and five others, deploring the decision of the House of Commons upon the Affirmation Bill, and recommending a perusal of Mr. Gladstone's speech on the subject. Sir H. Maxwell accordingly asked on Thursday whether the Earl of Aberdeen had acted in this way, and whether in doing so, if he had done so, he was acting under the advice or with the approval of her Majesty's Government. Mr. Gladstone replied that he had no official knowledge of the circumstances, and did not deem it within his duty to make any official inquiry. As a matter of fact, he believed that Lord Aberdeen had issued the circular two days before he was appointed Lord High Commissioner, but that in any case the Government had nothing to do with the matter; a Peer was not deprived of his ordinary political rights by being appointed Lord High Commissioner of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland.

Hereupon, though later in the evening, Sir H. Maxwell asked permission to move the adjournment of the House, in order to enter on a full discussion of the subject, but was supported by only thirty-nine Members in so doing. A fortieth, Mr. A. O'Connor, stood up, after the Speaker had announced that there were only thirty-nine, but was, of course, too late to alter the decision of the Speaker that Sir H. Maxwell was insufficiently supported in his request to be allowed to move the adjournment of the House. This is a flagrant instance of the favour shown by the House to obstructive motions. A more trumpery matter for cavil was never brought before the House. It might as well be proposed to waste the time of the House in discussing how far it was right that a Crown member of the Senate of the University of London should have his own views, and freely publish them, on the subject of the Affirmation Bill. Sir H. Maxwell should have been put down by the unanimous disapproval of the House of Commons, instead of being allowed so nearly to gain his point.

Mr. MacCoan brought a question of Privilege before the House of Commons on Thursday, in the shape of a challenge from Mr. O'Kelly, which had arisen out of a reference made by himself in an Irish speech to Mr. O'Kelly's suspension in February last for giving the lie to Mr. Forster. Mr. O'Brien was referred to by Mr. O'Kelly as his second, and Mr. MacCoan was asked to name a second to act for him. This he refused to do, and as no withdrawal of the challenge had been received, he thought it his duty to bring the matter before the House. The Prime Minister approved his action, and moved that Mr. O'Kelly be ordered to attend in his place on the following day (yesterday), to give a pledge that he would not go on with the quarrel. Mr. O'Brien would not answer for Mr. O'Kelly that he would admit the intervention of "the English Parliament" in his private quarrels; and Mr. Sheil, referring ironically to Mr. MacCoan's earnest desire to keep the peace, suggested that an application to a magistrate would have been more to the purpose; a suggestion supported by Mr. Parnell, who maintained that as this challenge had arisen out of a speech not made in the House of Commons, the challenge was not properly a question of Privilege. Mr. Gladstone's motion was, however, carried, by 250 votes against 19.

The House of Commons on Wednesday affirmed the important principle that, as regards Sunday closing of public-houses, each county shall give its own decision. At least, it passed the second reading of a Bill shutting all such houses on Sunday in the county of Durham expressly on the ground that the people of the county wished it, and that of the twelve Members whom they send up, eleven supported it, only one opposed, and he refused to vote the other way. The only good speech against the Bill was Mr. Peter Taylor's, who attacked its principle, objected to moral tyranny as nearly as bad as immoral tyranny, and said legislators were now prostrate before benevolent men, who made benevolent mistakes. There is truth of a kind in his objection, but it is impossible to prove that a people has not a right to put down a social nuisance, if it pleases. The people of Durham say that drinking on Sunday, when men have their pockets full, spoils their only day of rest, and the evidence is that it does. Then why not stop drinking, as, for the same reason, we stop trading? As to stopping it piece-meal and by districts, that is convenient, because there are other places which, like London, would not endure the restriction. There ought, however, to be a general Act, for this reason,—that if Durham repents, her people cannot get rid of the special Act of Parliament.

The Pall Mall Gazette publishes a letter from "Stepniak," the Nihilist author of "Underground Russia," upon the position of the party during the recent coronation. The letter was written on May 24th, but the writer prophesies an unimpeded ceremony, declaring that the Revolutionary chiefs have changed their method. So great was the excitement caused by the death of Alexander II., that they were overwhelmed with recruits, and were obliged to reject many, lest they should admit men too weak-minded for the work. They have, however, stopped their assassinations, for they suddenly see a chance of proceeding by insurrection, and abolishing not this or that Czar, but the Czardom. The statement is nearly incredible, in the face of the huge Army of Russia and the peasant feeling; but the absence of any attempt during the coronation is to be noted, as well as the public statement about the officers of the Guard, who were arrested as the "Revolutionists, but not Nihilists."

Mr. Auberon Herbert may take rank with the best phrase-makers of the day. His letter to Monday's Times, headed "Some More Political Generosity," contains some of the best (and worst-applied) rhetoric we have read for a long time. It is a denunciation of the promoters of the Tenants' Compensation Bill, and a prophecy that the dam erected by those who have promoted this Bill will soon be swept away by the rush of the agricultural labourers' interests, which will find the interests of the tenant-farmers blocking their way. Mr. Auberon Herbert, though strongly opposed to all revolutions, little or big, prefers "a revolution in fustian to a revolution in broadcloth," and concludes his attack on the politicians who have taken up the case of the tenant-farmers with this artistically composed bit of highly inapplicable invective:—"Let me end by congratulating the politicians of both sides on the part so successfully played as concerns this measure. For courage in asserting one's own interests, for a want of courage in defending the foundations of a healthy public life, for recklessness in party fighting, for blindness in misunderstanding the forces of the situation, the politician, whether agitating or administering, has on this occasion fairly surpassed himself. If we can profitably wish him nothing else, we can always wish him the enjoyment of a short memory, a defective vision, a light heart, and a long life." Nothing could be happier, if only the facts were but in any decent correspondence with the language in which they are described. But we should have said that there has hardly been an agitation of our day to which this language is more comically inapplicable. Mr. Auberon Herbert is a Draconian judge of imaginary political crimes. He sums up with scathing indignation against criminals whose careers exist only in his own fancy, and pierces with lofty scorn the immoralities of his own ingenious invention.

All who are interested in the Church controversies of the day should read the two remarkable articles published in the Fortnightly for June, by Professor A. V. Dicey and the Rev. Malcolm MacColl, on "The Legal Aspects of Disestablishment" and "The Clergy and the Law." Professor Dicey's paper is one of the ablest analyses of the bearing of the law on Disestablished Churches that we have ever read, though we exceedingly regret the rather unworthy sneer, on page 829, concerning a minister of the Independent Church at Huddersfield, against whose claim to retain his position under the trust deeds Vice-Chancellor Sir Charles Hall had given his decision. "It is worth remark," says Mr. Dicey, "that if Mr. Stannard had thought fit, with the aid of his congregation, to disobey the injunction of the Court, he might have found himself as tightly and permanently lodged in prison as Mr. Green. Unfortunately, a 'minister in gaol' has not the alliterative impressiveness of a 'priest in prison.' The disobedience of a Dissenter does not excite the sympathies of good society." So far as we can judge, the sympathy with Mr. Stannard, if he had resisted the law, would have been much greater than the sympathy with Mr. Green. The feeling that Mr. Green was a salaried official of the Established Church diverted the sympathy of ordinary Liberals from his case, instead of attracting it to his case. Mr. Stannard's martyrdom would have caused a critical Parliamentary issue.

But those who are disposed to echo Professor Dicey's sneer should read Mr. MacColl's extremely able paper. There they will see that it is in no way the refusal to obey the law which excites sympathy, but the refusal of a man in earnest to obey a very doubtful provision of the law, so long as Bishops who are not in earnest show not the smallest hesitation in setting at defiance provisions which are not doubtful at all. It is the gross inequality of the way in which the law is applied, and the cool indifference to previous decisions with which it is laid down, that has gained for a few Ritualists a sympathy which would never have been accorded to their specific views. More instructive reading on the relation of the law to ecclesiastical affairs than Professor Dicey's and Mr. MacColl's papers, we have not encountered for many months.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE PARTY MEETING.

THE faint disappointment among Radicals created by Mr. Gladstone's speech to the party meeting on Tuesday—a disappointment accurately reflected in the Pall Mall Gazette—will, we feel confident, disappear after more consideration. So great is the expectation which Mr. Gladstone always excites, that when it was known he was about to address his party, an impression spread abroad that he had some heroic, or unusual, or even novel course to suggest, whereby the delays of legislation would be peremptorily suppressed. There was little reason, except impatience, for that supposition. The Premier, it should not be so often forgotten; is something more than a great orator, or even a great statesman and leader in reforms. He is the most experienced of living Parliamentary chiefs, he knows the interior history of the House of Commons during half a century, and he has in a very curious degree, considering his temperament with its perfidum ingenium, confidence in that slow and cumbrous, but unresting machine, Parliamentary Government. He recognises, as he frankly admitted, that it is never safe to threaten the House of Commons; that it is far better to put up with its occasional aberrations, and that more work can be got out of it by gentle, steady pressure, than by any heroic device. He therefore informed his followers that the Government had decided to reduce the work to clearly practicable dimensions, and then to ask their special help in carrying it forward. Of the three political Bills in hand—the Tenants' Bill, the Corrupt Practices Bill, and the Bill for the Government of London—they would abandon only the last, and press forward the other two with their whole energy. The Tenants Bill interested the whole country, and the Corrupt Practices Bill was "indispensable," a phrase received by the meeting with enthusiasm. They would also press on all Bills referred to the Grand Committees which those Committees might send up, a phrase which, it is well understood, is intended to exclude the Criminal Code Bill, which will not escape in time, and reduces the list to the Bankruptcy Bill, the Patent Bill, and the Bill allowing criminal Appeals. Even these Bills, said Mr. Gladstone, would demand exertion, for it might be necessary that the House should "deal with" an attempt to rediscuss them or their details all over again.

This programme is not extensive and not exciting to the imagination, but it was received by all sections of the party, except the Extreme Left, with strong approval, and it has on the face of it two considerable advantages. It is practicable, and it is usual. The House, if it will only attend and moderate its desire for irregular discussion, can pass those five Bills, and can pass them without assenting to any novel or heroic device. This latter was, in truth, not feasible. A great many public meetings have proposed that Parliament should sit till Christmas, but the proposal, besides disgusting all Members who want to see the trees and the grass before winter, would have been utterly sterile. The Lords would have adjourned at their usual time, and the Government, after irritating the Commons, would have found itself with a sheaf of perfected Bills, but no laws, left upon its hands. The Lords could not be punished for a moderate adjournment, for half the country would consider the demand upon them unreasonable and imperious. Moreover, Ministers themselves are vertebrate animals, and continuous sittings through the entire year exhaust their strength too much. England chooses, not unwisely in quiet times, to be governed by old and middle-aged men, and her Ministers are worked already much more closely than is good either for them or for the public business. A Minister has to do all that the permanent Head of a Department has to do and all that the busiest Member of Parliament has to do, and to receive deputations, confer with colleagues, and keep himself informed as to the general movement of politics besides; and to deprive him of his only chance of a holiday and of quiet thought over his administrative work, is to destroy his usefulness, as well as endanger his health. That proposal was inadmissible, and so also for the time was the alternative one, to take away the Private Members' nights. Private Members sometimes waste their nights abominably, and are often counted out; but they are jealous of their privilege, and will not surrender it willingly, except in the last resort. Mr. Gladstone, like any other Premier, wishes to conciliate, not to fret them; and he accordingly proposed only to ask for morning sittings on Tuesdays and Fridays, and then, with those extra ten hours at his disposal, to press forward the very moderate list of Bills mentioned above. Heavier measures being out of the question, that was the judicious course, and as such we believe it will, on one condition, be welcomed by the country. The condition is, of course, that, as the Session is to be one of light work, the work remaining shall be actually done, that no further delays be permitted, and that no Bill of the list shall be left over to be considered again from the beginning.

This will be comparatively easy, for there is one advantage to be derived from the great moderation of the course adopted which has hardly been sufficiently perceived. The Government stands in an excellent position towards Obstruction. It is by no means certain that the Tory leaders mean to permit any work whatever to be done this Session. They would be very glad to load the next with prearranged work, and they have discovered how to do it without appearing to resort to un-Parliamentary devices. They have only to hint to their followers, as Sir Stafford Northcote did on Tuesday, at the meeting of his own party, that the measures of this Government ought to be "criticised with jealousy," and they will take care so to consume the time with "criticism" that nothing shall actually be accomplished. They can, as they do, debate on Supply to an unprecedented extent; they can, as they do, with the help of their Irish allies, extend the right of interpellation till it becomes almost the only one remaining, and Parliament is compelled to listen to inquiries which a decent clerk in the Department could answer much more satisfactorily; and they can, and they do, foster every irregular debate raised, no matter upon what subject. Through these devices and "jealous criticism" they hope to wear out the Session, and then to accuse the Government of weakness in passing none of its Bills. Those tactics, however, have now to be very carefully pursued. Had Mr. Gladstone threatened to sit till Christmas, the Obstructives might have said that there was time for everything, even for their rapidities. Had he asked for Private Members' nights, they might have pleaded that all time being absorbed, they must take some of it for their grievances and their "irregular but most important" discussions. Had he pressed the London Bill, they might have argued that it was important enough of itself to occupy a whole Session, and was brought in too late. And had he insisted on the full programme, they might have defended themselves by pleading that the Government had overloaded the House, and had asked for so much, that the alternatives were a barren Session or the passing of a quantity of laws undiscussed. As it is, they must either pass or reject the Bills proposed, or stand confessed before the country as men who are unwilling that legislation should go on. They will be reluctant, with the shadow of a Dissolution slowly ascending the political horizon, to run that risk of displeasing their constituents, and the Government Bills may receive an unexpected amount of fair-play. Whether, even if they do, they will get through depends, of course, upon the action of the majority, which recently has been getting a little out of hand. Mr. Gladstone, however, has done his utmost to reduce them to discipline without tyranny, and the Constituencies, seeing that, are sure to second his efforts. The electors cannot prevent obstruction, especially as the great obstructives sit for trumpery villages, as incapable of political foresight as of political interest, but they can make their representatives very sedulous in urging forward work. The election cannot be very far off, and for a year before an election the remonstrances of watchful local Committees are received with considerable respect, even by Members who would not be sorry if legislation stopped.

THE NATIONAL DEBT BILL AND THE GOVERNMENT.

THE Standard of Wednesday is sanguine of a successful resistance to Mr. Childers's Bill for diminishing the National Debt by re-creating for a considerable period the Long Annuities which will expire in 1885; and the Daily News of Thursday, if not exactly sanguine of the same result, contemplates it apparently with mild satisfaction. And, indeed, it is certain that Mr. Peter Rylands—a Liberal who is now too apt to walk in crooked ways—has given notice of his intention to move an amendment that would be fatal to the proposal of the Government, that Lord George Hamilton will raise a similar class of objections from the point of view of the Opposition, and that Mr. Mitchell Henry will take a special objection to asking Ireland, in her present state of poverty, to contribute towards such an arrangement. The Standard says that Mr. Anderson, a Scotch Liberal who occasionally enjoys administering a snub to his party, is to swell the ranks of the deserters, though of this we know nothing except on the authority of the Standard, which may, perhaps, be confusing between Mr. Anderson and Mr. Rylands. But be this as it may, looking to the very discreditable defeat which Mr. Childers encountered the other day,—probably through some deficiency in the Whips,—in his proposal to substitute national for local collectors of the Revenue, we think it not so improbable as it may appear that the Standard is not speaking quite without book, when it anticipates some difficulty in passing this Bill. What the ground of apprehension may be we cannot tell, but this at least is clear,—that either the Whips have not done their work very efficiently lately, or else that there must be some malign influence at work defeating their efforts. The Whips are, perhaps, taken at present too much from the Whig section of the Liberal Party. We should like to see one of them taken from amongst the Radical Members of that party, who would be more likely to know what was brewing in relation to motions such as that of which Mr. Rylands has given notice in relation to the National Debt Bill. But a change of this kind cannot, of course, be made in a moment. However much we may wish that the Government should keep in mind its own apparent want of good information in relation to Radical defections from the Ministerial policy, the danger, if there be a danger, in relation to the National Debt Bill, must be dealt with at present by bringing public opinion to bear distinctly upon it. This, however, we will say, that it is simply impossible for the National Debt Bill to be “dropped” by the Government, as the Standard suggests. It is a proposal which is of the very essence of the Budget, and, indeed, the most important proposal in the Budget. To leave the initiation of the scheme proposed for another year,—i.e., till within a year of the actual expiration of the long annuities,—would be a very grave act of weakness indeed, of which we are quite sure that neither the Chancellor of the Exchequer nor the Prime Minister would take the responsibility. The defeat of the National Debt Bill would be the defeat of the Cabinet on the most important of its financial proposals, and in our view ought to be followed either by a resignation or by a dissolution. No policy announced by the Government this year has been received with more hearty approval than Mr. Childers’s wise proposal to anticipate the falling-in of these long annuities, and to renew something like five millions of them for another considerable period, with a view to a very substantial reduction of the Debt. The country is, we believe, in thorough earnest on the subject, and will give very short shrift indeed to Mr. Rylands, or any other Liberal who attempts to thwart the Government on this head. As for Lord George Hamilton’s opposition, we cannot as yet believe that it will receive the support of his leader. Sir Stafford Northcote is so deeply pledged to the policy of paying off Debt, that it would be a conspicuously shifty party-move in him to try to trip up the Government on a proposal of this kind. But whether Sir Stafford Northcote is shifty or straightforward in the matter, is nothing to the Liberal party. It is something to the Liberal party to see that its own Members shall go straight on a policy of this kind,—a policy of pure justice to our posterity, to whom we are handing down a great load of Debt of very disputable origin, while we are handing down to them, in some directions, as, for instance, coal, greatly diminishing resources,—one, moreover, proposed by the Premier himself, taken up warmly and with great ability by his successor, and accepted by the country at large with a chorus of approbation. If the Government should be defeated on such a measure as this, we hold that it would be simply impossible for it to accept such a defeat tamely. It would be equivalent to a vote of want of confidence in its policy, and ought to involve the usual consequences of votes of want of confidence. Mr. Rylands, of course, must vote as he pleases. But we think we may assure Mr. Rylands that Burnley will be very little likely to accept him as its Liberal candidate again, if he contrives to inflict a defeat on the Government in a matter so important as this. The Liberal Whips should be warned of the very serious nature of their responsibilities, which have not lately been discharged with the usual efficiency and energy. Whether, as it is rumoured, this may be because there is disunion of any sort in the Cabinet itself, we, of course, have no means of knowing. But this we do know, that nothing would be resented more gravely by the Liberal party at large than the least evidence of disloyalty to the Government on a grave question of this kind, either in the Cabinet or outside it. In the country, the party was never more united than it is now. The least trace of a Parliamentary cabal would bring down upon those who gave comfort or aid to that cabal a very swift and memorable retribution.

As regards the Irish side of the case, it may be true, as we said last week, that Mr. Mitchell Henry might perhaps succeed in showing that this is not a very happy moment for spending the taxes paid by the Irish people in paying off Debt incurred by the United Kingdom. But then it is no secret that the Government are not adopting a niggardly policy towards Ireland, but are willing to sacrifice a very large sum for the purpose of such an assisted family emigration as the Western Irish have embraced with so much eagerness and gratitude. It is well known that the Government are prepared to advance to the Canadian Government a sum large enough to enable Canada to establish fifty thousand Irish comfortably on its virgin soil, without running any of the risks of hand-to-mouth emigration. That would, of course, be taking a good large sum out of the Imperial Treasury for Irish purposes, and would probably cancel, for the year at least, the Irish share of the cost of extinguishing Debt incurred in that year. And it is childish to ask the House of Commons to give up a great scheme for the reduction of Debt, for the sake of improvement loans to Ireland on which the Irish Members themselves are as yet in no way agreed, nor even likely to be agreed. Let advances to Ireland for the purpose of improvement of the soil, or for railways, or for any other development of the national resources, be considered on their merits, as the occasion may arise. We, at least, should certainly support the proposal to open up the West Coast of Ireland by one or two State-guaranteed railways, such as Mr. Tuke and his colleagues have more than once suggested. But these are small matters, which ought to be judged on their merits. The Irish Members are not agreed, and are by no means likely to be agreed, on any big scheme for devoting a large capital sum to public works in Ireland; and all such schemes are so purely imaginary at present, that it is ludicrous to consider them as competing with the proposal for paying off the Debt of the Empire. That is a question of national credit and of justice to posterity which is hardly affected, except theoretically, by the arguments of Mr. Mitchell Henry, so easy is it to balance the annual contribution which Ireland would pay to such a scheme by special contributions towards the relief of Irish distress, such as are already before the Government in the case of the Canada Emigration Scheme. The Irish Members cannot expect, and the more reasonable of them will not expect, that we should delay indefinitely the reduction of the Imperial Debt, in order to accumulate funds for visionary drainings of the Shannon region, or still more visionary reclamations of bog.

To return to the pinch of the question. Mr. Childers’s National Debt Bill will come on soon,—next week, we believe—for consideration, and whether the Tories trim on the subject or not, we hope to see the Liberals staunch, and the Whips up to their duty. If there be any failure in the matter, the irritation in the Liberal Party will be extreme, and will be well founded. A defeat of this Bill ought to involve the usual consequences of a defeat of the Government on a matter of first-class importance; and a defeat of the Government in such a cause would be followed by an explosion in the country for which the handful of intriguing Liberals are very ill prepared.

SOCIAL DISCIPLINE FOR THE LIBERALS.

A LIBERAL who seems to be ‘somewhat’ writes a grave complaint in the Fortnightly Review for June that Lady Granville’s invitations are not nearly so skilfully adapted to cement the cohesion of the Liberal party in Parliament, as are the Marchioness of Salisbury’s to cement the cohesion of the Conservative party; and it is added that the Carlton Club is much more efficient in the empty social distinctions which it deals out to the Tories than the Reform Club, or the Devonshire Club, is, or than the National Liberal Club is at all likely to be, in distributing the same class of social distinctions to the Liberals. The writer of the article takes the matter very seriously. He is aware, apparently, that this delicate social bribery and corruption is of no real importance, as regards the vote of the country. He admits frankly that to make one of the new-rich men feel at home among the aristocracy of his party produces no substantial effect on the constituency which he represents, though he thinks it may, perhaps, exert some very minute influence of a satisfactory kind. But, says this advocate of the corruption which aristocratic favour can exercise, it is, after all, a matter of some importance to keep your party well together in the House, as well as in the country. It may be of no importance, so far as regards the next general election, that Lady Granville should ask plebeian plutocrats to her assemblies, or that the Master of the Buckhounds should give them tickets for the Royal Enclosure at the Ascot Races. But it is of the greatest importance for the purpose of keeping these plutocrats to their duty in the House of Commons, and preventing them from joining cabals against the Government. It was, says this writer, Lord Beaconsfield's great credit that he held his party together by the social cement of a little aristocratic patronage of this sort, during the whole of the last Tory régime. The country, it is true, had made up its mind to throw off Lord Beaconsfield's yoke, but till the crash came there was absolutely no sign of party disloyalty to his Administration. And the reason was that the Tory aristocracy sent out their cards for balls and dinners and receptions generally, with the greatest tact and generosity, and filled the hearts of vulgar parvenus with delight. The reason, we are told, why the Liberals when in power do not manage as well, is that they despise these things, or are too lofty-minded or too proud even to think about them. The consequence is that the Tory world encroaches on the world of ambitious Liberalism, and undermines the Parliamentary party, even when the voice of the country is as unanimous and as loud as ever in favour of the Liberal cause. Such is the teaching of this anonymous Liberal, who seems to be "a pillar." It really comes to this,—Let the great nobles of the Liberal party lavish blandishments on all who serve it in Parliament, especially if they are vulgar enough to care for that sort of thing. These blandishments will not alter the opinion of the country, or will alter it only infinitesimally. But they will stimulate the zeal and discourage the disloyalty of tepid Liberals who care for social distinction, and do not care much otherwise whether they get into Parliament on Liberal principles, or on Conservative principles, or on any one of the various shades of Conservative-Liberal and Liberal-Conservative principles.

Well, we have only one reply to make to this Liberal counsellor. He is very likely quite right as to the uses of social blandishments in keeping a man zealously to his political duties, when he might otherwise become very lukewarm and languid about those duties. But then, is it a price which Liberal leaders can properly pay for political cohesion, nay, is it possible that they can really pay it without losing some of their sturdy faith in Liberalism? The Conservatives may do, and may do without discredit to themselves or their principles, what Liberals cannot afford to do. The Conservative takes his stand on the principle of rank. Well, as he takes his stand on that principle, there is nothing discreditable to him in illustrating the force and significance of that principle,—such as it is. If he wants to strengthen the Conservative party, he cannot do better than make good the influence of rank, as rank, over wealth and every other sort of power. If he wants to show how essential an aristocracy is to society, how can he show it better than by providing a long train of willing captives who have surrendered themselves to the influence of rank? Lady Salisbury is winning a recruit to true Conservatism, whenever she makes a millionaire own the ascendancy of high society over political ties. But Lady Granville is not winning a recruit to true Liberalism, she is winning a sham recruit at best, when she makes good the ascendancy of high society over political ties. There is something of treachery to true Liberalism in making social blandishments do the work of conviction. And we may depend upon it that no political leader who really devoted his mind to the exerting of social blandishments over his followers, could well avoid descending to a lower and meaner level of political life, and losing faith in his own principles. We should say, "Let the dead bury their dead," i.e., let those who really think that aristocratic influence ought to tell more on conviction than historical or political argument, put forth that aristocratic influence to the utmost of their ability. But let not those who hold that there are in the political field plenty of considerations far more weighty than the preferences of Dukes and Duchesses, Marquises and Marchionesses, try to trim the balance by appealing to what they sincerely regard as false motives, motives which cannot work powerfully without telling against all the forces on which true Liberals rely.

The Conservatives cry out that the tyranny of the Caucus is an intolerable tyranny,—that a constituency which gives its Member warning that if he votes against the Government which they elected him to support, they will not return him again, is a despotic constituency, exceeding its constitutional rights. True Liberals reply that constituencies are perfectly entitled to tell their Member that if he ceases to represent their convictions on any essential point, he shall at the next vacancy cease to be their representative. But they might well add that there is nothing half so unconstitutional,—as they view what is unconstitutional,—in indicating their wish to sever the tie between them and a Member who misrepresents their views, as there is in trying to twist, or even to confirm, political opinions by social blandishments, i.e., by a class of influences which are entirely irrelevant to political truth and falsehood. The constituency which says, 'Vote thus, or you shall lose your seat,' may induce a Member to give an unprincipled vote; but it applies that inducement only incidentally, and because it is not otherwise possible to get itself truly represented in the House of Commons. But the Duchess or Marchioness who says in effect, 'Vote thus, or you shall not come to my parties,' causes her victim to give what may be an unprincipled vote for no reason which will bear justification at all. The Duchess or Marchioness in question has no constitutional right to be represented in the House of Commons,—which the constituency that elects a Member certainly has,—and, therefore, alters, so far as she does alter, her victim's political opinion, by a pressure which, according to all true Liberals, is a perverting one, a pressure which is purely dislocating, mischievous, and corrupt.

Our reply to the Liberal who wants to reorganise the Social Discipline of the Liberal Party would be very brief, namely, that such social discipline is essentially hostile to Liberalism, even when it is incidentally favourable to it. It is a lowering influence. It introduces disturbing, perverting, and intoxicating influences, which taint the atmosphere of Liberal politics. The Liberal leaders who lay themselves out to ingratiate themselves not as statesmen but as nobles, with the rank and file of the party, lay themselves out to darken counsel by a refined sort of corruption. And they can never do this long without emasculating their own influence as leaders, and lowering their only legitimate attraction for those whom they desire to guide. The gilded-saloon business may be very fit and proper for the devotees of rank, as rank. For those who are not devotees of rank, as rank, but who think that the promotion of the popular welfare should be the supreme law of politics, it is not only a little degrading to exert consciously the blandishments of rank, but a degrading strategy which can never have any effectual success. It will do a great deal more to eat out the hearty convictions of Liberals, than it will ever do to keep crooked Liberals on the straight track.

FRANCE AND ENGLAND.

THE irritation expressed by the French journalists at the English comments on their Colonial enterprises is, on the surface, a little absurd. They seem to think that when France is in movement, Englishmen should either be silent or approve, and detect in the most straightforward criticism a sinister intent. Of course, Englishmen will criticise, and as they are not much occupied with their own affairs just now, they will criticise closely, and close criticism of the French expeditions now on hand cannot be honestly made favourable. The English, for the moment at all events, are disposed to regard conquest as immoral, and if ever expeditions had conquest for object they are those despatched against Madagascar and Tonquin. As against the Malagasy, the French have simply no case at all. They say they are not allowed to hold land in Madagascar, but they are no more banished than other people, and great States do not invade to secure privileges of that sort. They are, too, obviously seeking much more than a change in internal law. They are asking a protectorate over half the island, and a dominant influence in the remainder, and between a French Protectorate and annexation there is only this difference,—that under the former word a Commissioner reigns much more absolutely than a Governor would dare to do. In Tonquin the pretext is a little better, for a petty war has been simmering for some years, there is a Treaty alleged to have been broken, and a French garrison has suffered a reverse, but the French Government in this instance make little concealment of their intentions. They demand in so many words the right to hold Tonquin by means of fortified places, the right to collect the whole revenue and assign it as they please, and the right to "protect," that is, to govern through a native Prince, the whole kingdom of Anam. The English think this cynical, as it is, and being accustomed to study Asiatic expeditions, they think it foolish besides. They do not question that if France likes to use 30,000 men in the work, she can conquer Madagascar and Tonquin; they only say the work will be serious, and far beyond anything the French people have been led to expect. To dictate terms to the Hovas, a French General must reach the capital by marching 300 miles through a country of which 120 miles is a swampy, malarious forest, must overthrow 70,000 brave barbarians, of whom 20,000 are, for Africans, good soldiers, and must hold a line of positions not more than 30 miles apart. To do this, with full hospitals and all stores to be sent by sea, will take 15,000 men and a large expenditure; and the Chamber will be loth to spare the money, and indignant at being asked for the troops. In Tonquin, the business will be much more serious. As we read the recent intelligence, the Anamese have found allies, and the attack on the Citadel of Hanoi, which is proceeding so disastrously for the French, is being carried on by foes very different from the peoples of the Cochin-Chinese Delta. The King of Anam has enlisted the fighting Mountaineers, and has received from China a few well-armed soldiers, who will fight under his banner and in his name. That, in fact, is the characteristic policy which the Chinese have adopted. The Government of Peking, though determined, is at once cautious and slow. So long as it can avoid that extreme measure it will not declare war on France, but will aid its vassal with troops, who are being rapidly collected in the neighbouring provinces. These troops will swarm down to Hue and Tonquin, and fight as Anamese; and the French, when they land the inadequate reinforcements they are sending, will find themselves opposed by some 30,000 men, well armed, fairly disciplined, and full of confidence in their leaders. The Chinese know the country, they will be assisted by the natives, and they can live in positions in which Frenchmen would perish wholesale of disease. That they will defeat the French in pitched battles is improbable, but they will waste them, and waste them continuously, in the morasses and forests, till the French Government will find that for a serious advance an army with reserves is indispensable. It will take 15,000 men, at least, to hold Tonquin, even if China does not openly declare war; and the moment no other course remains, China will declare war, and use her Fleet, now formidable in shallow waters. To talk of this expedition as insignificant, or to limit its cost to a quarter of a million, is trifling with the country. The French have embarked upon an expedition as serious as the invasion of Afghanistan, and are likely to reap from it just as little profit.

At the same time, while it is clear these things must be said, if the English are to speak honestly at all, there is one excuse to be made for the French journalists. They note much more carefully than Englishmen do the utterances of a few among us who criticise them not for their own sake, or for the sake of truth, but from a belief that these expeditions seriously threaten English interests. There are men among us, some of them in good positions, who are anxious that England should interfere even with menaces, who believe English interests distinctly threatened by the French expeditions, and who conjure up visions of danger to India and danger to British commerce as readily as if the French were Russians. This tone is most unwise, and should be censured by every politician of experience. Hardly anything France could do in the way of Colonial enterprise would inflict so much injury on Great Britain as a quarrel between the two nations, even if it were kept within the limit of tart despatches. We should instantly be compelled to "watch France," that is, should lose our present freedom in every quarter of the world, and be hampered by endless intrigue in every Eastern Court. A revolution in Paris would mean positive danger for us, and every reinforcement sent to a French squadron would be a reason for a similar addition to our own Fleet. The expeditions on hand neither threaten us nor concern us, except so far as we regret to see France frittering away her strength in immoral or sterile enterprises. We are not bound to prevent all wars of aggression because they are unjust, nor are the Hovas or the Tonquinese specially deserving of sympathy by reason of their civilisation or their weakness. The Hovas can fight for themselves very well, and we venture to predict that they will not, in the end, be conquered. The Tonquinese, on the other hand, have protectors as efficient as we could be, so efficient that the French are rash in arousing their hostility for so inadequate an object. Fighting China in Indo-China, that is, on a spot where no final blow can be delivered, is fighting a great Power. The argument as to our geographical interests is almost puerile. It is said that if France held Madagascar in force, she could stop our commerce or its way to India. So she can now, much more easily, by sending her ships into the Channel. We are not, we presume, about to recommence the old system of peace to the west and war to the east of the Cape, and if we are not, the seizure of a British vessel off the Cape would be answered in the Channel and the Mediterranean, not in Africa. France would lose Algeria, not the Sakalava country, as Lord Palmerston pointed out, when Count Walewski, in a moment of arrogance, ventured to talk of war. As to the masters of Tonquin conquering all Indo-China, and threatening India, it is worse than the talk about Russia in Afghanistan. It will take the French half a century to build up an effective Power in Indo-China, and when they have done it, the new "Empire" would be absolutely at the mercy of Great Britain, which by a few words at Peking could press the dependency from both sides. The Deputy for Cochin China may gasconade about French destiny in Asia, but it will be time enough to fidget when the French threaten Siam, which, with a few decent officers, could make a stout defence; and even if Bangkok were French, India would not be endangered. To attack her by sea would be difficult enough, but to attack her in British Burmah by land, through that wilderness of jungle and swamp and mountain, all infested with miasma, is an enterprise from which the wildest of French Generals would shrink. To read some of the letters written and speeches made, one would think that the whole course of French history in Asia, and indeed in all the colonial enterprises of France, had been forgotten. That history has been almost unbroken. France has every now and then commenced a great enterprise, has achieved a first success, has met unexpected difficulties, and has abandoned openly or secretly its further prosecution, throwing over her agents with reckless ingratitude as persons who have failed. To quarrel with France because she may at some future time secure a great dependency in Indo-China which, at a farther future time, may be used against India, is like quarrelling with a child because he may when a man propagate effectively dangerous ideas. Prophetic statesmanship of that kind always fails, and it is only to the prophetic eye that this expedition to Tonquin can appear dangerous. Of course, if France quarrels with China and tries to blockade her ports, England would be injured, though not half so much as she was injured by the blockade of the Southern States; but the blockade will injure all Europe, and can be dealt with by all Europe, when the time arrives. Meanwhile, the true position for English politicians is to regret the action of France, chiefly because it is bad for the world that France should lose more influence in Europe by frittering away her strength on expeditions almost certain to prove sterile. If M. Challemel-Lacour thinks the annoyance of the English in itself a sign of hostility, what does he think of the delight of the Berliners? They are not angry because France is going to invade Tonquin, and probably quarrel with Peking, but quite rejoiced, seeing clearly enough that every soldier and every pound expended east of Suez is just now a loss to France.

THE QUEEN'S SONS.

WE congratulate Baron de Worms. Like Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Sir Drummond Wolff, and others of that type, he is always trying to draw attention to himself, and this week he has succeeded. His rather impudent attempt to patronise, or, to use official slang, to "protect" the Duke of Albany, raises a question of considerable social interest and great political importance, and Baron de Worms will be talked of in all London Clubs. The Member for Greenwich has heard, and according to the Daily News has heard accurately, that the Agent-General for Canada, presumably under some authority from his Government, asked the Duke of Albany to accept the Viceroyalty of the Dominion; that his Royal Highness was favourable to the project, and that it broke down through the reluctance of the Ministry to agree to the nomination. Baron de Worms sees in that account a means of making Mr. Gladstone appear to have refused a Royal request—which, in the eyes of the nouveaux riches and of all suburban respectability, is worse than blasphemy—and he is accordingly, on Monday, to ask the Premier whether he has seen the statement, and whether it is true. If it is not true the matter drops, and Baron de Worms will have the satisfaction of feeling that he tried to do a service to the Royal Family not likely to be forgotten; while if, as we rather presume, it is true, a discussion may be raised as to the manner in which the Liberals, "out of secret dislike to the Monarchy, have thrown away a grand opportunity of conciliating all Conservative and Imperial instincts in Canada." The stroke would really have been very clever in Baron de Worms, if the ten-pounders had been ruling, and though, under household suffrage, it will probably cost him his seat, there are others, say, Kidderminster, in which an Austrian Baron will be a most acceptable candidate.

If the Ministry have refused to make the Duke of Albany Viceroy of Canada, they have done a public service, all the more to be noted by the electors because there is no personal objection to Prince Leopold. He is the most thoughtful and cultivated of his House, he would understand his rather anomalous position as the moderator of an avowed democracy, and he possesses the power of adequate expression, which Royal personages, trained as they are to a sort of mental stammer, are so apt to lack. Were he a little older, he would not, as far as he himself is concerned, make a bad Viceroy; but even were he fifty, and abler even than he is, he would be a most injudicious selection. The appointment would establish a precedent which could do nothing but mischief. No son of the Queen, however able, could, in the nature of things, make a good British Viceroy. The secret of British management in the great Colonies, and in a less degree in India, is that the Viceroy, or Governor, or Commissioner is an Ambassador; that he represents in an effective way the Central Government, and that he responds easily, quickly, and with untiring tact to any hint from home. To be certain of complete hold on him, to be sure that he will feel censure and desire reward, is of the last importance, not only to this or that Government, but to the Imperial system. A Governor who is self-willed is a nuisance, but a Governor who is too strong for his place may be a calamity. A Prince is always too strong for his place. Half our Military troubles proceed from the difficulty a Cabinet feels in snubbing or removing the Duke of Cambridge as it would snub or remove any non-Royal Field-Marshal, and a Prince as Viceroy would be stronger even than Prince George. He would not be so well known to the electors at home, would be more easily defended in Parliament, and would be much less afraid of comments in the newspapers. We have, as it is, to choose War Ministers because they have backbone, but backbone never can be put into the Colonial Office, which feels always that it has endless enemies and few defenders. It would be nearly impossible to control a Royal Viceroy, and in Canada, in India, or, worst of all, in Ireland, he might do irreparable mischief, before the Queen would consent to the affront to her family involved in his recall. Indeed, we need not take Canada, with its relations to the great and sensitive Republic, or India, with its wars always visible in the horizon, or Ireland, with its sources of political despair, as illustrations. A much smaller example will suffice a great deal better. Imagine a Prince, and worst of all, a Prince with an ambition to do something creditable in the world, in the position of Sir Bartle Frere in South Africa. It was difficult enough to remove that rhetorical Anglo-Indian, with his undying favour in high quarters; but if the Prince had been in his place, his removal would have been impossible, the Transvaal would have been subjugated, and the British flag would have been flying up to the banks of the Zambesi. So much the better, Tories may say, with their simple belief that Englishmen, if only of the caste, could govern the world without soldiers, and we may, to save trouble, grant their proposition; but then, that is not the country's will. Our contention is not that a Prince cannot govern—he may be perfectly well able to govern, though, happily for us all, that has not happened among the German branch of the Stuarts who have presided over us so well—but that the country has the right to govern, and intends to govern, and cannot govern him. The Prince, brain for brain, is probably just as qualified as Lord Lansdowne, and might be more so; but the necessary qualification for such a position is not only fitness, but amenability to a control without which the Empire would go to pieces. It would die of the constant jar between its own aspirations and those of its lieutenants. Baron de Worms would be furious, if compelled to appoint agents who did not fear him, to whom he could offer no promotion, and who considered hints impertinencies; but that is the precise position in which he thinks it discreet and even advantageous to place the Government of the United Kingdom. The experiment is too dangerous for modern statesmen.

But, we shall be told, in appointing the Queen's Sons to Vice-royalties, we are doing our best to reconcile colonists to the British system, to spread among them a liking for Courts, and to diffuse a tolerance for that organisation of social disparities which, for good or evil, has so long been established in England, and which, if it has impaired many virtues, has not been inconsistent with success in the world. That, no doubt, was the idea by which Lord Beaconsfield would have defended his avowed, though inchoate project of planting the Queen's sons about everywhere as Viceroys; and he may have believed in it, for he was capable of believing anything into which the notion of pedigree could enter. Baron de Worms, for what we know, may believe it, too. We are conscious of a certain irritation at seeing these German "Barons," strong in their wealth and in the favour of their great tribe, trying to interfere in our national politics, and it may be we are unjust to the convictions of the Member for Greenwich. But his possible sincerity on the social side of his mind makes no difference. The potting-out of Princes in Colonial gardens, however scientifically done, will not alter the character of the soil. Emigrant Englishmen are Republicans at heart, and in trying to set up mock Courts, and an aristocracy with no roots in history, we do but foster that radical difference of sentiment which, sooner or later, produces separation. Colonists love a Lord and worship a Prince, and when their wives are ordered to wear low dresses and long trains in order to be "received," defiantly disobey. The sentiment of courtiership, the true bend in the back, is not in them. It would be as sensible to expect to "foster" Colonial Establishments, with Bishops in the Legislatures, or to order a Colony to be divided into what Sir Rainald Knightley considers the "natural divisions of the soil." The man who thinks that the Dominion of Canada will some day become a kingdom, and the great landowners Prairie Peers, knows nothing of history, and very little indeed of emigrant human nature. It is not only Englishmen who reject Monarchy beyond seas. Spaniards are not democrats by instinct, but, after eighty years of Republican failures, what Spanish-American dreams of summoning Bourbon cadets to reign over him? The Mexicans shot a King as competent personally as a people are likely to find. If Prince Leopold were appointed Viceroy, the only result would be that he would be the target for every Irish dynamiteur, that the Queen's heart would be broken with suspense and anxiety, and that the confidence which Viceroys should feel while honestly doing their work would be irretrievably destroyed. Nor, for on such a subject concealment is unworthy, if Lord Beaconsfield's idea were as sound as we believe it to be unsound, should we admit that a Liberal Ministry would be in the right in appropriating it. It is not the business of the British Government to plant the British social system in all its Colonies. That system is historical here, and, therefore, endurable—or, if Tories please, excellent—and certainly is approved by the people; but it is not a good one in itself, and but for tradition it would not last. Millions of workers, guided by some ten thousand wealthy, and reigned over, if not governed, by a single family, is not a social ideal which it is at any hazard our duty to diffuse. And that it is a hazard, is unquestionable. Once appoint an excellent and thoughtful young Prince, because he is a Prince, to be Viceroy of Canada or Australia, and some day we may find it impossible to resist the nomination of a Duke of Cumberland, or a Frederic, Prince of Wales.

THE PLAGUE OF QUESTIONS.

THERE are many ways of wasting time in the House of Commons, but all but one are imperfect in this or that particular. They require some degree of concert on the part of those who resort to them, and concert is troublesome to arrange, and apt to fall through when arranged. A man will not be at the trouble of employing them, except when some obvious party advantage is to be gained, and this is not a condition that can be satisfied every day. Or they conflict with the New Rules of Procedure, and then a Member who has come down with the best intentions of hindering the despatch of business, may see his plans hopelessly upset by the intervention of the Speaker or the Chairman of Committees. The supereminent way we have in view has none of these faults. It is in the power of every single Member to ask a question, and before doing so he need take counsel with no one but himself. Then, a question makes so small a demand on the time or the energy, that the busiest or the most indolent man may put half a dozen in succession, without being either hurried or wearied. In this respect the New Rules have made no change whatever. The Closure may put an end to a debate, the power of moving adjournments may be used up; but the sacred right of asking the noble lord or the right honourable gentleman the question number so-and-so, "that stands in my name," still exists unchallenged. Besides this immunity from the defects which belong to other modes of wasting Parliamentary time, Questioning has two specific advantages of its own. One is, that it is peculiar to no party. When a Liberal Government is in power, Liberals feel as free to question it as Conservatives. When a Conservative Government is in power, Conservatives sin quite as much in this way as Liberals. The privilege is too precious to be waived, on any consideration. Private Members will give up their Tuesdays and Fridays, or even their still more precious Wednesdays; but we doubt whether, if the fate of a Ministry depended on it, a single Member would be found to withdraw his own special question from the Notice-paper. He would say, not always truly, that that one question need not take two minutes to answer. The other advantage is that it is the cheapest possible method of obtaining notoriety. There are many Members who would be only mocked if they were told to bring in a Bill, or to draft a resolution, or even to make a speech. They have neither the ability nor the courage to take the advice, if it were given to them; and if they had both, it would depend on a hundred chances whether the opportunity of displaying them would ever arrive. They must be lucky in the ballot. They must be men of importance, and get "a day" from the Prime Minister. They must have influence with the Whips, and so catch the Speaker's eye beforehand. But they can all ask a question, and they have nothing to do but to give notice in order to secure an indefeasible right to ask it. More than this, the reward is out of all proportion to the labour. Now that Reporting is rapidly becoming a lost art, and long speeches are ruthlessly cut down to an inch or two of type, a question may look as imposing the next morning as if to put it had taken half-an-hour. As regards a man's constituents, it may even be better than a speech, because a speech is necessarily compared with others in the same debate; whereas the questioner has the field to himself, and the subject of a question may be full of local interest, while the subject of a debate may only concern the nation at large. Put all these things together, and the moderation of the House of Commons will be seen to be something extraordinary. Why should Members be content with two hours in an evening, when they might take up four, or six? Why should sixty or a hundred questions be asked, when five hundred would not be a question apiece? It is no wonder that the practice grows; the wonder is that it has not grown much faster.

Yet, though it is perfectly easy to explain how and why Questioning has come to take up more and more of the time of the House of Commons, it does not the less constitute a serious and mischievous abuse. The House of Commons, as we have repeatedly been told, has in practice a limited number of days in which to get through the work of the Session. For one reason or another, a day is constantly subtracted from this series. Sometimes the House is counted out. Sometimes a question of little or no public interest receives an amount of attention altogether out of proportion to its real importance. Sometimes an open effort is made to prevent business from being done. But what, after all, is the loss of a Parliamentary day, which at most yields from eight to ten hours, compared with the steady loss of from one to three hours every day that the House sits? Something like an eighth of the time of the House of Commons—one whole Session in every eight—is, under the present system, almost wholly wasted. There are exceptions, of course, to the rule,—questions that relate to subjects of genuine moment, or that draw from a Minister information of real value. But as regards the majority of the questions, no human being is the better for their being answered, or would be the worse if they had never been asked. They minister to nothing in the world but individual vanity. They have their beginning and their end, their first origin and their final cause, in the self-esteem of the men who ask them.

This being so, it becomes a very urgent matter how some order can be introduced into this chaos. That Questioning cannot be abolished will be admitted by the most ardent reformers of Procedure. It sometimes supplies a very valuable means of bringing a Government to book, or of gaining official information. The thing to be aimed at, then, is not suppression, but regulation; not to prevent Members from asking questions that deserve the asking, but to ensure that as few as possible that do not deserve it shall take up time which might so easily be turned to better account. One way of doing this would be to limit the right of question in the case of ordinary Members to Tuesdays and Fridays. This would have two good results. Though questioning would still encroach on the time of the House of Commons, it would encroach on the less valuable part of it; and so far as needless questioning is part of a system of designed obstruction, it would make it almost useless. Hours might be lost on these two nights, but they would not be deducted from the aggregate devoted to those Government measures which more and more constitute the serious business of the Legislature. Any loss that the public might suffer from the prohibition of questions on Mondays and Thursdays would be entirely prevented, if the right of putting questions were retained in its integrity for all Members who are Privy Councillors. Thus the Front Opposition Bench would be wholly unaffected by the restriction, and this would enable a sufficient number of independent Members to ensure that a question which ought, in the public interest, to be put on a Monday, shall not be kept back for twenty-four hours. With this exception, however, it would be possible to go a good deal further in the way of restriction. Why should not notice of questions be privately given to the Minister to whom they are addressed, and then the answers be printed in the votes, with the questions? The information would thus be obtained every day, just as it is now; but it would be obtained with no sacrifice of Parliamentary time. If the answer were really unsatisfactory, the questioner would have no difficulty in getting some Privy Councillor belonging to his party to repeat the question in the House. But ordinarily, every purpose would be answered by an inspection of the notice-paper. Nobody would be the worse for the change, except the men who see in asking questions the one means by which they can hope to become famous.

THE CORONATION AT MOSCOW.

THE note of Asiatic Immoderateness of which we spoke last week, ran through the Coronation ceremonial at Moscow to the last, and even infected the service in the Cathedral. We should have thought that difficult, men seldom straining themselves to be or to look gigantic when bending before an Almighty throne, especially when they are sincere believers; but even in the religious service the genius of the Russian Court—which, we may remark, is genuine, and not artificial, and represents truly a characteristic want of limit in the people—remained true to itself. The desire to separate the Czar from ordinary humanity, to give him, as it were, some separate and higher relation to the Creator, to which ordinary man may not aspire, was perceptible in a hundred details, two at least of which must, we think, be without parallel in Christian worship. That the Czar should crown himself, just when the course of the symbolical ceremonies seems to demand that the representatives of the Church should crown him, is not out of keeping with Russian history, or with the separate position which, since the time of Peter the Great, the Czars have always assumed in religious affairs, a position which has in it an assumption of an authority above that of the Church itself. It has, too, many precedents. Napoleon crowned himself, and so always does, we believe, the King of Prussia, each trying, we may suppose, to indicate either that his power is self-derived, or that even in a Church there is nothing between himself and God. That the Czar should crown the Czarina is en règle, the idea being that she derives everything save her consecration from her husband, and her prostration before him, kneeling as in worship, though outrageous to Western notions, is not inconsistent either with Russian ideas of marriage, or with the Court forms which Moscow has inherited from Byzantium. The anointing, of course, though most elaborate in Russia, lingers in all European coronations, and is possibly of older origin even than Judaism. But that scene of the whole audience and the entire priesthood suddenly kneeling in the Cathedral to supplicate God for the Czar, while the Czar himself remained standing upright, as if, in the presence of that universal prayer, he had no need to supplicate for himself, as if even before God he could remain erect, must be absolutely unique. It is said to be an etiquette intended to distinguish between the supplicants and the subject of supplication, but no such etiquette would be sanctioned for other than the Czar, and its object must be a separateness still more strangely indicated soon after. The Greek Church, like the Roman Catholic Church, grants to the laity Communion only in one kind, reserving the cup most carefully to the priesthood alone. It would be sacrilege to break the rule under any pressure, but it is broken for the Czar, who, from the moment of his coronation, as a consecrated being, a layman, yet religiously apart from all the lay world, receives the Communion in both kinds, a distinction the more surprising because, though the Church obeys him as Patriarch, and the Patriarchal Chair is never filled, the Greek Church has never recognised, save in this mystical privilege, that the Sovereign is in any way priest. The object clearly is to attribute to the Czar, no doubt after consecration, a sacredness in the strict and even technical sense in which Churches use the word, beyond that of any other of mankind. Even his wife, though she also is consecrated with the holy oil, is refused the cup; and it would not, we conceive, be granted to any other Sovereign who might chance to be received into the Greek Church. It is the unique privilege of the Czars, and must originally have been one of the many efforts visible in this ceremonial to mark the Czar off from mankind in the eyes of his subjects as invested with quasi-supernatural attributes, and above even the religious law which levels all other laymen in an indistinguishable equality. It is as if in England the Sovereign, once consecrated, could by the Anglican theory administer the Communion, or ordain by fiat. There is nothing that we can recall in the least like this in any Christian ceremonial, or indeed, with the possible exception of the reception of the Grand Lama, who is not only priest, but deity incarnate, in any ceremonial whatever. The Khalif is as subject to the Mussulman Holy Law, in theory, as the meanest Moslem, as, indeed, was the Prophet he represents; and the Emperor of China, though as Father of the people he receives "worship" from his subjects, as does also every Chinese father from every Chinese son, is in no way released from the burden of performing all rites, but rather, as the representative man of China before the altar, is more bound to perform them all.

There is something un-Christian, almost unholy, in this deliberate effort to exalt a man above humanity, something which an old Greek would have thought a wilful affront to the Gods; and one can hardly avoid speculation as to what the Czar thinks of it all himself. How far does he believe what his Church and his people, and even his enemies, conspire to press upon him as true? He can hardly believe it all, knowing himself and his own weaknesses; but how much does he believe? More than other Kings? The records of all Courts, and especially the secret records, seem to show that no Sovereign quite escapes the notion of a separateness residing in himself, of a special relation to God, "in whose hand are the hearts of Kings," of something in him and his personal destiny which is not in other men; and how this must be exaggerated in the case of the Czar! His will is executive through two continents. He is released from law. He is, by the consent of his Church, in some sense Priest, as well as King, and in reality the most powerful of all priests. He is not only master, but consecrated to masterdom. The Archbishop of Novogorod comes from his distant diocese to tell him, in the sight of the representatives of mankind, that "Russia lies before thee," and it is all so true. It is impossible, human vanity and the influence of power and the weight of tradition on the mind being all taken into account, but that the Czar must believe some of it, must think of himself as in some way separate from his kind, and entitled as of right from above to his unrestrained authority. Thousands of priests, in all ages and of all creeds, have believed that of themselves sincerely, and why should not a King also in all sincerity believe it of himself? If he does, in any degree, however slight, how it must accentuate the natural resentment against rebellion, the natural readiness to believe himself justified in demanding obedience, the natural reluctance to surrender any power, and especially any of that free power unhampered by advice or sanction which seems to all men so much the truest power? We can hardly wonder, amidst such a worshipping world, if a Czar looks on a demand for a Constitution as tainted with something of iniquity, and this even if he should grant it; as if rebels were declaring against Heaven, and asking God's Vicegerent to obey man also, and more humbly. The sense of the duty of retaining authority felt by all who legally possess it, must rise strong in the heart of a Czar, till it becomes almost as impossible for him to yield it up as for a good man deliberately to do wrong, yet not suffer. And how the loneliness which is the curse of Kings, the sense of profound inequality between himself and other men, must be increased in a Czar, till the only true relation of mankind to him must seem that of service. There is danger of lunacy in that loneliness, and in the pride it feeds, the lunacy which, as De Quincey thought, beset the early Cæsars—the later men had to struggle for their power—and which has so often, though in milder forms and with more of melancholy, reappeared among the Czars.

For the rest, the festival in Moscow, unique in so many ways among ceremonials, seems to us greatly marred by the privacy which surrounded the central or crowning ceremonial. The chapel, rather than cathedral, in which it was all conducted, in which Princes, and Bishops, and Ambassadors, laden with gold cloth and heavy silks and the insignia of Orders, were packed till motion was impossible and standing-room difficult to maintain; the services drawn out till strong men grew faint with weariness and standing; the thin light barely struggling into the building; the overwhelming masses of images, ornaments, paintings, gilding, jewels, all leave on us, watching so far off, an impression of stuffy magnificence, splendour got up to order and overdone, which, in its immoderateness, does not impress. The open air would have been a fitter scene, or that cathedral which Alexander I., after much hesitation, refused to sanction, and which, had it been completed, would have been, of all Russian structures, the one most characteristic of the people and the land. A rocky hill outside Moscow was to have been eviscerated, and turned into a chancel; while a circle of gigantic monoliths, treble the height of those of Stonehenge, closed in the plain into a vast church, within which a hundred thousand men could stand, with the sky for adequately lofty roof. The Czar, to make the scene complete, should have been seen, as he sat in such a basilica, in his gold robe and diamond crown and sceptre of jewels, by the millions of his subjects, as the gods of India are seen when they are wheeled with slow jerks to the terrace of some pagoda for the adoration of multitudes.

THIN PESSIMISM.

MR. HENRY JAMES, Junior, in his very interesting paper on "The Correspondence between Carlyle and Emerson," published in the June number of the Century, remarks that Emerson was by nature an optimist, with a high and noble conception of good, but without any definite conception of evil; while Carlyle was a pessimist of pessimists, with a vivid conception of evil, but no corresponding perception of good. Further, he remarks that Emerson's genius, like the genius of the whole of the New-England literature of his day, had "a singular thinness, an almost touching lightness, sparseness, transparency, about it;" while Carlyle's was full of the dense, warm life of his London atmosphere. Emerson's mind was full of ghostly hopefulness, Carlyle's of passionate and wrathful despondency. "No one," says Mr. Henry James, "maintained a more hospitable attitude than Emerson towards anything that any one might have to say. There was no presumption against even the humblest, and the ear of the universe was open to any articulate voice. In this respect, the opposition to Carlyle was complete. The great Scotchman thought all talk a jabbering of apes, whereas Emerson, who was the perfection of a listener, stood always in a position of hopeful expectancy, and regarded each delivery of a personal view as a new fact to be estimated on its merits." Mr. Henry James regards both the eminent correspondents as eccentric to the verge of madness, Emerson in a gentle fashion, with a mild and moonlight madness of his own; Carlyle with a moody madness as exemplified in the fierce and violent gesticulations with which he made his mock at the universe, and flouted "the Dead-sea apes" of whom he conceived the human race to consist. Mr. Henry James himself evidently stands between the two men. He is struck by the whimsical spectacle of Emerson's transcendental hopefulness and optimism. It amuses him to think that so clear-minded and painstaking a man should have been so sanguine and so deferential to the fellow-creatures with whom he lived. On the other hand, Carlyle's convulsive agony under the spectacle of human folly and misdoing seems to him profoundly irrational. If all the world is out of joint, what is the good of trying to set the innumerable dislocations of limb? "Pessimism, cynicism," says Mr. Henry James, "usually imply a certain amount of indifference and resignation, but in Carlyle these forces were nothing if not querulous and vocal." "Other persons have enjoyed life as little as Carlyle, other men have been pessimists and cynics; but few men have rioted so in their disenchantments, or thumped so perpetually on the hollowness of things, with the view of making it resound." Mr. Henry James hardly knows which of the two makes him smile most, Emerson's mild and urbane infatuation of hope, or Carlyle's fury of despair. One can well understand his embarrassment. All his own works breathe, not Emerson's thin optimism, nor Carlyle's murky and chaotic pessimism, but, on the contrary, a thin pessimism of his own, as mild, quiet, and observant as Emerson's optimism, but as free from anything like satisfaction in what he observes as Carlyle's pessimism. He does not toss his arms about, and fret or fume, like the imprisoned Scotch Titan under his pile of mountains,—that would only be consistent, he thinks, with some substantial hope of making the world the better for these gigantic struggles,—but he combines the twilight calm of Emerson's impossibility with the "current contempt," as he calls it, of Carlyle's attitude towards the universe in which he lived.

What Mr. Henry James would regard as the most defensible attitude towards the universe is a smiling acquiescence in the shallowness and poverty of things, from which nothing short of Emerson's moon-struck exaltation could expect infinite good; while to wrestle furiously and wildly with its evil seems to him, no doubt, to imply a great deal more bottom of belief than is consistent with the "Dead-sea ape" view of human life and action. The genuine optimist must be gifted with a singular reticence and self-distrust, if he does not fling himself into the most conspicuous movements of his day, if he does not adore the Zeit-geist as a sort of divine oracle. The genuine pessimist must be overborne by a singular sense of fatality, if he takes any very great trouble to row against a stream which he believes to be irresistible. But what can be more suitable than for a pessimist who is a pessimist in truth, to be quiet and acquiescent, to smile, when it is possible, at the inevitable mishaps which overtake men, and to dry his tears as soon as may be when smiling is not possible; to offer no vain resistance to the confusion in which he sees human affairs more and more inextricably involved, but to avail himself of every little opportunity of saving what may be saved from the abyss, and to ignore, as far as possible, the cries of helplessness and terror proceeding from the various wrecks which sink into it. This, or something like this, we should gather from Mr. Henry James's various books, is the attitude which he would take, in preference to either the thin optimism of Emerson, or the yeasty fury of Carlyle; for he cannot really understand either the modest infatuation of hope with which Emerson watches for the oracles that he cannot himself hear, or the convulsive wrath with which Carlyle rages against the Destinies which he himself recognises as wholly uncontrolled and uncontrollable, when he declares God's creatures to be mostly fools or Dead-sea apes, for whom he finds no salvation in their theoretically divine origin. Mr. James blames Emerson for being deficient in the salt of "current contempt" for the manifest tendencies about him. He blames Carlyle for sighing after "so crude an occurrence" as the return of Oliver Cromwell's Ironsides to authority in any modern realm. 'Despise the present, and hope nothing from the future, but, above all, don't hanker after the past,' appears to be the sort of attitude of mind which Mr. Henry James would inculcate in the reader alike of his novels and his criticisms. 'The world is getting into a hopeless tangle,' he seems to say, 'but at least you cannot use the old-world shears to divide the threads. Probably the tangle cannot be disentangled at all, but whether it can or cannot, it is but a mad aspiration to yearn after anachronisms in the hope of severing the knot.' With the equanimity of Emerson, Mr. James would combine a good deal of the pessimism of Carlyle, and blend the two into a principle of calm acquiescence even in a destiny that merits little except to be seasoned with what he calls "the salt of current contempt."

We believe that the fierce pessimism of Carlyle, the thin optimism of Emerson, and the thin pessimism of Mr. Henry James, represent in a descending scale the creed inherited from the old Puritanism, as it comes out after the dropping of all faith in revelation. Carlyle's Puritanism was not quite emptied of all its faith. It is perfectly true that he was, as we may say, always virtually quarrelling with God, finding fault with him, just as Mr. Ruskin also does, for not having created a very different being from man; finding fault with him for making man so disposed as he is to fall into mechanical habits; to vegetate with but a small share of spiritual life; to drone out the thoughts of his ancestors instead of thinking fresh thoughts for himself; to interest himself so much in commerce, and to attach so much importance as modern man does to what he calls freedom. Against all these conditions, concerning which Carlyle knew as well as any one that they arise from the constitution of human nature, and not from any abuse of human nature, he raged as if he were raging against mere mendacity and wickedness, and, indeed, was never weary of calling all language that did not please him "jabber," and all laws and constitutional customs that did not please him mere formulas. But, with all this fury against the constitution of the universe, Carlyle had at heart a belief that honest and true men might find power in God to alter things for the better, and this was the one living ember of the old Puritanism which still burnt vividly in his mind. Emerson snatched eagerly at Carlyle's transcendentalism, which was in Carlyle rather the product of his wonderfully vivid imagination than due to any deep intellectual conviction, but at once separated it from Carlyle's belief that God forms true heroes, and does not care for the "dim, common populations," except so far as they can be stirred by true heroes into giving them a loyal and passionate support; and in Emerson's hands, this transcendentalism became, as he himself remarked, a mild optimism, that was disposed to accept almost anything as divine, and to treat almost all ills, physical, spiritual, or moral, with an almost ignoble patience,—the one exception being in Emerson's case the evil which seemed to Carlyle almost a positive good, slavery. For the rest, Carlyle's deep belief that in some true sense God does bring to naught all insincerities and consumes them with his wrath, hardly reappears in Emerson at all, who regards the great source of life as too sublime for any share in the passions of the prophet. Practically, Emerson's transcendental optimism, which shows little sympathy with Carlyle's view of God as a God of battles, was, we think, a very inferior form of Puritanism even to Carlyle's,—a form which held fast to the purity of Puritanism, but not to its internecine war with evil. No doubt, it took up the divine benevolence which Carlyle almost rejected, but it dropped altogether that potent belief in the spiritual interventions of God in human affairs, which gave to the old Puritanism all its power,—a power which can never long survive the faith in divine revelation, but which did survive that faith in Carlyle. In Mr. Henry James's view of life, if we may trust his melancholy though wonderfully subtle novels, and the hints thrown out in this delicate criticism, we have the lowest form of the rapidly dwindling Puritanic faith, a thin sort of pessimism which recognises the taint in human things without recognising any divine remedy for that taint, which believes in no real power to fight against the inevitable evolution of things, which believes in nothing, indeed, except the importance of critical lucidity in contemplating the facts of life, and in the mild despondency which that contemplation is apt to inspire. He likes Emerson's tranquillity, but he would base it on a gentle pessimism rather than a gentle optimism. Optimism might lead to enthusiasm, pessimism never can; and yet pessimism, unless it is profound enough to make the world unendurable, and an exit from the world imperative, ought to extinguish the fiercer passions. If evil, and especially a growing confusion of evil, is inevitable, a spirit of toleration, and of ever-growing toleration, is necessary, too. You cannot train yourself too soon to be amused with the evils which no one can uproot. Adapt your eye, then, to the twilight; learn to smile at that which it is useless, and therefore unbecoming, to storm at; teach yourself to look for nothing excellent, but to recognise that which is not excellent,—which is, indeed, even less and less excellent, as probably our lot in life. Such is, we should say, Mr. Henry James's inner creed. Such, at least, is the temper of his many delicately painted pictures of life, and of his criticism of the two great men whose correspondence he so well describes. 'Most life is superficial, all life is a tangle; nothing, then, should put us out; but it is an intellectual duty to expect little, and not to fret, even when we get less than we expect.' The duty of lucid observation and of a low tone of expectation, is almost the only duty which, so far as we can see, Mr. Henry James thoroughly and universally approves. A sadder remnant of the old Puritanism it is not easy to conceive.

ORGANISED CHARITY IN SWITZERLAND.

THE Charity Organisation Society has given expression to a sense of dissatisfaction with the desultory, haphazard character of our benevolence, which had long been a growing one in many minds. But it is somewhat humiliating to us Englishmen, who boast of being practical, to find that what we have only been talking about, and trying to do, within the last few years, has been actually done in a Swiss city for more than a century. There has been no talk about charity organisation in Bâle, but since the year 1777, the Canton has possessed a Society (Gesellschaft zur Beförderung der Guten und Gemeinnützigen), established on so simple and broad a basis as to afford room for the organic development of every form of benevolence, so that at the present day (or at least at the end of 1881) it can provide at once for forty-five different objects, which in practical England would have required forty-five offices, forty-five paid secretaries, forty-five separate subscription lists, and forty-five separately published yearly reports. It has over 1,700 members, over £8,000 funds, and an income of over £3,000. Its objects include the improvement of the dwellings of the labouring class, public eating-rooms, baths and washhouses (including men's and women's swimming-baths), athletics, a skating-rink, public lectures, Sunday schools for girls, choral singing, various libraries, kindergarten, infant schools, drawing and modelling schools, music schools, sewing schools, assistance of various kinds to clever or to poor scholars, provision for orphans, the maintenance of apprentices, help to discharged prisoners, the care of young deaf mutes, the protection of the insane, the prevention of cruelty to animals, the embellishment of the environs of Bâle, a savings-bank, sick, and burial societies, an asylum for the aged, the furtherance of domestic industry, the providing of appliances for the relief of the sick, the maintenance of the city museum of natural history and of its mediæval collection. The machinery of the Society consists, besides a Directorate (Vorstand) of nine persons, for the most part of separate Committees for the several objects, ranging from three to seventeen members; in other cases, where particular undertakings have passed out of the hands of the Society, or are simply contributed to by it, of from one to four delegates for each of such. In one or two cases, companies or societies which have sprung out of it report directly to it. For it has repeatedly happened in the history of the Society that it has served as pioneer to the State, and has seen objects taken up as of public obligation which it had originally sought to compass by private effort; whilst in other cases, the work which it has initiated has either so developed itself as to require an organisation of its own, or from its costliness has required this from the first. Hence, its forty-five present objects represent nearly seventy which it has had in all, although new ones are frequently added, in place of those which have passed out of its hands. In a few cases, indeed, it has had simply to give up what it had undertaken. In other cases, where a first attempt had failed, another has succeeded in later years. Thus, instead of the senseless, sickening, intolerable competition of charity with charity which fills the advertisement columns of the Times and the waste-paper baskets of every person who has a discoverable address, these Swiss burghers have made it a practice, for now these 106 years, to bring their benevolence to a focus, to set it to work in a manner which is at once the most practical and the most scientific, and which at the same time answers best to the spirit of true Christian fellowship. No political or religious differences have ever been suffered to exclude from its membership; it has been found wide enough for men of the most various characters, sympathies, and tendencies.

The following passages from the Rules of the Society, which were adopted on Easter Day of 1777 by the seven original members, may seem to explain the largeness of its aims:—"Object of the Society.—The furtherance, encouragement, and extension of all that is good, praiseworthy, socially useful, all that can raise and increase the honour and welfare of the community, the happiness of the citizen, and of mankind at large, has a right to the attention of the Society. Choice of Members.—Admission to the Society must therefore be open to every friend and furtherer of that which is good. Duties of Members.—Every member, in the same manner as he will strive for himself to make that use of his knowledge, his gifts, his position, his fortune, which he considers most conducive to the general happiness, so will he also have always this principle before his eyes in reference to the aims of this Society." The Society thus presupposes active individual benevolence as a many-sided duty, and then proceeds to make it collective. Hence, whilst it has not disdained to spend money freely on occasional commemorative festivals (more particularly that of its centenary, in 1877), it has been able to do its quiet work without any grand yearly dinners, and, above all, without any voting machinery; and yet it has grown almost uninterruptedly, though slowly at the first. Its income during its first year was only 2,126 francs (say, £85). After 1809, it was never under 3,000 f.; after 1815, never under 5,000; after 1816, never under 6,000; after 1821, never under 7,000; after 1829, never under 8,000; it was over 9,000, in 1830; over 10,000, in 1831; over 14,000, in 1834; over 15,000, in 1838; over 34,000, in 1851; over 42,000, in 1863; over 47,000, in 1874. Its lowest number of members was 121, in 1784; in 1804, it was over 200; in 1813, over 300; in 1823, over 400; in 1827, over 500; in 1845, over 600; in 1853, over 700; in 1861, over 800; in 1868, over 900; in 1869, over 1,000; in 1870, over 1,100; in 1871, over 1,200; in 1872, over 1,300; in 1874, over 1,400; in 1876, over 1,500; in 1881, over 1,700, being more than three per cent. of the whole population. What is still more remarkable is that the same names remain connected with it during its century and more of existence. Its founder was one Isaac Iselin, and a Major Rudolf Iselin was its treasurer in 1882, and twenty-one Iselins are among the subscribers. A Peter Burckhardt was another of the seven original members, and three Burckhardts were members of the Directorate for 1882, besides over seventy subscribers of the name. A Jacob Sarasin was another original member, and a Sarasin-Stehlin was a director for 1882, besides ten subscribers. An Andreas Merian was another original member, and a Hoffmann-Merian was President for 1882, besides thirty-eight subscribers. Thus, out of the seven original names, four appear after the lapse of 106 years in the Directorate of the Society, and only one seems to have died out of the list of Members. There is surely something very fine in this hereditary benevolence, generation after generation devoting themselves to the furtherance of a common work. No doubt, the S. P. G. in this country and a few local charities, might afford similar instances out of their subscription lists; but few amongst us would be disposed at the first blush to connect such fixity of purpose with Republican institutions. And there is something touching to note that, although the area of the Society's operations is local, it has many members not only in other Cantons, but in foreign countries. One subscribes from Heidelberg, another from Milan, a third from Naples, two from Havre, another from Weimar, another from London, another from Troyes, another from Marseilles, another from New York, another from St. Alban's. (Be it observed that the Report gives simply a list of members, not the quota of individual benefactions.)

It may, indeed, have been noticed that among the various objects of the Society there are none of a directly religious character, although the Protestant Union for Church-singing (Kirchengesangsverein) reports to it, as well as the Klein-Basel Choir (probably Roman Catholic), and a delegate from the Church Choir (Kirchengesangschor, apparently a different body from the first-named). That the existence of the Society has in nowise quenched religious zeal in Bâle, nor its restriction to local objects narrowed the range of Bâle benevolence, is shown clearly by the coexistence in the same city of the well-known Bâle Missionary Society, almost the pioneer among such institutions, and which has rendered signal services to Christendom. Many clergymen are members of the "Gesellschaft zur Beförderung der Guten und Gemeinnützigen," and it is obvious that its position is in nowise that of antagonism to the Christian faith, but rather of friendly, but wholly unsectarian, co-operation with it.

It would, of course, be idle simply to imitate such a body in this country, or even in this metropolis, this "province covered with houses," of which the Canton of Bâle City would form but a fragment. The field is long since preoccupied,—the vested interests of hundreds of charities would no longer allow of the growth of a body capable of combining so many important objects as the Bâle Society. But it is a question whether some inspiration might not be derived from its example. It is possible to conceive of a group of friends, united, perhaps, by the influence of some precious memory, bringing together their efforts, in whatever direction, for what is right and good, and instead of trying to set up separate societies (a benevolent nobleman is reported to have said that he sometimes lay awake at nights for thinking what new Societies required to be formed), resolving themselves into Committees only, all acting in harmony with each other. What might grow out of such an attempt at co-operation in benevolence, time alone could show. But our present competition in benevolence is as odious as it is wasteful.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE ULSTER FARMER.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—It is deeply to be regretted that so few English legislators have taken the trouble to visit Ireland, and given themselves the chance of getting penetrated to some extent with Irish sentiment, by coming into personal contact with the people on the spot. I learned more about Ulster tenant-right by spending some hours yesterday on the farms of a couple of Ulster tenants, than I had done by a dozen years of reading about the Ulster Custom. I really think it ought to be made compulsory on the British M.P. to produce a certificate of having spent, (say) at least four weeks in Ireland,—one in each of her four Provinces.

In despair of comprehending the Irish Land Question in England, I am come over to endeavour to get some idea of its working here. I have come to the conclusion that it is only by divesting oneself of all one's English ideas of the relations of landlord and tenant, that one is in a condition to enter on the inquiry. The Irish landlord, as a rule, seems to have left his tenant to do everything which, as a matter of course, an English landlord would have done for him. In the north of Ireland, tenants' improvements are conspicuous everywhere, in the shape of commodious buildings of all kinds, and drainage appears to have been largely carried out. In the south and west, improvements of any kind are conspicuous by their absence, so I cannot see where the landlord found his opportunity of confiscation. Between Dublin and Belfast, the farming, as a rule, appears up to the English standard. In the south and west, it seems below any standard at all. There can be no question that in many parts of Ireland, the land has been purposely allowed to get into a foul state, with the view of deceiving the Commissioners, so as to ensure a low valuation in the interest of the tenant. The result must inevitably be that for many years to come there must be a considerable falling-off in the produce.

I am convinced that it was not excessive rents which ground down the peasant-farmers of the south and west, but the smallness and barren nature of their holdings. "If they had them rent-free down there," an Ulster farmer remarked to me yesterday, "they would starve on them." No wonder there is no disposition to buy in Kerry or Connemara.

But I am disappointed to find an equal indisposition to buy in Ulster. "I would rather sit in practical perpetuity at a low rent, than own my own farm," was the opinion uttered in a very decided tone by the same Ulster farmer who condemned the small holdings. "Land," he went on to say, "is falling in value, and I believe it is going to fall further still, so I am not inclined to buy at present." I am convinced also that both in north and south the tenants expect further favours from Parliament, and that there is a natural unwillingness to change the blessed state of occupier, for whom the State shows so much consideration, for that of owner, which is in such bad odour everywhere, and especially in Ireland.

I cannot feel sanguine as to the beneficial effects of the Land Act in quieting the disturbed spirits of the peasant-farmer. He is generally an indolent fellow, engaged in the hopeless task of trying to get a living where no living is to be got. The practical fixity of tenure it confers will do something, doubtless, to encourage the exceptionally industrious and enterprising amongst them to improve their holdings; but the land is so deteriorated, from want of drainage, which can only be effectually carried out by a combination of adjoining occupiers, that I fear the prospect is a very hopeless one. I can discover no trace of any real subsidence of the bad-feeling of the bulk of the people in the south and west.—I am, Sir, &c., Armagh, May 30th.

A KERRY EMIGRATION SCENE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I am sure no one would regret more than Mr. W. H. (Bullock) Hall that any wrong impression should be the result of his kindly letter. I therefore ask you to grant me space to say a few words relative to the passage in his letter referring to the priest who happened to be too late to witness the embarkation. In the first place, it was my fault, not his—I having named eleven a.m. as the hour best suited to see the emigrant ship—that this estimable clergyman was late. The 'Lake Manitoba' was under weigh at 10.45 a.m., sooner by an hour than I calculated.

Again, such is the interest as to the future of the Kenmare emigrants taken by the priests of this district, that this same gentleman, the Rev. M. Neligan, whom Mr. (Bullock) Hall saw in the boat, sails from Queenstown on June 8th, at the request of his Bishop (the Most Rev. Dr. Higgins), to investigate the condition and prospects of those who have left the old country in the hope of bettering themselves in a new, under the Assisted Emigration Scheme. He has, from a sense of public and religious duty, laid aside his own convenience, in order to discharge a most charitable and excellent mission, suggested by the wisdom and kindness of his Bishop. I may add the announcement of the fact of his undertaking was received with the greatest satisfaction by all creeds and classes here.—I am, Sir, &c., Drounquinna, Kenmare, May 29th.

HOSPITALS AND DISPENSARIES—AN URGENT QUESTION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Efforts have recently been made on behalf of St. George's, London, and King's College Hospitals to obtain an extraordinary levy from the philanthropic public for these institutions. However energetic and laudable such efforts may be, it goes without saying that they can hardly, year by year, be maintained. The obvious conclusion follows that the constantly-increasing population of London taxes the resources of the London Hospitals beyond their strength. The causes of this and the evils engendered by such a state of things, though familiar to most of us, are not necessary to enumerate here. A remedy must, of course, be found. It seems, therefore, worth while, with this object, to draw public attention for a few moments to an attempt which has been made for the last two years in London to cope with the difficulty, and to do something to lessen the strain upon the hospital out-patient system. In April, 1880, an Association was formed, at a meeting of representatives of the Friendly Societies, the Hospital Saturday Fund, the Charity Organisation Society, and members of the Medical profession, and others, for the extension and consolidation of the Provident-dispensary system throughout London. This Association is in active work, and with your permission I will describe, as shortly as I can, the results up to the present time. Nine dispensaries have been established in different parts of London. Already about £3,000 a year is being paid in small sums by members of these institutions. In each of three neighbourhoods there are over 3,000 persons thus absolutely insured against medical risk, although one of these centres is within a mile of three large hospitals. That even with the present few branches, about 150 additional persons join in each week. That assistance is given by unpaid voluntary committees of members numbering more than 150 persons, and that several letters are constantly being received, inviting the formation of such dispensaries in working-class neighbourhoods in and about London. That in a comparatively short time, it is estimated, if the necessary branches were established, the system would embrace a membership of between 150,000 and 200,000 persons. This would in a great degree mitigate the strain upon the Hospital out-patient system, relieve the Hospitals from overwork and pecuniary pressure, and give the people practically more available and effective medical attendance, while preserving their independence, save the time, often of money value, now occupied in waiting at the out-patient department of the Hospitals. As I have stated, the scheme has generally received the support of the Friendly Societies, but it is obvious that until a further extension of it becomes practicable, many such men might live beyond the radius which is touched, and would thus be out of benefit until the system is sufficiently developed to include them. I have now briefly described this work; the principle is not new, and it is only the general and systematic application of it that gives it a claim to public attention. Although it has none of the sensational characteristics which attend the efforts now made on behalf of the Temperance movement, nor those which have for their effect the improvement of the dwellings of the poor, the scheme is simple, but it is in full swing, the working-classes in Dalston, Bow, Rotherhithe, Deptford, Kensal Green, and other outlying districts of London are eager for its extension; and it is a work which, one would think, would recommend itself to that large number of persons who have the amelioration of the condition of their less fortunate countrymen at heart.

A meeting will be held on Wednesday, June 6th, at Sir Charles Trevelyan's, 8 Grosvenor Crescent, at which the Right

Hon. W. H. Smith, M.P., will preside, to consider the progress of this work, and the desirability of its further extension in London.

MR. BRIGHT ON THE ESTABLISHMENT.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—My "hastily-written letter" has been somewhat hastily criticised, even in the elaborate and almost solemn castigation which it has received at the hands of Mr. Matthews. That gentleman thus writes:—"H. J. V. says 'we care not a brass farthing for Mr. Bright's opinion, but we do care,' &c. I did not say that. Indeed, from certain little verbal inaccuracies, it would seem that Mr. Matthews, while writing, did not even take the precaution to look at the words which he professes to quote.

What I did say, in substance, was this,—that while all of us Anglicans admired Mr. Bright, and some of us were his political adherents, yet none of us cared for his opinions about the Church of England,—his opinions on that one subject only. Here was the "qualification" distinctly stated. Whether the statement, thus guarded, expressed the truth accurately or not is another question, and is fairly open to criticism. The matter is one for the judgment of your readers.

I may be allowed to suggest to Mr. Matthews that there is hardly a more effectual method of "misrepresenting those who hold different opinions from our own," than the garbling of a quotation, even when, as, of course, in the present case, this is done quite unintentionally.—I am, Sir, &c., H. J. V.

THE BARRISTERS' AGITATION.

SIR,—I venture to think, from the general tone of your article of May 19th, on "The Barristers' Agitation," that you are under some misapprehension as to the quarter from which that movement sprang. Owing to the great recent encroachments of the lower branch of the profession on what used to be considered the peculiar sphere of the Junior Bar, some of that body were forced to the conclusion that they could no longer exist, under the restrictions which the rules of etiquette were understood to impose upon them. You may, however, have noticed that by a peculiar coincidence, if nothing more, there appeared in the Law Journal and other papers within a few days of the meeting to which you allude, the result of an inquiry, addressed to the Attorney-General, as to the extent of the rule of etiquette which prohibits barristers from doing work for outside clients for a fee without the intervention of a solicitor. The answer was that the rule only applies to contentious business, after litigation has begun; in other words, that the entire department of conveyancing proper, the drawing of wills, settlements, and agreements, and advising on the case, are within the legitimate province of a barrister, without any necessity for employing a solicitor as an intermediary. To give you some idea of the immense saving which the public would effect by availing themselves of the opportunity thus afforded, in all cases not requiring much preliminary investigation, I will refer to the simple instance of a marriage settlement of £10,000 Consols. The ad valorem scale suggested by the Council of the Incorporated Law Society, and which presumably represents the charge of the most respectable firms, fixes the remuneration of the lady's solicitor in this case at £60, and of the gentleman's at £30, this being exclusive of stamps, counsel's fees, and certain extra expenses. Now, if a barrister were employed direct, instead of a solicitor, his fee for drawing the settlement would be about £6 6s., the cost of engrossing, and other out-of-pocket expenses, would not exceed £8 8s., and allowing £10 for conferences and correspondence, the total cost would amount to about £25, or say £30, if the draft were perused by another counsel on behalf of the husband, being a net saving of £60. I need scarcely insist on the additional security which would result from resorting to that branch of the profession which is specially qualified for the purpose by study and education, instead of trusting entirely to the solicitor, whose sphere embraces so many other and complex operations.

It is only by insisting on the maintenance of the old supposed rule of etiquette that Solicitors can enforce their monopoly, and keep the scale of fees in non-contentious business at its present exorbitant pitch; and the public must decide for themselves whether they will acquiesce in this monopoly, or will avail themselves of the services of Barristers, whom the recent declaration of the Attorney-General has relieved from all further scruples of etiquette on this point.—I am, Sir, &c.,

"SLAY AND EAT."

SIR,—In reference to my previous letter on this subject, I have been asked, "Do I hold it unlawful to kill?" Certainly not. We must kill or be killed. If ἀγαπᾷ bids us cherish our little ones, and if God is this ἀγαπᾷ, it may be said, perhaps, though I should not like to put it so, that it is he who bids us kill,—bids us rob the cow of its calf and eat it, and use the milk which he made to prepare for its little one, for our own little ones. But then, the same ἀγαπᾷ, the same God that makes us do this, makes us hate to have to do it, and cry out against the cruelty of this necessity, as a necessity only to be groaned under, not to be acquiesced in, and a necessity that can find no place in the coming kingdom. What I protest against, and what I find the cause of Atheism, is the attempt to debit God with those necessities that war against the life. I do not believe that it is given to man to see anything good, or divine, or intentional in the imposition of those evils which it was the mission of Jesus to save us from. While we treat them as foes to be fought against they may do good, but the moment we look at them as beneficent ordinances appointed for our good, it seems to me that we are in danger of worshipping that incubus, that temporary evil arrangement from which St. Paul says that Jesus came to save us.

To say that God is not pure benevolence seems to me not only dangerous, but utterly senseless. I can see no clear creative purpose manifest in Nature, except in the movement which makes living things make themselves. Life is harmony, i.e., sympathetic co-operation; the internecine and competitive relations of living things are due to this,—that the harmony that animates each living organism has not yet succeeded in doing what it is manifestly trying to do, harmonising them with one another.—I am, Sir, &c.,

WOMEN AND THE HOSPITALS IN EGYPT.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Lord Morley's report on the state of the sick and wounded in our Egyptian hospitals, as commented upon in your columns, brings out a fact of some significance, on which too little stress, perhaps, has hitherto been laid. At Cairo there were two Army hospitals,—one engineered from first to last by a woman, Lady Strangford, who collected funds for the purpose, and went out to Egypt to see herself to their disposal; the other managed by men alone, with all the resources of the State to back them. The first, according to Lord Wolseley's evidence, was in perfect working order, complete in all appliances, nothing wanting, nothing forgotten, everything turned to account and made the best of,—witness the cheap and comfortable palm-leaf bedsteads, discovered in the town by Lady Strangford herself, and bought by her, any number of them, for 2s. 6d. each. At the other hospital, according to the same report, all was muddle and misery. The food was bad; dirt and discomfort reigned supreme. The sick and wounded were lying on the ground, suffering torments, for want of the commonest necessities, the officials helpless in the midst of chaos.

In view of this contrast—repeated also at the Crimea and elsewhere—it may be seriously urged: Is there no way in which the admitted efficiency of women in hospital management can be recognised officially, and turned to account in these national emergencies? Their large resourcefulness, their genius for detail, their quickness in utilising make-shift material, would render their counsel and co-operation in this department pre-eminently valuable. Hospital management is, in effect, but a more arduous kind of housekeeping,—housekeeping combined with the charge of the sick. For both these functions, women by nature have a special fitness. So long as war is a necessity for us as a nation, so long it is not only sound policy, but a duty of the highest order, to do the best we can for our wounded, sick, and dying soldiers. I would humbly submit that before the need surprises us again, means be devised for securing officially the supervision or assistance of capable, experienced, and sensible women; women of standing and education, loyal and self-devoted, who would bring into the work the element which now it lacks. Nothing, perhaps, would do more to redeem our war-hospital service, so far as commissariat, sick nursing, and detailed management are concerned, from the charge of inefficiency which has been justly brought against it.—I am, Sir, &c.,

PHYSIOLOGY AT OXFORD.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—A decree will, on Tuesday next, June 5th, be submitted to Convocation at Oxford authorising the expenditure of £10,000 from the University Chest on the erection of a laboratory, working-rooms, and lecture-room for the Waynflete Professor of Physiology, and in providing fixtures, &c., for the same. If this should be carried, it will convey an expression on the part of the University of approval of extended Vivisection. Hitherto, little of this, I believe, has been done in the museum. When it was under the direction of the manly and humane Rolleston, the amount of vivisection is thus summarised at page 343 of the Report of the Royal Commission:—"Half a dozen frogs used annually, and occasionally, but not regularly, small birds and mammals; but in all cases in which any pain can be supposed to be likely to be caused, anaesthetics are employed."

I must express my fear that a more extended class of experiments is in contemplation now; the evidence of the present Waynflete Professor, pp. 115-123, 138-148, shows that he regards the matter from a different point of view to that of which you are the advocate. His words leave a doubt at least on the mind whether he feels the utter abhorrence of painful experiment which Rolleston used to express. In his evidence, no doubt, as in that of most of the physiologists and of the physicians examined by the Commission, there is implied, if not always strongly expressed, a dislike of the callousness of thought on the subject which is said to exist in certain Continental laboratories, and which in the last century excited the scorn of Voltaire. But, on the other hand, the Professor stated that he thought that any amount of pain might lawfully be inflicted, for the purpose of arriving at an important result. And this is the fallacy of physiologists. Other men acknowledge, or are compelled to acknowledge, certain limits set about the objects of their pursuits; but again and again physiologists set up the claim of being only a law to themselves, and they dislike the interference of lay opinion.

It is this which causes many to dread the extension of vivisection,—and as regards Oxford, though this, I acknowledge, is a mere matter of sentiment, in the very playground of the University,—outside, cricket and little children at play; inside the museum walls, wilfully-inflicted suffering, perhaps of the dog who was their companion and guard yesterday.

I have been compelled, since the Waynflete Professor's name is mentioned in the decree, to speak of him, and so it would not be becoming for me to write anonymously; but I am far from imputing to him any carelessness as to pain. His own words are that "it should be made as small as possible." But whether there are limits which man's moral sense should set to the amount of pain he would inflict for any presumably sufficient object, is the point on which he and his critics differ.—I am, Sir, &c., Charlbury, May 30th.

C. F. C. WEST.

[We understand the Waynflete Professor's view to have been deliberately expressed that there is no limit to the torture which may be, and ought to be, inflicted, for a sufficient purpose, provided only that no "unnecessary" pain is inflicted. There is certainly nothing to show that any scientific purpose would be considered by him insufficient, solely on account of the pain which the experiments made to fulfil it might involve.—Ed. Spectator.]

DR. RHYS DAVIDS' HIBBERT LECTURES.

SIR,—In thanking you for your very kindly notice in the Spectator for May 19th, of my "Hibbert Lectures" on Buddhism, I would ask you to be so kind as to allow me to remove one misapprehension of my views into which the reviewer has fallen (through a want, no doubt, of that lucidity of expression on my part for which he is good enough, on other points, to give me credit).

He speaks of "that concept of spirit as entirely distinct from matter, to which our Materialists and Monists apply the name, or rather the nickname, of 'Animism.'" Further on, he not only includes myself among such persons, but supposes that I have represented Gotama also to be one of them. I must agree that, if used in that sense, the word "animism" would be a nickname. But I did not intend so to use it; nor, indeed, to give expression to any opinion of my own, or to ascribe any opinion to Gotama, on such a concept. I used the term—as, I believe, all other writers have done before me—to denote a "rudimentary philosophy" which sees separate and distinct spirits or ghosts everywhere animating the material world, and "finds in the action of such spirits a natural and final explanation of every mysterious event." (See pp. 14-74 of the "Lectures.") I plead guilty to the charge of assuming that this philosophy is dying out among educated and thoughtful people.

I must ask leave, however, to repudiate, very emphatically, for myself, the name, or rather the nickname, of Materialist. Neither is it a term which is at all applicable to Gotama. That great teacher looked at things from a point of view so entirely apart from the discussion suggested by the word, that there is not a single passage in the Pali "Pitakas" dealing, either one way or the other, with the question of Materialism. But his constantly reiterated doctrine of the essential impermanence of all complex states, whether of mind or of matter, perhaps involved and certainly developed (centuries after) into a thorough-going Localism, which is one of the most characteristic marks of the later Buddhist speculation. Being told by their master that all things were not so much being as constantly becoming, they drew the corollary that being, in fact, merely passing phenomena, they had no real or independent existence at all. Nothing, surely, is more different from the spirit ascribed to modern Materialism than this teaching of Gotama's; nothing more opposed to that spirit than the conclusions drawn from Gotama's own doctrine by his later followers.—I am, Sir, &c., T. W. RHYS DAVIDS.

[We are sorry that we have in any way misrepresented either Mr. Rhys Davids' own philosophy or the ideas of Gotama. The only expressions in our article which seem to have any bearing on the former are contained in the few lines following the word "accordingly," in allusion to his saying that Comtism, Agnosticism, and Buddhism are "the only systems which have broken away in the most uncompromising manner from the venerable soul-theories which have grown out of the ancient Animism." Mr. Rhys Davids does not, we admit, anywhere in these lectures lay down his own opinion in a direct manner, and we regret that we made the mistake of supposing that the page quoted and its context implied sympathy with the schools of thought in question. As to the term "animism," no doubt he applies it mainly to the more barbarous form of thought which attributed an indwelling soul to everything; but the words on page 13 of the lectures—"They" (the remote ancestors of the Buddhists) "had come to believe, most probably through the influence of dreams, in the existence of souls, or ghosts, or spirits, inside their own bodies," with the statement (page 88) that "the various religious faiths professed in Europe are so inextricably interwoven with the belief in a soul," &c., led us naturally to suppose that the author included in the term "animism" also those modern beliefs in the distinction between matter and spirit as different entities, which are at the foundation of modern Christianity and of much still surviving philosophy. We should like to know at what point "Animism" ends, and the more civilised soul-theories begin. It is quite true that Gotama did not concern himself with ontological speculations in the shape with which we are now so familiar, for his aims were ethical and practical; but if he had to invent Karma, in consequence of a rejection of "animism," including in that term the existence of an ego capable of retaining its conscious identity, apart from the body, it is difficult to avoid looking upon him as "in some sense a Monist," which is all that we have said about the analogy of his ideas to any modern form of thought. Certainly it is impossible to hold that his doctrines had any resemblance to the grosser forms of Materialism now prevalent.—Ed. Spectator.]

POETRY.

COMPTON PLACE.

FAIR beeches, though your brother trees
 In forests stand so proud,
 Yet here the fierce winds from the seas
 So oft your heads have bowed,

That still, when softer airs prevail,
Your tops seem bending from the gale.

With salt dews from the sea-foam wet,
By many a tempest torn,
Scarred trunks and twisted limbs show yet
What terrors ye have borne;
Nor any years can now undo
What the past years have done to you.

Yet, when the Spring is in the land,
And bright the heaven o'erhead,
In sullen gloom ye will not stand,
Though life's best hopes be dead;
New leaves break forth from buds unseen,
Till all the wood is clothed in green.

Fair souls, that from your high intent
By bitter fate are barred,
Though past all hope your lives be bent,
And past all healing scarred;
Yet learn of these, to do as they,—
Not what ye would, but what ye may!

DE BROGLIE'S FREDERICK THE GREAT AND MARIA THERESA.*

THE Duc de Broglie says early in the first of these volumes, and with a characteristically elegant sigh, that "we have not, as yet, any history of the eighteenth century, properly so styled. That which is called history is simply the product of party-spirit, always recognisable by one characteristic feature,—a blind credulity, that admits the most baseless suspicions when it can turn them to advantage, and contests all evidence which it finds inconvenient." One might ask M. de Broglie what is the particular party-spirit that animates Von Ranke or Mr. Lecky, or even "that eminent English writer, Mr. Carlyle." What the Duc de Broglie means, however, no doubt, is that no complete history of the eighteenth century has been written from the stand-point of what may fairly be styled the ante-Voltaire, and ante-Rousseau half of that century, with which alone he has genuine sympathy. His career and works alike prove that he has not got beyond the ideas of that period. He has never forsaken Leibnitz, his early love in religion and philosophy. His recent speeches in the French Senate on Egypt and the Triple Alliance are proof positive that, as regards foreign policy, he has not outgrown the tradition of Guizot,—a tradition that in itself was an attempt to revive that ante-Voltaire, ante-Rousseau Balance of Power which, if Carlyle and Mr. Bright may for once be combined, was but a "monstrous, wigged mendacity," not perhaps constructed, but certainly maintained, to provide incomes for the younger sons of Europe. Even the graces of M. de Broglie's style, undoubted as these are, are the graces of the earlier half of the eighteenth century, not of the latter half, much less of our own time. He is a maker of phrases, but he has not at his command words that burn, for the good reason that he is not filled with thoughts that breathe the modern spirit. He has knowledge, but he has no desire for that "plebification of knowledge" which Coleridge dreaded, but which is becoming one of the enthusiasms of our times, as a contribution to what the wiser Wordsworth appreciated as "joy in widest commonality spread." Yet stranded politician and "fossil ideologue" though the Duc de Broglie must be accounted, he will always deserve and command a certain amount of respect, especially for his contributions to literature. If his ideas are those of the Regency somewhat clarified, he has also not a little of its grand air; and even if his new volumes were not interesting as a contribution to an important historical controversy, they would be enjoyable and valuable for the grace, and high politeness of their author's style.

M. de Broglie does not disguise his real purpose in rewriting, with the aid of the fresh historical material recently supplied from the Berlin and Vienna Chanceries, in the shape of D'Arneht's History of Maria Theresa, Droysen's History of Prussian Policy, and the political correspondence of Frederick the Great, the story of the connection of France from 1740 to

1742 with the memorable struggle between Frederick and Maria Theresa. His volumes are not a direct attack upon the Carlyle, or a direct defence of the Macaulay-Stanhope, theory of Frederick and of his conduct in seizing Silesia, although both are implied in them. He concerns himself mainly with his own country and with the diplomatic "idea" which at that time gained an ascendancy there, and which in his opinion has had a baleful effect, even down to our own day. "I think," he says, "I have proved to my readers that on the death of the Emperor Charles VI., it would have been easy to have obtained from his daughter Maria Theresa such an accession of territory as would have strengthened the defence of our northern frontier, and probably rendered it secure for ever, by the surrender of the whole or a part of the Low Countries. To this practical, certain, tangible advantage, France preferred the 'idea' of re-establishing the German Empire according to its primitive conception, that is to say, free from Austrian preponderance and heredity. . . . For this 'idea' did France rush into a great war, of which she had, ultimately to bear the whole cost, and from which under the best of circumstances she could have derived only an imaginary advantage. The re-establishment of the German Empire, striven for under such conditions as these, was simply a conception, under a form consonant with the spirit of the time, of that vague principle of nationality which we have twice defended, and to which we have now fallen victims." A passage like this might fairly be cited as evidence of how little the writer is affected by the nineteenth-century ideas of nationality and democracy, and how full he is of the old eighteenth-century or chess-board doctrine of diplomacy. He would have seen no immorality in France absorbing the Low Countries as the price of assistance to Maria Theresa, without consulting the wishes of their inhabitants; on the contrary, his book is in effect one long regret that some such step was not taken. Apart from this, however, M. de Broglie supplies no evidence, beyond diplomatic "sentiments" which counted for less in the middle of last century than they do even now, that the aged Fleury and the dashing but conceited Belleisle, who entered into alliance with Frederick in 1740, were animated by any such even pseudo-magnanimous idea as that attributed to them. The one thought only of how with the least trouble he could seem to pose before France as continuing the "Quatorze" tradition. The other thought only of how France, as represented by himself, might pose before Europe as controller of its destinies; and this Frederick evidently believed from the beginning, as he said at the end, of what was rather a political liaison than an alliance. As proof of this may be taken a curious document, found in Frederick's political correspondence, which has neither date nor signature, and which, says M. de Broglie, "had it emanated from any other person, might be called an examination of conscience":—

"The document is divided into two parts respectively, entitled as follows:—'A Statement of the Reasons which I may have for remaining in alliance with France.' 'A Statement of the Reasons which I may have for making a Peace with the Queen of Hungary.' The for and against is laid out before us; the whole soul of the writer is revealed. Under the first head (and even in the first rank) he thinks proper to place a consideration of honour and morality among the number of the motives that militate for the maintenance of the French alliance. 'It is ill done,' he says, 'to violate one's word without reason, and up to the present time I have no ground of complaint against France nor my allies' (this acknowledgment is precious, and worth retaining). 'If one does not carry out one's projects, and passes often from one side to another, one gains the reputation of vacillation and levity.' Reflections of a more self-interested kind follow; as, for example, that a fresh victory gained over the Austrians would place Prussia in the first rank in Europe, and that the King of Prussia would then have all the authority of the Emperor, while the Elector of Bavaria would have only the trouble; and that the Queen of Hungary (if she were treated with) would always regret the ceded provinces, and would endeavour to retake them, so that there would never be anything more than a plastered-up peace. It is, however, under the other head, that which enumerates the possible advantages of a separate peace, that the true sentiments of the writer are to be found. First come the usual denunciations of the slowness, the hesitation, the military mistakes of the French Generals, and the impossibility of campaigning with them any longer without sharing the consequences of their errors. Then come complaints that to work for the King of Poland is only to aggrandize neighbours who may repay service by ingratitude. But now let us note the final trait; 'The fortunate termination of this war would render France the arbiter of the universe.' This is the final word; this is the last figure of the reckoning, and it strikes the balance and settles the account."

No one, of course, seeks to defend Frederick's conduct in 1741 in entering into secret negotiations with Maria Theresa, while bound by a solemn treaty of alliance with France, from the stand-point of high morality, and there was, as Mr. Morley says, in his study of Voltaire, "a gratuitous infamy in hinting to the Austrian General, as Frederick did, how he might assault with advantage the French enemy, Frederick's own ally at the moment." But there is nothing to disprove the Carlylian doctrine that at the time of the Klein-Schnellendorf negotiations of 1741 both Austria and France were playing with clogged dice, and that Frederick "knew it, and sought to profit by his knowledge." Possibly enough, France had not taken steps towards the conclusion of a separate and special treaty with Austria; and perhaps the most successful historical point made by M. de Broglie is his protest against any such notion. Possibly, too, it was not the possession of Luxemburg that the viewy Belleisle was aiming at, as Frederick thought. But a nation is surely none the less a dicer, if the stake she plays for is the position of "arbiter of the universe." Besides, France, as the ally of Prussia, had played badly. What with Belleisle's ill-fortune, his vanity, which prevented him from seeing clearly his own relationship to his surroundings, and his misfortune in having as his military colleague so obstinate a man and so pedantic a strategist as the Marshal de Broglie, whose faults the Duc shows no inclination to screen, "of the immense efforts which his diplomacy has caused to be made there remained nothing but an army of 25,000 Frenchmen, destitute, and blockaded behind dismantled ramparts, far away in Germany." Frederick himself wrote caudally to Belleisle:—"I look upon this affair as a navigation undertaken by several with the same object, but which, being upset by a shipwreck, places each of the navigators under the necessity of saving himself by swimming, and landing wherever he can." There is nothing magnanimous in a saute qui peut. But Frederick did not pretend to be magnanimous. He did not even claim, by his own chief apologist's confession, to be "superstitiously veracious," a fact which that apologist evidently thinks a credit to him rather than the reverse, much as Goethe records, as a compliment to Philina, in his Wilhelm Meister, that her dress was not "superstitiously clean." All he sought to do was "to win his stake out of that foul, weltering medley, and go home safe with it, if he could." The events which followed the hollow peace that resulted from the secret negotiations of Klein-Schnellendorf proved that Frederick was not wrong in his estimate of the true character of French policy, veiled though it was by the phrases of Belleisle.

Maria Theresa figures in M. de Broglie's pages, especially in the second volume, as well as Frederick. We are told once more how pure she was, how devout, how attached to her husband, how she felt but a pauvre chienne (the translators might have spared their explanatory note about this phrase), without him. M. de Broglie has given us the most coherent and accurate narrative that has yet appeared of her memorable visit to Hungary, in which she aroused into a passion of loyalty the people which once reckoned "the divine right of rebellion" as a prominent article in its Constitution; although his description of the touching spectacle which so affected that plain Englishman, Sir Thomas Robinson, is not so brilliant as Macaulay's. But Maria Theresa's great part in European history, even her great part in her own magnificent vendetta, was played after 1740; and almost in spite of himself, Frederick is the hero, or rather, if we may borrow from the vocabulary of cricket, the "demon bowler," of M. de Broglie's volumes. Not, indeed, that he proves anything fresh against Frederick, except, perhaps, that he would at the beginning of his struggle with Maria Theresa have preferred an English to a French alliance. He took the latter as a pis-aller; and he ultimately found in Pitt what he failed to find in Walpole, whom M. de Broglie quite inadequately, though also quite characteristically, describes as an English Fleury. He has little that is really original to say on Frederick's claims to the Silesia which he seized; on the contrary, he passes too lightly over the fresh historical material Droysen has collected to prove that, after all, Silesia was, so far as Prussia was concerned, "a stolen horse." There is, indeed, not much more to be written on this subject than what Mr. Seeley says in his Life of Stein:—"The true view of Prussia in the eighteenth century seems to be that it was a State which found itself unable to be safe without being dangerous at the same time, which created, for legitimate purposes, a weapon it was always suspected of wishing to use; and sometimes did use, for illegitimate." After all, this is but the polite interpretation which "historical science" places on Frederick's own confession that, having a well-filled treasury and an army ready to act, he was bound to do something with them. For the rest, how true it is, as Carlyle says, that "Frederick, after such trial and proof as has seldom been, got his claims on Schlesien allowed by the Destinies; his claims on Schlesien and on infinitely higher things, though he had not been consciously thinking of them in making that adventure!" But M. de Broglie has constructed from a variety of sources a very interesting account of Frederick's explanation of his conduct to Sir Thomas Robinson, the English Minister, who visited and remonstrated with him, which deserves quotation:—

"When the day of audience arrived, he hardly gave Sir Thomas time to state his proposals, before he rose and stood before him in an attitude of simulated surprise and indignation. The offer (which was indeed a mistaken one) to pay him two hundred thousand pounds for retiring out of Silesia, seemed to exasperate him particularly. 'Am I a beggar,' he exclaimed, 'that I should be offered money? Have I made war for that? Am I supposed to want to sell the fame and the interests of my house? Go and offer money to a petty prince, like the Duke of Gotha and his fellows; I am of those who would rather give money than take it; but where should the Court of Vienna get it to give? That is just like its usual pride and effrontery.' The proposed cession of Austrian Guelderland was equally ill received. 'Podewils,' said the King, turning to his Minister, who was present at the audience, 'how much of the Duchy of Guelders is still in the possession of Austria?'—'Very little,' replied the Minister, with a bow.—'You see, this is another beggarly trick (gueuserie) that they propose to play me.' So violent was his anger, that Sir Thomas Robinson thought the moment had come for bringing out the Limburg proposal. 'I cannot understand,' said the King, 'how Austria can think of stripping her frontier in this way. Has she any right to do it? Has she not treaties with Holland that prevent it?' Frederick was right: by a treaty made with Holland in 1713, and which is known in diplomatic history as the Barrier Treaty, Austria had pledged herself to maintain a line of defensive fortifications against France on the Netherland frontier, and this, of course, implied that she should never alienate that territory. 'Besides,' continued Frederick, 'I do not want to have anything to dispute about with either Holland or France; they have not offended me, and they would be disturbed if I came into their neighbourhood. And then, who is to guarantee these cessions that you propose to me?' Robinson begged the King to observe that his Government, by acting as mediator, also gave guarantees. 'Ah, guarantees!' exclaimed Frederick, 'and who cares about guarantees now-a-days? Did not everybody guarantee the Pragmatic Sanction? Did you not guarantee it yourselves? Why don't you all come to the aid of the Queen, then?'—'We cannot answer for everything,' said Robinson, 'but if Austria is pushed to extremity, she will have friends.'—'Who are they?'—'There will be the Russians, who cannot resist Turkey without Austria.'—'Good! As to the Russians, I have nothing to say, but I have means of taking care of myself with them.'—'There are other Powers who have engagements, and will fulfil them, however painful those duties may appear.' The King laid his finger on his nose, and cut Sir Thomas short, by saying, 'No threats, Sir, if you please, no threats!' Podewils, in a terrible fright, struck in at this point with a few words of conciliation, and Robinson, recovering from a momentary emotion, said quietly, 'I use no threats, Sire, I only state that which cannot fail to occur; it is my zeal for the public good that brings me here.'—'The public ought to be very much obliged to you; but hear me: as for Russia, I have told you about that; I have nothing to fear from the King of Poland; the King of England is my kinsman, he will not attack me, and if he does, the Prince of Anhalt has an army which will take care of him.'—'But,' said Robinson, 'are you not afraid that the Queen, in despair, may throw herself into the arms of France?' On this point the King would not make any answer, but said, with a raised voice and theatrical emphasis, 'I am at the head of an invincible army, I am master of a country which I will have, which I ought to have, and I would rather die with all my men than let myself be driven, or rather bought, out of it. My ancestors would come out of their graves to reproach me with betraying the rights that I hold from them. And what would be said of me if I were to abandon an enterprise which has been the first act of my reign, entered upon after due reflection, steadily pursued, and which I am resolved to carry out to the end? Is it for a Protestant sovereign to counsel me to replace poor, oppressed Protestants under the dominion of a persecuting Catholic clergy? After all, I am the conqueror, and it is for the conqueror to make conditions. To-day I demand Silesia and Breslau, and if I do not obtain them to-day, in six weeks I shall demand four more duchies.'—'Is this your Majesty's final decision,' asked Robinson, 'and the answer that I am to take to the Queen?'—'Yes, it makes me as sick as a pregnant woman to have the same question put to me over and over again.' Sir Thomas Robinson begged that he might at least be allowed to explain in detail to Podewils the bearing of the Queen's proposals, on handing him the text of them, but the King said, 'No, Sir, it is useless to think of it.' He then turned his back, took up his hat, and retired behind the curtain that divided the tent. Sir Thomas remained alone with Podewils; the one was as much disconcerted as the other. 'You trust in France,' said Sir Thomas; 'she will forsake you.'—'No, no!' replied Podewils; 'France will not leave us in the lurch; unless, indeed,' he added, after a few moments' hesitation, 'we were to leave her in the lurch ourselves.'"

It is quite unnecessary to say that this book is well written; for M. de Broglie cannot write badly. Had space permitted, we should have quoted his estimates of the characters of Fleury and Belleisle, his description of the state of French society at the time that Frederick took the step that led to such tremendous results; and, above all, his narrative (Vol. I., pp. 38-45) of Frederick's remarkable and incognito visit to Strasburg, the governor of which at the time was the second Marshal de Broglie; "a circumstance to which I owe the advantage of possessing a narrative of this little affair at first hand, written on the spot, and more correct than the stories that appeared in the gazettes, and are to be found in the memoirs of the time." A work of such a kind as this does not give scope for M. de Broglie's skill in shooting individual character, while on the wing, with an epigram. Still, he occasionally retires from the dusty road of special pleading into the inviting hostelry of pure literature, where he composes such a sentence as,—"First to encourage and then to trade upon the affections and the wounded pride of a young woman was a game that came easy to an octogenarian, whose age, while it rendered him insensible to the passions of the heart, made him all the more skilful in manipulating its weaknesses." Occasionally, indeed, M. de Broglie quotes from his authorities rather too lavishly, and so overweights his narrative, without strengthening his arguments. But even readers who dispute his conclusions will frankly allow that his work is a very valuable one, and has high merits, both literary and historical. M. de Broglie writes such delicate French, that the translation of it into excellent English without doing injustice to the inevitable nuances must have been no easy task. This, Mrs. Cashel Hoey and Mr. John Lillie, who have already done so much good work of a similar kind, have accomplished with a success that may fairly be described as perfect.

AUTUMN SWALLOWS.*

THERE is a genuine passion and not a little of vivid imagination in this volume of lyrics, which seems to give us some measure of the inward force that has gone to the making of Miss Ellice Hopkins's beneficent career. In one of the semi-epigrammatic versicles with which Miss Hopkins fills a few of the pages of her book, she illustrates the saying that "the blood is the life" with characteristic vigour in words that might be taken as the motto of both her poetic and her unpoetic work:—

"Yesterday's living sacrifice
Is but to-day's dull carcase; rise,
Nor dare to offer the All-living, death
And dead decay;
But fresh life-blood pour out, and warm new breath
Each new to-day."

Certainly, we may say of these lyrics that whatever some of them may want in distinctness of form, they never want the freshness of living feeling or wear the aspect of dead-alive emotion. Some of the poems are hardly clear enough to follow in detail, though one never misses the key-note of the whole. Indeed, the detail sometimes seems to confuse rather than to illustrate the meaning which we gather from the whole. But when Miss Hopkins succeeds, as she often does, in keeping all difficult detail out of her lyrics, they are often striking, from the depth and singleness of their feeling. Take, for example, the following, in which Miss Hopkins suggests the bewilderment with which an atom of vibrating air tossed to and fro in the whirlpools of song, might strive to understand and trace the law of its own motion, though it could discover nothing but an apparently purposeless flux and reflux, and this notwithstanding that all the time it was contributing to the expression of triumphant delight in victory over wrong:—

"THE SONG."

Birth too and death, slumber and wakefulness, motion and immobility, crowned majesty and squalid filth, discordant clamour and the voice of gods.—EMPEDOCLES.

An atom of air still hither and thither swung,
Hither and thither tossed and aimlessly flung,
Never at rest on the breath of a passionate song,
A passionate song of love and triumph o'er wrong,
Poured from the trembling lips of the singer afire,
Leaping like flame from the golden heart of the lyre,
A passionate song of triumph!

And ever it mused:

By what law of my being perplexed and confused
Am I tossed thus idly about, nor suffered to rest,
Now in the gulf of the billow and now on its crest,
Hither and thither moved by a Hand in the dark,
Ever to random shocks a wandering mark,
Ever impelled by forces that lie without,
In a dance of death that ends in confusion and doubt,
A rhythm of loss, an upward life in defeat,
The onward turned back on itself with death for its beat.

And it searched out the laws of vibration, the bound and th' impact
Now swift and now slow; and patiently traced each fact
Of its being, how atom with atom ever must meet,
And the limits which still each upward movement defeat—
Impassable law that limits the freedom of each.

* Autumn Swallows. A Book of Lyrics. By Ellice Hopkins. London: Macmillan and Co.

And still as far as the utmost science could reach Impulse it found in the lock of mechanical law, Nought in it all but a backward and forward saw,
Opposite motions that ever each other defeat,
Barren of progress or plan, left still incomplete.

But the song, the passionate song of triumph and love,
That yet all the while like a living shuttle it wove,
The passionate song of love and triumph o'er wrong,
That conditioned the laws of its wonderful life all along,
It knew not nor heard. For it was but a finite part;
And the song is the infinite whole, the throb of a Heart."

That has the ring of genuine poetry in it, as well as of genuine thought. Still more effective, perhaps, is the little lyric called "A Wave," in which Miss Hopkins expresses with beauty and force the constant death-in-life and life-in-death of all the nobler purposes of man, comparing them to the continual breaking and re-forming of the ocean wave. That is not an uncommon metaphor, but it is not common to find it embodied with so much warmth and truth of feeling as it is in the beautiful little lyric we are about to quote. Indeed, we may notice throughout this volume a remarkable and passionate sympathy with that weakness which is strength in disguise, and that strength which almost prefers the form of weakness:—

"A WAVE."

O Being in thy dissolution known
Most lovely then;
O Life that ever has to die alone,
To live again;
O bounding Heart that still must bow and break
To touch thine end;
O broken Purpose that must failure take,
And deathward bend,
For the great tide to stretch from rock to rock
His shining way;
O wandering Will that from the furthest shock
Of sea-deeps grey,
Silver constraint of secret light on high
Lends safe to shore;
O living Rapture that dost inly sigh,
And evermore
Within thy joy the wailful voices keep;
I see thee now,
O Son of the unfathomable deep!
And trembling know
The crowned Shadow of man's opposites,
The forces dread
That sway him into being, blanched with lights
Of thunder bred;
A poised Passion wrought from central breath
Of whirling storms,
And evermore a deathless life in death,
That still re-forms.
And thou, man's prototype in varying moods,
Didst lonely beat
The vacant shores and speechless solitudes
With silver feet,
Through the great moons wandering forlorn
In search of him,
As rose and fell like vacant flames, lone morn
And evening dim,
Ere light had grown articulate in love,
Or silence knew
Herself as worship. Then didst thou ever move
Beneath the blue,
An incommunicable mystery,
About thy shore;
A visible yearning of the earth and sea,
That evermore
Flung out white arms to catch at some far good
Yet unfulfilled,
And failing sobbed and sank in solitude
With heart unstilled;
A voice that ever crying as of old
In deserts dumb,
With hollow tongue reverberate foretold
A Life to come."

Miss Hopkins, however, is by no means always so clear and so musical as she is here. There are a few poems in which the expression seems to us forced and hard, though we do not doubt the depth of the feeling beneath. For instance, in the following attempt to compare the reality of life as it really is to a Gorgon face which turns to stone all those who look steadily upon it, unless their eyes are already so saturated with the splendour of a heavenly vision that the Medusa face is smitten "into night" by the glory within, we perceive a too ambitious attempt to condense two very different trains of feeling into a single sonnet:—

"MEDUSA."

Gaze thou upon the face, serenely bright,
Of Him whose countenance is as the sun
Shining in midmost strength, ere yet is run
His race of fire. Gaze, nor avert thy sight;
Shrink not for any bitterness of light,

Nor nightward fallings of thy soul, undone
By heavenly lightnings till high use is won.
So when Life's Gorgon face, with dread affright,
Stoops close upon thy shuddering flesh, nor flee
Thou must, but gaze, or fail in heavenward might,
Fronting unblanched the freezing mystery :
Then that dear Splendour stamped upon thy sight,
May blur the deathful features, and for thee,
Light-charmed, and safe, may smite them into night."

On the whole, real life is hardly to be fitly compared to a Medusa face. Nor is the spiritual vision of that divine splendour which is treated as the antidote to the vision of Life, one which can be obtained at all without a steady gaze on life itself. Hence, the sonnet is a bewildering one, which seems to fail of its effect, and only to leave us more perplexed than it found us. Doubtless, the vision of God is a cure for the paralysing terrors of earthly views of life. But then, the vision of God is hardly ever gained except by those who begin, at least, by finding life no Medusa, but rather too full of beauty and charm. Miss Hopkins does not often give way to the wish to startle, but in this and a few of her other poems she attempts rather grim effects, which she seems to us to dash off too abruptly, and without taking sufficient pains to work out the complexity of her thought.

But we must not part from this little volume of lyrics, in which every thoughtful reader will find great pleasure, with fault-finding. We prefer to take leave of Miss Hopkins with a beautiful little poem on the loneliness of death, in which she seems to us at once perfectly simple, as well as impressive :—

"JE MOURRAI SEUL."—Pascal.

The silent chariot standeth at the door,
The house is hushed and still from roof to floor,
None heard the sound of its mysterious wheels,
Yet each its presence feels.

No champing bit, nor tramp of pawing feet,
All dark and silent up and down the street,
And yet thou may'st not keep it waiting there
For one last kiss or prayer.

Thy words, with some strange Other interchanged,
Strike cold across us like loved eyes estranged,
With things that are not fraught ; our things that are Fade like a sun-struck star.

And thou too weak and agonised to lift
The cup to quench thy dying thirst, or shift
Thy pillow, now without our help must rise,
Nor wait our ministries.

Thou, loved and cherished, must go forth alone,
None sees thee fondly to the door, not one ;
No head is turned to see thee go ; we stay
Where thou art not, and pray.

No panel bars thy white, resistless feet,
Our walls are mist to thee ; out in the street
It waits, it waits for thee, for thee alone :
'Arise, let us begone !'

Alone, alone upon thine awful way !
Do any show thee kindness ? Any stay
Thy heart ? Or does the silent charioteer Whisper, 'Be of good cheer ?'

We know not. None may follow thee afar,
None hear the sound of thy departing car.
Only vast silence like a strong, black sea
Rolls in 'twixt us and thee."

A considerable proportion of the lyrics in this little book touch as high a point as this,—one, that is, which only a powerful character, and a character penetrated with true emotion, could attain.

THE ILIAD IN ENGLISH PROSE.*

THE translation of the great Classical poets into prose that has a distinct literary character is one of the achievements of recent scholarship. Some, perhaps most, are scarcely susceptible of this treatment, but Homer lends himself readily to it. The Odyssey has already been rendered into prose which is more attractive than anything that has yet been accomplished in verse, Pope and, perhaps, Worsley being excepted ; while it is far more representative of the original than the heroics of the one and the Spenserian stanza of the other ; and we have now to welcome a companion translation of the Iliad. It comes strongly recommended by the three names borne on the title-page. Messrs. Lang and Myers have already achieved success in this field of labour, while Mr. Leaf has done good work as an editor of a portion of the text.

The three qualities which we look to find in a work of this kind are exactness of rendering, purity of style, and rhythmical flow. Scholars so competent as the three gentlemen who have shared the twenty-four books between them (Mr. Leaf has taken i.-ix., Mr. Lang x.-xvi., and Mr. Myers xvii.-xxiv.) are not to be attacked single-handed with a light heart. Still, we cannot but think that there are passages where, like their original, if Horace be right, they have "nodded." In Iliad i., 234, seq., Achilles says of his sceptre that "it shall no more put forth leaf or twig," "ἐπεὶ δὲ πρῶτα τομὴν ἐν ὄρεσσι λίλοιπεν." This Mr. Leaf renders by "seeing it hath for ever left its trunk among the hills." It would surely be better to take "ἐπεὶ δὲ" as temporal, modified as it manifestly is by "πρῶτα." The word "ever" seems to have been strangely transposed in the rendering. "Ever since it hath left," or "from the hour it left," would be better, if we do not feel bound to stick to the perfect form. In xii., 301-2, we find it said of a lion that "his brave spirit urgeth him to make assail on the sheep, and come even against a well-built homestead." This reads as if the two acts were distinct, and so does not well represent the original, "μήλων πειρήσονται καὶ ἐς πυκινὸν δόμον ἐλθεῖν." "he will go after the sheep, even when they are protected by a well-built homestead." We should question "he in turn arose with the bronze," for "ὁ δ' ὕστερος ὤρνυτο χαλκῶς" (xvi., 479), and "a night assault," for "ἐννύχιος προμολῶν" (xxi., 371), where the words refer rather to the setting-forth of the hero, than to his attack on the orchard. "A night foray" might be better. "To thee am I in the bonds of suppliantship" is too strong for "ἀντί τοι εἶμ' ἐκέταο αἰδοῖοιο" (xxi., 75). Lycaon advances the plea more tentatively. He does not venture to assert actual suppliantship, only something like it, seeing that he had shared his foe's hospitality. In lines 103-5 of the same book, a too literal rendering of the Greek has spoilt the English. In old days, Achilles says, he had sold his captives beyond the sea, "but now there is none that shall escape death, whomsoever before Ilios, God shall deliver into my hands,—yea, even among all Trojans, but chiefest among Priam's sons." Grammatically, we have to supply, "there is none that shall escape death" before "chiefest among Priam's sons." "Least of all among Priam's sons," would certainly be better.

We should like to have a statement of the translators' views on the proper representation of the particles. A complete representation of them would be fatal to any compactness or beauty of form. Here, most of all, the subtleties of Greek expression defy the clumsy machinery of a language which is, in some respects, a not unworthy rival. Something may be done by emphatic position, by collocation, or by antithesis. We may take as an instance, i., 298-9, "Know that not by violence will I strive for the damsel's sake, neither with thee, nor with any other ; ye gave, and ye have taken away." The last clause in the Greek is "ἐπεὶ μὲν ἀφέλασθέ γε δόντες." From a literary point of view, this is unexceptionable ; and a teacher would be glad to get such good style from a pupil, only he would hardly be satisfied with such a free dealing with the particles. But then it is not the business of a translator to make a pupil satisfy his teacher, though he may help towards that result. The translation that a lad can carry into an examination-room in his head and write down without change is a very doubtful boon.

The difficulty of the conventional epithets has been met with adequate success. It would be difficult, anyhow, to suggest better equivalents. "Lady mother," for instance, may hardly satisfy us for "πάτρια μήτηρ," but what are we to substitute for it ? We object, however, to the use of "goodly" in a single speech (that of Andromache to Hector) for "δῖος," applied to Achilles, and "θαλερός," an epithet of "παρκαότης."

In the matter of style, we have very little fault to find. We should have been disposed, perhaps, to a more rigid purism than has approved itself to the three associates. Now and then we find a phrase which jars somewhat on the ear, as, e.g., in xxi., 90,—"Thou wilt butcher both." This is not in the "grand style," though elsewhere we should find in "to butcher" a good equivalent of "δαιροποιεῖν." But, on the whole, the style is all that could be wished, distinctive without affectation of archaism. Vigorous and expressive renderings are frequent. "Some small thing, yet mine own," for "ἐλὶόν τε, φίλον τε," has, perhaps, too much of humorous suggestion about it to suit the context ; but "the more men, the better work," for "πλεονὸν δὲ τοι ἔργον ἀμεινον," "the Erinnyes that walketh in darkness," for "ἡεροφῶτις Ἑρινύς," "garments that wax not old," for "ἀμβροτα ἔματα," to give a few specimens out of many, are unquestionably felicitous.

* The Iliad of Homer. Done into English Prose. By Andrew Lang, M.A., Walter Leaf, M.A., and Ernest Myers, M.A. London : Macmillan and Co. 1883.

In the matter of rhythmical flow, we do not find the whole translation as uniformly excellent as we could have wished. After much careful examination, we are inclined to give the preference to the work of Messrs. Lang and Myers, who seem to have found a help in the gift of poetical expression which they have both proved themselves to possess. Book ix., however, which is part of Mr. Leaf's work, has been particularly well done throughout. Here is a passage from the speech of Phoenix:—

"Nay, even the very gods can bend, and theirs, withal, is loftier majesty, and honour, and might. Their hearts by incense, and reverent vows, and drink offering, and meat offering, men turn with prayer, as oft as any transgresseth and doeth sin. Moreover, prayers of penitence are daughters of great Zeus, halting, and wrinkled, and of eyes askance, that have their task, withal, to go in the steps of Sin. For Sin is strong and fleet of foot, wherefore she far outrunneth all prayers, and goeth before over all the earth, making men fall, and Prayer follows behind, to heal the harm. Now, whosoever reverenceth Zeus' daughters when they draw near, him they greatly bless and hear his petitions; but when one denieth them and stiffly refuseth, then depart they, and make prayer unto Zeus, the son of Kronos, that sin may come upon such an one, that he may fall and pay the price."

We do not like "bend" used intransitively, and why not "daughters of Zeus," instead of the awkward sibilation of "Zeus' daughters"?

Here is Mr. Lang's presentment of a famous passage (xvi., 617-636), where the crowded similes offer a task of no small difficulty to the translator:—

"Yet not even so might he break them, for all his eagerness. Nay, they stood firm and embattled, like a steep rock and a great, hard by the hoary sea, a rock that abides the swift paths of the shrill winds, and the swelling waves that roar against it. Even so the Danaïans steadfastly abode the Trojans, and fled not away. But Hector, shining with fire on all sides, leaped on the throng, and fell upon them, as when, beneath the storm-clouds a fleet wave, reared of the winds, falls on a swift ship, and she is all hidden with foam, and the dread blast of the wind roars against the sail, and the sailors fear and tremble in their hearts, for by but a little way are they borne forth from death, even so the spirit was torn in the breasts of the Achæians. But he came on like a ravening lion, making against the kine, that are feeding innumerable in the low-lying land of a great marsh; and among them is a herdsman that as yet knoweth not well how to fight with a wild beast concerning the slaughter of the kine of crooked horn, and ever he paces abreast with the rear or the van of the cattle, but the lion leaps into the midst, and devours a cow, and they all tremble for fear."

Our last extract shall be from the "Shield," a passage allotted to Mr. Myers:—

"Furthermore, he set in the shield a soft, fresh-ploughed field, rich tilth and wide, the third time ploughed; and many ploughers therein drove their yokes to and fro as they wheeled about. Whensoever they came to the boundary of the field and turned, then would a man come to each, and give into his hand a goblet of sweet wine, while others would be turning back along the furrows, fain to reach the boundary of the deep tilth. And the field grew black behind, and seemed as it were a ploughing, albeit of gold, for this was the great marvel of the work. Furthermore, he set therein a demesne-land deep in corn, where hinds were reaping with sharp sickles in their hands. Some armfuls along the swathe were falling in rows to the earth, while others, the sheaf-binders, were binding in twisted bands of straw. Three sheaf-binders stood over them, while behind, boys gathering corn and bearing it in their arms, gave it constantly to the binders; and among them the lord in silence was standing at the swathe with his staff, rejoicing in his heart. And henchmen apart beneath an oak were making ready a feast, and preparing a great ox they had sacrificed; while the women were strewing much barley, to be a supper for the hinds."

On the next page, we find a not very happy rendering, in "the herdsmen in vain tarred on their fleet dogs to set on." The repetition of "on" is awkward, and to "tar on" is a very unusual phrase.

A few pages, every one will wish that they had been more, of excellent notes have been appended to the translation. One, on vi., 169 (the story of Bullerophon), from the pen of Mr. Lang, states very forcibly the case for Homer's knowledge of writing.

We must not forget to mention the two fine sonnets which Messrs. Lang and Myers have given us by way of prelude. The second of these we take leave to quote:—

"Athwart the sunrise of our western day
The form of great Achilles, high and clear, Stands forth in arms, wielding the Pelian spear.
The sanguine tides of that immortal fray,
Swept on by gods, around him surge and sway,
Where through the helms of many a warrior fair,
Strong men and swift, their tossing plumes uprear.
But stronger, swifter, goodlier he than they,
More awful, more divine. Yet mark anigh;
Some fiery pang hath rent his soul within,
Some hovering shade his brow encompasseth.
What gifts hath Fate for all his chivalry?
Even such as hearts heroic oftener win;
Honour, a friend, anguish, untimely death."

TWO BOOKS ON IRELAND.*

THE subjects of the two works on Ireland we have bracketed together are very nearly as dissimilar as a disease and its cause. Yet they resemble each other in possessing literary and other qualities that are too rarely to be found in books dealing with matters on which beats the fierce light of controversy. Such titles as "The Irish Question" and "Cromwell in Ireland" suggest at first pamphleteering from the Parnell or the anti-Parnell, the Froude or the anti-Froude point of view. Happily, however, the authors of the books before us are better than their titles; possibly, indeed, they have risen superior to the temptations involved in them. Not, indeed, that Mr. King and the Rev. Mr. Murphy are without strong sympathies or decided opinions. The American professor has not been converted from democratic notions by his visit to this country; he is all for the Liberal and all against the Conservative methods of dealing with the Irish people and of solving the Irish problem. The Jesuit Father, again, accepts the Clarendon or "great bad man" theory of Cromwell. But both writers are so manifestly honest in their desire to get at political and historical truth, and have been so painstaking in their search for it, that they never allow their special views to interfere with the results of their industry, and the reader, for all practical purposes, loses sight of these altogether. What with visits to Ireland in 1831 and 1832, with listening to debates in Parliament, with reading all the important books on his subject, and with interviewing and obtaining special information from various important Irish authorities, including Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Mitchell Henry, the editor of the Contemporary Review, Mr. Parnell, and Mr. O'Connor Power, Professor King has done his best to show "how it strikes a stranger;" while, by an excellent series of appendices, containing the charter of the Land League, the No-rent and Archbishop Croke's manifestoes, and the texts of the Land, Coercion, and Arrears Acts, he has striven to give his book the character of a manual. Mr. Murphy's abundant foot-notes, on the other hand, are sufficient proof that he has gone through an amount of "literary buck-washing" that would have drawn groans from Carlyle himself. Although neither author writes brilliantly or attempts high political thinking, and although finality in respect either of Irish literature or of Irish legislation is but a vain dream at present, these books are of such a character that they transcend, and are morally certain to survive, the polemics of the hour.

We think none the worse of Professor King or of his book that he has no heroic remedies to offer for the woes of Ireland. The more stubborn factors of these problems, the partial solution of which he has witnessed, will, in his opinion, "yield only to patience, forbearance, kindness, justice, and the magic of prosperity." He has much sympathy with the Irish anti-landlord agitation, and has in some instances forgotten to take the statements of certain of the Irish "leaders" with the necessary grain of salt. Yet he thinks that a survey of the whole question will lead "most Americans" to the conclusion that "the English Liberals are, after all, the true friends of Ireland, and much more likely to promote the objects that the masses of the people desire, and that are needed for the peace and prosperity of Ireland, than the Conservatives." He asks very pertinently, "Would it not be far wiser for the Irish Party in Parliament to support the Liberal Party earnestly and fairly in its efforts to promote reforms, than to hinder and embarrass it, and so delay business as to excite the indignation of the English people, and hinder conciliatory measures?" There is shrewdness, too, of the statesmanlike kind that "dips into the future far as human eye can see," in his quoting from Peel's farewell speech as Prime Minister in 1846—a speech which is, perhaps, unique in our political history as a mine at once of prophecy and of practical suggestion—the passage which runs thus:—"There ought to be complete equality between England and Ireland in all civil, municipal, and political rights, so that no person viewing Ireland with perfectly disinterested eyes should be enabled to say a different law is enacted for Ireland, and on account of some jealousy or suspicion, Ireland has curtailed or mutilated rights." In fact, a perusal of Professor King's book strengthens the conviction that all that can be expected of British politicians in respect of Ireland is to aim at the ultimate realisation of Peel's ideal, and until that is in sight, to deal with each case of Irish grievance or difficulty as it arises, and strictly on its own merits or demerits. Mr. King goes over the old ground of eviction, absenteeism, and "Celtic tenure," saying such naive things as, "In the United States, no one questions a landlord's right to live where he pleases," and proves, perhaps more clearly than ever has been proved before, that while "English conquest" has much to do with the bitterness of the feeling in Ireland towards the sister-country, it is absolutely hopeless to think of going back to the communal or other land system that prevailed before that "conquest." The dealings of the Englishmen of the past with the Irish people are so saturated with injustice and unwisdom, as to compel their descendants, the Englishmen of the present, to be "long-suffering, slow to wrath, in mercy plenteous." But this fact should not induce them to enter on a career of historical romanticism, which could only end in confusion, if not in political chaos. The Irish, for whom Professor King has such sympathy that he quotes, apparently with approval, Mr. Arnold's celebrated characterisation of them, so unfavourable to ourselves, would do well to ponder what he says about Home-rule—the Home-rule of American fact, and the Home-rule of Celtic imagination—and such general statements as, "I have great doubts of their being able to live in harmony under any system of government they themselves would devise."

Mr. King is so cautious, and his book is so much of the character of a manual, that we find in it few theories and few statements of fact to challenge. Yet we think that in connection with the history of the events that led last year to the release of Mr. Parnell and his brother suspects, he should have named his authority for this statement, which appears on page 190:—"An Irish gentleman, who has for many years been engaged in Irish affairs, and has an intimate knowledge of Irish politics, and has been associated with Mr. Parnell in many matters, said to me recently, in explaining Mr. Parnell's letter and the conduct of the Government, 'The fact is, when Mr. Forster, by a tyrannical use of the Coercion Act, broke up the open organisation of the Land League, and suppressed open agitation, the Ribbonmen and other secret societies flourished, and got a powerful hold on the country, the Government was embarrassed, and Mr. Parnell from Kilmainham saw that he and his friends were losing their hold upon the people, and that other leaders were getting a powerful grip on the country. If matters went on in this way, it was evident that the Parliamentary party would lose its power. The result was the overtures to Government, and the Kilmainham letter.'" Then, again, Mr. King does not get rid so easily as he appears to think of the objections offered, both in England and in Ireland, to the "Castle" system of government, by noting the fact that the Dublin officials are chiefly "Irishmen appointed not for political or military reasons, but by examination." The chief objection to the "Castle" is that in practice it means one set of Irishmen with strong prejudices and special ideas governing another set of Irishmen with different and, indeed, antagonistic prejudices and ideas. Those amongst us, again, who are of opinion that the experiment of governing Ireland from London, and not by a Chief Secretary, but by an Under-Secretary, responsible to Parliament and to a Home Secretary for the Three Kingdoms, may be worth trying some day, support it on the ground that it would mean the bringing promptly to bear upon the problems of Irish administration and upon Irish "ideas" the fair-mindedness of Englishmen and the resolute reasonableness of Scotchmen, in an atmosphere untainted by Irish prejudice, Presbyterian or Catholic, Ribbon or Orange, from Belfast or from Tipperary.

The "Curse of Cromwell" means rather the Cromwellian Settlement in Ireland than, in spite of the horrors of Drogheda and Wexford, the actual Irish campaign of Cromwell, which began in August, 1649, and ended in May, 1650. It is of the campaign only that Mr. Murphy writes, although he finds it necessary in preliminary chapters to show the condition of the great political parties, both in England and Ireland, before Cromwell made his appearance in the character of Protestant scourge. From the newspapers of the day, from the narratives of eye-witnesses, actors, or sufferers in the tragedies of these terrible months, above all, from Cromwell's own letters, numerous and full of details, Mr. Murphy has compiled a narrative of his doings, and the doings of his lieutenants, from his landing at Dublin to his setting sail from Youghal. It is an old story that is told in this volume, but seldom if ever has it been told so fully, or with such an accumulation of proof in regard to every incident. It may fairly be said that Mr. Murphy has proved beyond all possibility of doubt that Mr. Froude has totally failed in his attempt to minimise the Drogheda and other butcheries, and has also shown, from the speeches of Pym and from Puritan pamphlets, that these were thoroughly in accordance with, and, indeed, the fruit of the theological spirit then dominant in England. Cromwell's own intention, as a military and political tactician, was to strike terror into the hearts of the Irish Catholics, while, as is proved by his manifesto on landing at Dublin, which is given by Mr. Murphy, his hope was to gain the hearts of the native and humble Irish by affording them protection, and insisting, in his tremendously effective way, on his soldiers being fair in all their transactions with them. He was wonderfully successful, too, mainly, perhaps, on account of the wretched morale of the Irish leaders of the time. This—the weakness of Ormonde, the vacillation, unscrupulousness, and "saleability" of Inchiquin and Broghill—Mr. Murphy's pages bring into startling relief. Owen Roe O'Neill, the chief of the Ulster Catholics, was much above his colleagues, or rather rivals, alike in heart and head, and his mysterious death removed from Ireland the only soldier who might have proved an obstacle in Cromwell's path. Yet even he saw nothing immoral in coquetting with both Royalists and Parliamentarians. Mr. Carlyle has quaintly speculated on what might have been, had Cromwell been a Scotchman by birth. Ireland is the land of historical and tragic might-have-beens, and one can hardly help wondering, after reading Mr. Murphy's book, what would have been Ireland's fate, had she "raised" a Cromwell of her own, instead of being "cursed" to the latest day by one from England.

AN AFRICAN NOVEL.*

WE do not know whether The Story of an African Farm is its author's first book or no, and this uncertainty makes our criticism more hesitating than it would otherwise be. If this is a first book, it would incline us to think the author capable of very good, if not very great things. He writes clear, grammatical, and even graceful English. He has the gift of putting unfamiliar scenes and circumstances before us vividly, instead of piling up words in the vain effort to do so. He is not without humour—though there are passages in the book which, taken separately, would suggest that he is—and finally, he can understand partially and sketch lovingly a character whose simple goodness is the natural outcome of the Christianity which he apparently rejects. All this would make us disposed to say to a new writer, "Go on and prosper," for the faults of his work are such as experience and good-sense may easily rectify. But if those faults are the results of a confirmed habit of thought, it is a great pity, for the book is much above the limits of the common-place, and we should be glad to see another with all its virtues and without its defects.

By far the cleverest, most interesting, and most original part of The Story of an African Farm is that which justifies its title. The farm, a remote one, appropriately called "Korje Alone," is in temporary possession of a Boer woman, widow of its late English owner, and guardian of his daughter and niece. "Tant Sannie" is capably drawn, and one soon becomes intimately acquainted with the fat, lazy, superstitious woman, keen after her interests, easily imposed upon by flattery, vindictive when offended, but not generally ill-tempered, sitting motionless for hours with her feet on a stove (apparently a kind of "scaldino"), and drinking coffee from morning till night. She is a widow for the second time, and is quite prepared for a third matrimonial venture, as soon as her stepdaughter shall attain the age of seventeen, and become mistress of the farm. In the meantime, she finds and dismisses a lover, whose portrait is one of the defects of the book. He is a most repulsive compound of Mr. Chadband and Mr. Alfred Jingle, painted with strokes so broad and black that his originals fade into the most delicate colours beside him. But when Tant Sannie's "fixed period" does arrive, her wooing is characteristic.

It appears that an "upsitting" is a necessary preliminary to a Boer wedding,—that is to say, the betrothed, or about to be betrothed, pair are expected to sit up together for a whole night, while the rest of the household are quietly reposing. Tant Sannie's Kaffir maid looks out one evening, and sees a horseman approaching:—

* The Story of an African Farm. By Ralph Irons. London: Chapman and Hall.

"The coloured woman, having duly inspected him, dashed into the dwelling. 'Here is another one,' she cried, 'a widower; I see it by his hat.'—'Good Lord!' said Tant' Sannie, 'it's the seventh I've had this month; but the men know where sheep and good looks and money in the bank are to be found,' she added, winking knowingly. 'How does he look?'—'Nineteen, weak eyes, white hair, little round nose,' said the maid. 'Then it's he! then it's he!' said Tant' Sannie, triumphantly; little Piet Vander Walt, whose wife died last month,—two farms, twelve thousand sheep. I've not seen him, but my sister-in-law told me about him, and I dreamed about him last night.' Here Piet's black hat appeared in the doorway, and the Boer woman drew herself up in dignified silence, extended the tips of her fingers, and motioned solemnly to a chair. The young man seated himself, sticking his feet under it as far as they would go, and said, mildly, 'I am Little Piet Vander Walt, and my father is Big Piet Vander Walt.'—Tant' Sannie said solemnly, 'Yes.'—'Aunt,' said the young man, starting up spasmodically, 'can I off-saddle?'—'Yes.' He seized his hat, and disappeared with a rush through the door.—'I told you so! I knew it!' said Tant' Sannie. 'The dear Lord does not send dreams for nothing. Did not I tell you this morning that I dreamed of a great beast like a sheep, with red eyes, and that I killed it? Was not the white wool his hair, and the red eyes his weak eyes? and my killing him meant marriage. Get supper ready quickly; the sheep's inside and roaster cakes. We shall sit up to-night.' Nevertheless, when all the rest of the house had retired, when the long candle was lighted, when the coffee kettle was filled, when she sat in her elbow-chair, with her lover on a chair close beside her, and when the vigil of the night was fairly begun, she began to find it wearisome. The young man looked chilly, and said nothing. 'Won't you put your feet on my stove?' said Tant' Sannie.—'No, thank you, aunt,' said the young man, and they both lapsed into silence. At last, Tant' Sannie, afraid of going to sleep, tapped a strong cup of coffee for herself, and handed another to her lover. This visibly revived both.—'How long were you married, cousin?'—'Ten months, aunt.' 'It's very hard when we must give our husbands and wives to the Lord!' said Tant' Sannie. 'She was such a good wife, aunt; I've known her break a churn-stick over a maid's head for only letting dust come on a milk cloth.' Tant' Sannie felt a twinge of jealousy. She had never broken a churn-stick over a maid's head. 'I hope your wife made a good end,' she said. The next morning at dawn, as Em passed through Tant' Sannie's bedroom, she found the Boer woman pulling off her boots, preparatory to climbing into bed. 'Where is Piet Vander Walt?'—'Just gone,' said Tant' Sannie, 'and I'm going to marry him this day four weeks. I am dead sleepy,' she added; 'the stupid thing doesn't know how to talk love-talk at all,'—and she climbed into the four-poster, clothes and all, and drew up the quilt to her chin."

Unfortunately, neither Tant' Sannie nor her stepdaughter Em is the heroine of the story. That post is filled by Em's orphan cousin, Lyndall, who is attractive as a pretty and thoughtful child, but becomes quite tiresome in her womanhood. Not that she is common-place. She is, on the contrary, very remarkable in her actions, though more loquacious than wise in her words. She is one of those lovely creatures, generally supposed to be invented by female novelists, with whom every man must needs fall in love, and she is fully conscious of her power. "Look at this little chin of mine," she says, "with the dimple in it. I can win money with it; I can win love; I can win power with it; I can win fame." She does not, however, win any of these, except the second, and that not of the most creditable or comfortable kind. After robbing Em of her betrothed, Gregory Rose, she goes away with a mysterious stranger, wanders about the Transvaal with him, leaves him, and dies, by no means of a broken heart. The oddest part of her history is that Gregory, having traced her, and found her lying ill at a country inn, disguises himself as a woman, and nurses her for weeks, or months, without being ever suspected either by her or by the doctor. To this episode we decidedly object.

Lyndall, it has been said, talks too much. Another character, perhaps, thinks too much. This is Waldo, the son of Tant' Sannie's German overseer. For the greater part of the first volume, this boy is charming, and he never quite ceases to be interesting. He is a sort of dumb poet, unable to express his feelings and fancies, otherwise than in wood-carving of a primitive order. The son of a deeply-religious and simple-minded father, Waldo as a child goes through the sort of religious experience not very uncommon to imaginative children. He prays, and is wretched because he finds no visible or immediate answer to prayer. He despairs and trusts and despairs again, and in the description of his perplexities and wretchedness there is power and vividness that make one feel it to be true, though only a part of the truth. But before the end of the first volume the boy's honest questionings are replaced by a vague, chilly, and yet high-flown philosophy, and the interest he has inspired almost dies out.

The Story of an African Farm has the merit of being in two volumes instead of three. We are inclined to think that if it could be reduced to one by the almost complete excision of Lyndall and the cutting-short of Waldo's meditations, it would be entitled to a high rank among recent novels. But it is quite probable that these are the very last portions Mr. Irons would be willing to cut away.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Tinsley's Magazine, for June, contains two sketches (besides the continuous stories, which we have not as yet attempted) that are very good; Miss Dillwyn's "sketch of an unladylike girl," called "One June Night," a fresh, vigorous, and admirably told incident in the life of an "out-of-doors girl," as we should have preferred to call her; and also "An Unforeseen Conclusion," by S. S. Dexter, an American sketch of considerable spirit. Lady Bulwer Lytton's "Reminiscences of Walter Savage Landor" are also very amusing, especially of his wrath with Ben Jonson, for being admired so much as he was by a generation whose imaginations ought to have been taken up with Shakespeare. It is a very good number of Tinsley's.

Women are Strange, and Other Stories. By F. W. Robinson. (Chatto and Windus.)—Mr. Robinson tells his stories like the veteran novelist he is. They are all interesting in a comfortable, not over-absorbing way, though they take us into queer places and among queer people. It is not very clear why the first story should be entitled, "Women are Strange," for in reality the men it introduces us to are quite as strange as the women. It deals chiefly with theatrical personages and matters, and the author scarcely seems so much at home among them as among the City clerks, river-side watchmen, waiters, and wandering musicians, who tell the other stories. It is probably very difficult to make a music-hall waiter tell a tragical story without putting into his mouth language too correct to be quite natural, but we think the attempt might be made with more success than it is in the case of the head waiter at the Apollo. On the other hand, there is a narrative by a merchant's clerk of the worst type which seems to be very true to life, in the vulgar self-assertion and petty dishonesty the teller is made to show in every sentence. As these tales are, of course, merely reprints, they have probably already reached most of the readers for whom they were intended—we fancy Mr. Robinson's audience is largely American—and it is scarcely necessary now to speak of them in detail.

Kingsthorpeiana; or, Researches in a Church Chest. Edited by J. Hulbert Glover, M.A. (Elliot Stock.)—Mr. Glover, Vicar of Kingsthorpe, near Northampton, has printed here a calendar of certain documents existing in the church chest of his parish, and ranging in date from 1346, when Edward III. granted a right of free warren to Ralph de Drayton, to 1705; and he has also given the documents themselves, in extenso and verbatim. The most interesting of them refer to the subject which is suggested by King Edward's grant. The "ground game" question was very much to the front in the middle of the sixteenth century. A certain Sir Thomas Tresham and his keeper, Thomas Latham, raised the head of, "conyes" to a point which the Kingsthorpe people could not endure. A commission was sent down to hold an inquiry, and some very curious evidence was produced. Henry Tanner deposes that, forty years before, one Thomas Aylmer did "accustomably kyll conyes in the feldees of Buckton and Rysford, both with his long-bow, his dogge, ferrett, and purse-nette;" and that he would never ride between Northampton and Buckton "but that he would have his cross-bowe hangyng at his saddle-bowe wt. hym, to the intent to kyll conyes by the waye." He himself had killed conyes with his bow, and his dog, without denial of any keeper. Now, the conyes had turned up two hundred acres of grass-land. Thirty acres of corn land was left fallow, "for fere lest it should be destroyed wt. conyes." The common was so damaged, that the "bests and cattel of the inhabitants of Buckton ben almost sterved and redy to dye for hunger." Worst of all, in the churchyard of Buckton the conyes had "dygged up many mennys bones, that it is dangerous for men to go in it, for breaking of their necks." Keeper Latham seems to have been a masterful person. He "made assaute of Master Williams, because he was wont to walke in the feids of Boughton with dogges, and there slewe the said Williams." He even seems to assaulted the chantry priest of Boughton, Sir John Chese, for hunting in the warren. The cause was tried at Westminster, and three of the chief inhabitants of Kingsthorpe went up to London to look after it. Their expenses, which are recorded in detail, came to something over £9 (this for a stay, including a journey of nearly five weeks). Fees and presents also were defrayed out of the same sum, but their counsel was satisfied with three shillings and fourpence. Counsel, by the way, seems to have done solicitor's business. Mr. Glover deserves our thanks for the careful way in which he has done his work. We wish that other rectors and vicars would follow his example.

We have to notice two new volumes of the series "The English Citizen." (Macmillan and Co.) The State in its Relation to Trade, by T. H. Farrer, touches on one of the most difficult questions of modern life. Though the volume is, in the main, explanatory and descriptive, it sometimes becomes polemical. Mr. Farrer speaks of the late Professor Stanley Jevons' work on the "Relations of State to Labour," and finds himself "more averse to central State interference" than he was. Nevertheless, after describing the various modes in which the State interferes with trade—and it is astonishing to see their multiplicity, when they are thus enumerated—he comes to a general conclusion that "the chief feature of the system is as much individual freedom as is consistent with the welfare of an organised society." This does not prevent him from criticising the system in various details; and this criticism seems, on the whole, judicious. At the same time, we take leave to differ from what he says about literary copyright. Mr. Farrer was the inventor, we suppose, of a proposed stipulation in the negotiations for international copyright between this country and America which met with an unanimous disapproval from authors and publishers. His main article of faith in this matter is "cheap books," but he fails to take into account the extraordinary unwillingness of the British public to buy books, however cheap. Books are always the smallest item in the average Englishman's expenditure, and the first retrenched.—Local Government, by M. D. Chalmers, is a lucid statement of a system which almost incredible complications have made obscure. Mr. Chalmers gives some alarming figures about local expenditure, which has increased in the last twelve years from £29,000,000 to £50,000,000. This is, indeed, calculated to cause anxiety, if it be true that the total rateable value of the property on which this burden is imposed is not more than £183,000,000, on which there is, as Mr. Chalmers reminds us, a first charge of £4,000,000 for tithes. This gives nearly 40 per cent., or eight shillings in the pound. Can this be true? One has heard of rates approaching this sum, but the cases are rare.

Croesus's Widow. By Dora Russell. 3 vols. (John and Robert Maxwell.)—Nora Sudeley, who loves and is loved by William Vyner, an artist, is induced to marry the wealthy John Treloar, induced by a downright falsehood, which seems to pass the limits which even an unscrupulous match-maker would allow herself. Mr. Treloar dies, leaving her all his wealth. Hence she becomes "Croesus's Widow." But the real heroine of the book is Nellie Blythe, who marries an impecunious and unscrupulous young nobleman, one Lord Seaforth. The marriage is runaway and secret; and after a while, Lord Seaforth, finding his debts pressing more and more hardly upon him, resolves to ignore it, and to marry the wealthy widow who, by skilful manoeuvring on the part of mutual friends, has been made to look favourably upon him. Miss Russell tells the story very well; in fact, this is as well constructed and as interesting a novel as we have seen for a long time. And while all the characters are drawn with creditable skill, two or three are very vigorous sketches indeed. Campbell of Strathearn, with his great, manly heart, is a striking contrast to the weak and selfish Lord Seaforth; and Joannah Brewis, who, half against her will, shows kindness to poor Nellie in her trouble, is, in another way, full as effective a personage. We are glad to find that there are no signs of exhaustion in Miss Russell's work, large as is the quantity of it which she gives to the world.—Milicent's Story. By Fayr Madoc. (Macmillan.)—The setting of this tale is excellent. Delysford, a sort of "Sleepy Hollow," which the movement of the world has quite left behind, and Delysford people, who cannot conceive of happiness as existing outside their own borders, and speak with the pitying epithet "poor" of the young woman who has made an excellent marriage with a stranger, are described with a quiet humour which is highly entertaining. The merits of the tale itself are but indifferent. René du Lys and his sister are the last representatives of a noble family which came over with the Conqueror, while the Tremaines are descendants of the first Du Lys' barber. The family of the barber has contrived to acquire all the property of their noble employer, all but one house, which several generations have coveted in vain. The last Tremaine hopes to secure it from the last Du Lys by means of his daughter, whom Du Lys loves. But Milicent du Lys sacrifices herself, by accepting Mr. Tremaine's hand on the condition that her brother should be allowed to marry Amy Tremaine without the condition of parting with his ancestral property. This is a story which is neither probable nor attractive, and the natural repugnance excited by it is not removed by the prospect of seeing the lands of Du Lys come back to their original possessors. But when we get away from the story, and read what Delysford folk thought about the world, we are sure to be entertained.

The History of Scarborough. By Joseph Brogden Baker. (Longmans.)—Mr. Baker has collected a great mass of information in this volume. Some of it is valuable and interesting, some of it might have been profitably retrenched. All would have been set forth to more advantage by a better and more orderly arrangement, and by the addition of what it is really surprising to find wanting in such a volume,—an index.

Farm and its Inhabitants. By Rachel C. Lowe. (Privately printed.)—"Farm," originally called "Owen's Farm," has been the dwelling-place of the Lloyd family since 1758. In this volume we have pleasant and profitable reminiscences of them, and of their visitors. The Lloyds have been Friends now for many generations, and forward in all the good work, public and private, with which Friends have been wont to occupy themselves. Of their visitors from the outside world, Samuel Johnson is, perhaps, the most famous. He went there with Boswell in 1776, and missing his friend Hector, was very glad of entertainment from the Lloyds. After dinner he had a fierce argument about baptism, suggested by "Barclay's Apology." The family tradition is that he threw the book upon the floor, and stamped upon it. Next morning he apologised, in this characteristic fashion,—"I say, Lloyd, I'm the best theologian, but you're the best Christian." A very interesting volume this, which should have more than the private circulation for which it seems to have been intended.

To insure insertion, Advertisements should reach the Publishing Office not later than 12 a.m. on Friday.

SPECTACLES V. BLINDNESS.

"Spectacles can only be perfectly adjusted by those having a thorough knowledge of the anatomy of the eye, combined with optical experience."

WE have the highest Medical Authorities, confirmed by daily experience, that imperfect glasses, together with the haphazard plan of selection generally employed by the mere vendor, is the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Sir JULIUS BENEDICT writes:—"I have tried the principal Opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have adapted suit admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others,
is really surprising." The Rev. Professor W. A. Hale, M.A. Cantab., 3 Minford Gardens, West Kensington Park, writes:—"The Spectacles are perfect, and a most decided boon. I had occasion on Monday to write to Lord —, and took the opportunity to mention your name, and the wonderful power of your Spectacles." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age
right eye." Testimonials from Earl and Countess Lindsay; F. D. Dixon Hartland,

The popularity Pepsine has acquired as almost a specific for chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, &c., is due to the fact that it is the nearest possible production of the active principle of the gastric juice of the stomach. Unfortunately, like all other inventions of a like nature, Pepsine has been not slightly discredited by the spurious manufactures that have been issued from time to time; it is therefore necessary as a guarantee of its efficacy to see that each bottle bears the maker's name.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

PRINCE BISMARCK, in despair at his Parliamentary defeats, has at last compromised with the Centre. On Tuesday a Bill of six clauses was introduced into the Prussian Diet, under which the obligation of the Bishops to notify to Government all candidates for benefices is abolished, so far as any priests are concerned not holding what the English would call "livings." Curates, chaplains, and adjoints are all exempted from the law. The clergy, moreover, are allowed to appeal in clerical questions to the Minister of Public Worship, who is flexible, instead of the Ecclesiastical Court, which is rigid. If the Government objects to the presentee of a benefice, its reasons must be stated, and all penalties on priests administering the Sacraments in vacant parishes are abolished. The Bill has been received in Rome with delight, and the Liberals declare that it repeals the Falk Laws, which is substantially true. The Bill will, of course, be passed, the mere anticipation of it having given the Chancellor a victory for his Sick Fund Bill, which, often rejected, was carried by 216 to 99.

Nothing is settled as to peace or war between France and China. On the one hand, the expedition to Tonquin has started, and the Marquis Tseng, the Chinese Ambassador to England, who is now in Moscow, has informed the Havas Agency that if it lands without a previous arrangement with Pekin, war is certain. The Chinese Government would recognise the Treaty of 1874, and would open up Yunnan to French trade; but it would insist on protecting the King of Anam, and on a formal recognition of its own suzerainty. As this suzerainty is specifically and constantly denied by M. Challemeil-Lacour, this would mean immediate war; but on the other hand, Li Hung Chang, the statesman entrusted by the Pekin Government with the defence of Tonquin, dreads Europe, and has, it is reported, suggested an acceptable compromise to M. Tricou, who has arrived at Shanghai, on his way to Pekin. The French Chamber, too, is getting uneasy at the prospect of a serious campaign, and would have no scruple in dismissing the Foreign Minister, and accepting any agreement which would avert hostilities. According to the most recent telegrams, Hanoi, too, had been relieved, by the arrival of 600 French, and time has therefore been gained for negotiation. The probabilities are that the French will land, that a petty victory will be gained, and that everything will then be allowed to languish.

The Times' correspondent, who evidently reflects official opinion in Paris, states that he has "solid reason" to believe China will not declare war on France, but will confine herself to blocking and fortifying the river which gives access from Tonquin into Yunnan. At the same time, he intimates that the King of Anam is expected to defend himself, and that it will, therefore, be necessary for France to take possession of the entire kingdom, which her statesmen believe, on very little evidence, to be full of minerals, and of land fitted for plantations. This statement is made in all sincerity, for the writer disapproves the project, which he thinks accidental in its origin, and calculated in the end to exhaust France, without yielding her any sufficient advantage, and it is quite in accord with the facts. The French Ministry evidently expect serious resistance, and are not only shipping Marines in greater numbers than they intended, but have warned a regiment of Rifles now in Algeria to be ready for service, and are discussing means of raising their Colonial Army, which is raised by voluntary enlistment, to 30,000 men. They will, it is stated, shortly ask for a second credit, but they are making no provision that we see for their great danger,—the depletion of their ranks by disease. The troops will, unless much better medical arrangements are made, be prostrated by fever and dysentery.

Mr. O'Kelly attended in his place in the House of Commons yesterday week, as ordered by the House, but did not at first seem at all disposed to give the pledge not to proceed in the matter of his challenge to Mr. MacCoan, M.P. for Wicklow, which the House required. He made a hectoring little speech. "I do not care much," he said, "about the opinion of this House, or the opinion of this country,"—though our flag was once valuable to him, if he was the man whom it protected from death in Cuba at the hands of the Spaniards. "But," said Mr. O'Kelly, "I do think a good deal about the opinion of men of honour who live outside this country, with many of whom I have, during the better part of my life, had intimate relations. I believe that men of honour outside this country will justify me in the position I have taken; but so far as the junior Member for Wicklow is concerned, I see no reason why he should have thought well to bring this matter before the House, because he had already placed himself beyond any risk that might have arisen through my action, by declining to meet me. Sir, my opinion of a man who deliberately offers an insult to another, and then deliberately refuses either to apologise or to afford reparation, is that that man, by that act, falls out of the category of honourable men, and is therefore no longer worthy of attention from any man." Mr. Gladstone thereupon, after remarking that Mr. O'Kelly's slight respect for the House of Commons "is not perhaps a matter on which the character and dignity of this House will, in the main, ultimately depend," insisted that Mr. O'Kelly had not given the undertaking required; whereupon Mr. O'Kelly rose again, and declared that he had intended to say that after the receipt of Mr. MacCoan's letter, he considered the matter practically at an end. Mr. Gladstone and Sir S. Northcote accepting this as an assurance that hostile proceedings were to be dropped, the discussion terminated, Mr. O'Kelly having compensated himself by an affront to the House of Commons and the British nation, who care nothing about it, for his reluctant promise to let Mr. MacCoan alone.

The Corrupt Practices Bill was read a second time on Monday without a division, the Tories and Liberals alike approving, though the former think the Bill too severe. This is true as to agency, as we have argued elsewhere, a candidate being disqualified for contesting a particular seat for seven years, in punishment of an offence which may have been committed by an agent in the teeth of his instructions. This will, doubtless, be omitted in Committee, but the easy passing of the Bill is by no means certain. Mr. Parnell sees that many Tories are on his side; and, therefore, proposed in Committee on Thursday that Ireland should be omitted from the Bill. It was not wanted there, he said, and would impose on candidates the necessity of employing agents. The Irish Judges, moreover, would interpret the Bill unfavourably to popular candidates. His motion was defeated by 243 to 31, but the Irish see a stalking-horse in the Bill, and will propose innumerable amendments, which must all be discussed. It should be observed that they accepted the much more severe Bill of last year, but of course they are not bound to be consistent.

The immense festivities in Russia have not been entirely unbroken. The Times' correspondent intimates that some incidents occurred even in Moscow which it is not advisable to report just yet; the German papers assert, though this is denied, that the Mayor of Moscow asked for a Constitution, and was peremptorily exiled; and a riot occurred in St. Petersburg, so political that it is believed the Czar will make no state entry into the city. It is certain that the Czar, in a speech to the Marshals of the nobility, strongly repudiated the idea of making political concessions, and that no constitution of any kind will be granted. There is evidence that the Imperial grants at the coronation are not considered sufficient, and that discontent is wide-spread, though we can scarcely believe that it has infected the Army. The author of "Underground Russia," however, in a letter subsequent to the one we quoted last week, affirms that this is the case, that Alexander III. is disliked in the Army, that large numbers of the officers in the regiments quartered in great cities are regularly enrolled in revolutionary clubs, and that they are bound by oath to march, when the signal arrives, with all the soldiers they can control. Their idea is to demand a Constitution. That military revolutions have occurred in Russia is true, and that some officers are Revolutionists is probable, but that such a movement could be formidable is difficult to believe. The soldiers are only peasants in uniform.

A number of telegrams have reached England this week intended to hint, with more or less of obscurity, that the Sultan has been intriguing against the British in Egypt. According to the story, he has employed for this purpose his private secretary, Kadri Bey, who has been living in Cairo as his representative. Kadri Bey, it is alleged, has been instigating disturbances. The matter was brought before the Embassy in Constantinople, the recall of Kadri Bey was demanded and granted, and he is not to be replaced. Kadri Bey has clearly been recalled, but the Sultan's motive in intriguing is not clear. He can hardly hope to gain anything unless he changes the Khedive, and he cannot possibly do that without obtaining British consent. It is quite as possible that he was only watching the movement towards an Arabic Kaliphate, which is said to have revived, and that Kadri Bey, while organising his forces against that idea, became suspected of intriguing against the Egyptian Government. Whatever its object, the Sultan's policy has once more failed.

Lord Rosebery has resigned the Under-Secretaryship of the Home Department. It is announced that he has no difference with the Government, and only desires to facilitate the appointment of a Commoner, as the Liberals in the debate of Thursday week appeared to wish. This was confirmed by Sir W. Harcourt on Thursday, in language of unusual strength, the Home Secretary even talking of his "affection" for Lord Rosebery, and is of course true, even though Lord Rosebery may also have felt hurt at Sir W. Harcourt's rough assertion in the debate of Thursday week that he had only been appointed for a moment as a sop to the Scotch Members. Mr. Hibbert has been selected for the vacant office, and Mr. G. Russell, Member for Aylesbury, has been appointed Under-Secretary to the Board of Trade. Mr. Russell is quite young (only thirty), is a Member of the Woburn family, and is a Radical of promise. He speaks well, thinks clearly, and has an individuality about him apt to be wanting in men of aristocratic birth and strongly popular opinions. He will be a gain to the official world, which wants backbone as much as anything.

Lord R. Churchill made nothing on Friday week by his attack on the discipline of the Civil Service. His motion, technical in form, in reality meant that Civil Servants might combine to bring pressure to bear on Members of Parliament in regard to their pay and promotion, and was discussed on that basis. Lord Randolph, of course, argued that orders forbidding such combinations were tyrannical, but was sharply told by Sir Stafford Northcote that he knew nothing about his facts. "I do not think," he said, "I ever heard a speech which for its length contained so many misstatements." Sir Stafford defended the sound doctrine that while Civil Servants, like others, may make general statements of grievances, they may not combine for their own special advantage. This was supported by Mr. Childers, who complimented Sir S. Northcote on his "admirable speech," and by Mr. Gladstone, who declared that the attempt to influence Parliament in regard to salaries was "intolerable" and fatal to economy. Mr. Gladstone also defended the appointment of Private Secretaries to good posts in the service, which Lord Randolph had attacked, as a just promotion of invaluable men, specially defending Sir S. Northcote, who had appointed his son to the Board of Inland Revenue. On the division, Lord Randolph Churchill had only 37 votes, against 120.

In spite of the severe snubbing which Lord Randolph Churchill received from Sir Stafford Northcote yesterday week, his Jack-in-the-box elasticity displayed itself in a speech at Chatham, to Mr. Gorst's constituency, last Wednesday, a speech in which he said most truly that, "if all the Conservative Members were as active as Mr. Gorst, the Government would not have such an easy task as they now have in ruling the country." If all the Conservative Members were as active as Mr. Gorst, the only possibility of ruling the country at all would be to follow in Cromwell's steps, and "take away that bauble" before the Speaker's chair. Lord Randolph, who showed his statesmanship by proposing to reduce the Army, to cut £5,000,000 off the estimates for the Civil Service, and either to abandon Egypt or to annex it, professed to be in great difficulty as to the meaning of 'veiled obstruction.' The meaning is very simple. The veiled obstruction of the Conservative party consists in this,—that it throws its veil over the obstruction of Lord Randolph Churchill, Mr. Gorst, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Mr. Warton, and the rest of the Conservative Obstructives. But since Sir Stafford Northcote's "Thermopylae" speech, it can hardly be called "veiled" obstruction any longer. That speech openly exulted in Conservative obstruction, and if that speech is to bear fruit, open obstruction it will become.

Lord Lytton, Mr. David Plunket, and Lord George Hamilton made a threefold attack on the Liberal party, at a meeting of the Middlesex Conservative Association held at Willis's Rooms on Wednesday night. Lord Lytton described the tremendous victory obtained by outraged facts over Liberal principles, and assured his party that "the day of dupes" was drawing to its close. Mr. Plunket declared that "curses, like chickens, came home to roost," and appeared to regard Mr. Bradlaugh as the most homesick of these chickens, as well as the most unwelcome to the Liberal party. Lord George Hamilton dilated on the wickedness of importing emotion and hysteria into party politics, taking great pains to illustrate practically the mischiefs of emotion and hysteria by his own very violent and very unreasonable speech. Lord George Hamilton felt sure that Middlesex, which had so long resisted the charms of "eloquent humbug," would be soon backed up by the decision of the constituencies at large. The tone of all three speakers was that of men gloating over the spoil they are just about to seize upon, and almost "fey" with the delights of their premature anticipations. For them, at least, the day of dupes is not very near its close.

Mr. Bass, one of the Liberals who gave no vote on the Affirmation Bill, and who is now beginning to feel the need of repose, has since resigned his seat for Derby, and Mr. Alderman Roe has been selected by the Derby Liberals as his successor. Mr. Alderman Roe expresses full confidence in the Government, and declares himself in favour of the Affirmation Bill,—a striking comment on Mr. Bass's conduct in withholding his vote. A Conservative opposition was talked of, but it is now thought more probable that Mr. Alderman Roe will be returned unopposed. This is significant enough, for in Derby Evangelical opinion runs high.

The subject of Mr. Errington's representations to the Pope was renewed on Thursday by Lord R. Churchill, who did his best to make Mr. Gladstone ridiculous for his thoughtful little speech on Garibaldi, at Stafford House last Saturday, Lord Randolph representing it as a monstrous inconsistency that a statesman, who is not unwilling to avail himself of the Pope's aid in restoring social order in Ireland, should yet speak with public appreciation of so great an enemy of the Papacy as General Garibaldi. Mr. Gladstone, in reply, remarked that what he said at Stafford House was almost altogether on Garibaldi's private character,—the union in him of exceptional valour with exceptional horror of war; and, indeed, it would be absurd if a statesman whose whole career has been so blended with the restoration of Italian freedom and self-government as Mr. Gladstone's, were to be debarred from rendering a simple tribute of respect to a great Italian patriot, solely because he is very glad to help the Pope in making any effort to suppress outrages and assassinations in Ireland. One of the Irish Members was not ashamed to identify Garibaldi's name with the cause of assassination,—one of those monstrous accusations which only bring disgrace on those who make them. Lord Randolph Churchill's razzia produced, of course, no effect. The Government, however, recognise that Mr. Errington's personal exertions at Rome have been important enough to render it desirable to keep a record of them at the Foreign Office.

The Parisians have been amusing themselves with a paper in the Figaro, in which a serious writer, M. Leo Lavedan, professes to reveal "the secret of Bismarck." The German Chancellor, he says, has framed the Tripartite Alliance in order to dismember France. Germany would under this plan take the remainder of Lorraine, including Nancy; Italy, Nice, Savoy, and Corsica; Belgium, French Flanders; Switzerland, Chablais; and Spain, Roussillon. Austria is apparently to get nothing, but would presumably be compensated with territories in the Balkan, while England would receive a French port. The story, which involves the previous conquest of France in a war of pure aggression, during which England would look on benevolently, and would snatch a port on the Continent, is obviously absurd, but the French study it with avidity. It is possible that M. Lavedan has got hold of some scheme of Prince Bismarck's, sketching out what he would do if France, under a restored monarchy, were to attack Germany and to be totally defeated, but the Germans are not going to spend their children in scores of thousands to make the fortune of Italy.

The House of Lords had a debate on Tuesday on the Cathedral Statutes Bill, of which the Bishop of Carlisle moved the second reading—a debate made memorable by a powerful speech of the Bishop of Peterborough's, not on the Cathedral Statutes Bill, but on any kind of attempt at ecclesiastical legislation during the existence of Liberal Administrations, which he vehemently deprecated and condemned. His chief object was to represent the Liberal Government as the covert enemy of the Church, and to take immense credit for the Church for her neutrality between the two great political parties in the State; but his speech, full of power as it was, tended to discredit effectually both the impressions which he desired to produce. In the first place, it was evident that the Church, as represented by her other prelates,—the two Archbishops, the Bishop of Carlisle, and, apparently the Bishop of London,—desire to pass the Bill which the Bishop of Peterborough denounced, and that the Government are favourable to it, which, so far as it goes, does not look as if the Liberal Administration were a covert enemy to the Church, but rather as if the Bishop of Peterborough were an open enemy. In the next place, the Bishop, who took so much credit for the neutrality of the Church in politics, made almost as sharp an attack on the Liberals as Lord Randolph Churchill himself, and a much cleverer one; and this suggests significantly in which direction the Church swerves from neutrality. Dr. Magee is a great orator, and in a sense persuasive; but then, he persuades us to take not his side, but the other. He delights us very much, and completely convinces us that on his own showing he is altogether in the wrong. The Bill was read a second time, without a division.

The Grand Committee on Law has completed its consideration of the Criminal Appeals Bill, and got to work on the Criminal Code Bill, which it is hardly possible, however, to suppose that it can get through during the remainder of the Session. Not only have a vast number of Irish amendments been proposed, but Mr. Warton and Mr. Paget,—not the Mr. Paget who represents South Leicestershire, but he who represents Mid-Somerset,—neither of whom is an authority in law, propose such a number of amendments, and speak so repeatedly, that the Attorney-General is said to have described the measure now under the consideration of the Grand Committee as "a codification of the English Criminal Law by Messrs. Warton and Paget, assisted by distinguished amateurs." It is just possible that, without the aid of Messrs. Warton and Paget, the Criminal Code Bill might be passed this year. With their aid, it cannot even come within a measureable distance of becoming law.

A curious story comes from Pesth of a society of six lads, between sixteen and eighteen years of age, who agreed together to throw all their spare money into a common fund and spend it in a great carouse, after which they very naturally found themselves in straits, and came to the conclusion that they could not get out of the scrape better than by a collective act of suicide. For this purpose they had only a single six-chambered revolver. One of them, Rumbauer, a wood-engraver of seventeen years of age, asked leave to begin, and shot himself in two places, inflicting very grave wounds which may prove mortal, but not killing himself. The spectacle of his physical anguish horrified four of the six, and they crept away to Pesth; while the sixth, Liszka, a musician and a boy of only sixteen, attempted to follow Rumbauer's example, but only inflicted on himself a slight wound, and was able to make his way to a friend's house, to whom he explained what had happened. If the intention of collective suicide had been serious, it would have been more easily attained by the use of a little dynamite; but the truth is that the pleasure-loving temperament which determines on such a mad course as this, is not the temperament best fitted to carry out the grim design of suicide, collective or otherwise. The lusts of the flesh are not ascetic, and do not fit men for suicide, or any other resolute infliction of pain on one's own body.

Sir G. Bowyer, for a long time a Member of Parliament, a Knight of Malta, and a Companion of various other foreign Orders, died at his chambers in the Temple on Wednesday night. He was a rather learned lawyer in some departments, and showed a considerable amount of moral courage as M.P. for the county of Wexford in repudiating the Home-rule party, when its leader went beyond what seemed to him the limits of a constitutional agitation. He became a Roman Catholic in 1850, and remained staunch to that faith to the end. He was, indeed, one of the bitterest foes of the Italian Revolution in the House of Commons, and often measured swords with Mr. Gladstone in the years following 1860, on the subject of Italy. His knowledge was greater than his ability, but his tenacity of purpose earned him general respect.

In the Convocation of the University of Oxford on Tuesday, the vote of £10,000 for Professor Burdon Sanderson's physiological laboratory was carried by a very narrow majority of 3, 88 voting for it and 85 against. Professor Burdon Sanderson avowed again the very same principle which he avowed before the Commission of 1875, that while it is wrong to inflict any unnecessary suffering on animals, it is often necessary to inflict suffering for the purposes of physiological investigation, and that any suffering, however keen, which is inflicted for a sufficient purpose, is rightly inflicted. That Professor Sanderson regards every purpose as sufficient which recommends itself as sufficient to a carefully-trained physiologist, there can be no doubt; and we do not question that Professor Burdon Sanderson would entirely justify Professor Rutherford's eight hours' torture of some scores of dogs, operated on without anæsthetics, for the purpose of discovering the effect of various drugs on the secretion of bile. That a physiologist of these views should be authorised to introduce vivisection into the heart of Oxford, where boys and girls who never see the worst experiments, will certainly hear of them, and know that they are sanctioned by the full authority of the University, seems to us nothing short of a national calamity. We wish we could hope that the vote might yet be rescinded.

A startling rumour has arrived from Ireland that the Police have discovered evidence that the Invincibles used poison. They poisoned, in particular, a hotel-keeper named Jury, who had accidentally opened a letter which contained information dangerous to "No. 1." The story is denied, and seems dreamy, though it is true that Mr. Jury's body has been exhumed, but it has brought out a curious phase of opinion. The Freeman's Journal is horrified at the insult to Ireland involved in the charge. Why is it an insult, any more than the charge, admitted by the Freeman, that certain Irishmen killed certain other Irishmen, on political grounds, with knives and pistols? Where is the difference, either in morality or honour, between the use of a pistol from behind a hedge or of a knife to an unarmed man, and the use of prussic acid? Both are murders and both have the same motive. That the character of Ireland is injured by such a charge is true, but so also it is injured by the whole proceedings of the committees of assassination. Are we to have a special version of the Commandment,—“Thou shalt do no murder by drugs?”

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

LORD ROSEBERY'S RESIGNATION.

LORD ROSEBERY'S resignation of his Under-Secretaryship does not signify much in itself, because in the form which the Government is assuming no resignation signifies very much. People wonder a little at the slight effect produced by the secession of men like the Duke of Argyll, Mr. Bright, and Mr. Forster, all of them Ministers of the first force and all of them representative men, and every now and then some Tory says or writes that such losses must ultimately be fatally felt. In truth, however, though the individual is not dwindling in politics—think of Germany without Bismarck—the importance of individual Ministers is. In France they are shadows, in America names, in Germany clerks. This Government, like the one which preceded it, sheds Ministers without pain or injury,—not because, as its enemies say, it is so molluscous that it feels no change of structure; and not because, as its friends say, it is a tree too full of vitality to miss even healthy branches, but because it derives its power from a constituency so extensive that it hardly recognises persons. Whoever goes or comes except Mr. Gladstone, there is “Mr. Gladstone's Government,” erect and untouched, and that for the Householders is sufficient; as also, when Lord Carnarvon seceded, “Lord Beaconsfield's Government” sufficed for them. Cabinet Ministers, being human, would be rather tried, we fear, if they knew how many of the electors recognise only one name in the Cabinet, or at most two or three, or how many more would fail in the effort to repeat the names of the Governing Committee, entrance into which is such a prize. Lord Rosebery's departure, therefore, would matter little, even if he had been a Secretary, which he was not; and if he had gone off angry, which is by no means the case. Lord Rosebery's Liberalism is of a very staunch quality, and he will be back in a short time, and remain a steady supporter, and not a candid friend, in the interim. Still, he is a man of unusual abilities, great power of speech, being nearly, if not quite, the only humorous Peer, and of special position in Scotland, and we should like to know a little more exactly why he resigned. The official explanation is that another Under-Secretary was wanted to aid Sir W. Harcourt in the Commons; and, no doubt, that is true, but then is it the whole truth? Any Secretary of State is glad of help, but the Department is not overworked just now in the House, and though it is overworked in the Bureau, where, for example, Sir W. Harcourt has elaborated his London Bill, Lord Rosebery could give as much help there as any other man, and much more than most. It looks as if there were something else, and as the “else” is not any secret revolt of Lord Rosebery from a Government he cordially approves, we have a little human curiosity to know what it is.

We might not feel that curiosity, but for the rumour, repeated everywhere, and on Thursday emphatically denied both by the Home Secretary and by Lord Rosebery, that Sir W. Harcourt was glad to be rid of his Under-Secretary. The denial disposes of the rumour, but it does not dispose of the state of affairs which made the rumour seem probable, and induced even serious politicians to believe it. Mr. Rylands, whose function just now is to exude rather vitriolic criticism on his political friends, who have perhaps felt his priggishness as much as his untiring laboriousness and zeal, raised a discussion on Thursday week on the question whether the Under-Secretary for Home Affairs ought not to be in the Commons. The Radicals below the gangway, who did not care a straw where he was, but who are a little sick—not unnaturally sick—of the preference still accorded in politics to the caste, cheered Mr. Rylands; and Sir W. Harcourt remarked, in his most aggressive manner, that Lord Rosebery's appointment had never been intended to be permanent, and that it was “only a sop to the Scotch Members.” It was instantly, and not unnaturally, believed that Sir W. Harcourt thought Lord Rosebery's appointment bad. As the Home Secretary must agree to the appointment of his subordinate, he had, we suppose, a right to make the remark, though it would have seemed more in its place from the Premier, who represents the appointing power; and its ungraciousness is only a mistake of manner, which the House regards as a trait of individuality. Still, it cannot be denied that the remark was unexpectedly crude in form, and suggested, with other things, that Sir W. Harcourt's own idea of his own place in the party is very high. He does not, of course, think of himself as Mr. Gladstone's heir, for that is Lord Hartington's position; but Lord Hartington has always a coronet hanging over him, some day to crush his head, and it is quite conceivable that the ultimate leadership of the Liberals in the Lower House is already an object of ambition. We hope it is not, for we want a long term for Lord Hartington, and dread the dissolving influence of such ambitions, and their tendency to induce men who feel them to push against all rivals; but still, it may be. Even Americans catch the Presidential fever, and we know of nothing in Liberalism which should exorcise human nature, or induce a man to reject the instinctive thought that if justice were done, and all men were wise, and circumstances were favourable, he would be a long way up the hill towards the top of the world. It is quite possible that two or three “leaders” are thinking of the future, and dreaming dreams, or even conceivably laying far-sighted plans.

And yet it must be unjust to Sir William Harcourt even to fancy that he dreams of himself as Leader in the House of Commons. With his keenness and experience of men, and long habit of the House and of politics, he must be well aware that, unless he changes greatly, no such leadership will come to him. He has quite sufficient power of oratory, though he makes, for a leader, the mistake of using the whip too often, and of exasperating opponents needlessly; he is a fair, or we may even say successful, administrator; and he may have proved himself, in this coming London Bill, a legislator of some acumen and largeness of view. But he has never established sympathetic relations either with the party or the country, never excited the smallest enthusiasm, never left the quite essential impression that he is a representative man. Whom or what does he represent, except Sir William Harcourt? He either has so few convictions, or he has allowed so few to manifest themselves, that men doubt to this day, after his long and, on the whole, successful public career, whether he is Whig, or Liberal, or Radical in his sympathies, or whether, indeed, he has any; whether he does not think, with his friend Lord Beaconsfield, that a statesman should use ideas, but not be governed by them. Nobody would know, if the Queen sent for him tomorrow, what his Government would be like, what would be its tendency, or what ends it would seek, except, possibly, the passivity in Ireland which is so often mistaken for peace. It is not that the views of a Harcourt Administration would be unknown, for that often happens, but that its tone would be undiscoverable in advance. It would not even be Opportunist, for Sir William Harcourt can occasionally, when events press sharply and men grow excited, be inopportune. We have nothing, as matters stand, to say in reprobation of his intellectual position. There must be a Times in every Cabinet. Liberalism, like every other system of ideas, benefits by the adhesion of clever men; and the Member for Derby makes as good a Home Secretary as we shall find. But in that position a man, unless he has, like Lord Beaconsfield, a separate and unmistakable genius, rarely finds solid foothold in this country; and Sir William Harcourt has not got it yet. If he seceded to-morrow, men within the House would be interested, and Tories would be delighted, because a most dangerous Free-lance was at liberty again, and there would be hard knocks going, and Ministers would be worried; but the constituencies would be quiescent. They are not to be moved in our days by cleverness, however remarkable, or speech, however sharp, or manœuvring, however adroit, but only by certain forces of character which we should find it hard to define, but which all politicians will allow that the Home Secretary either does not possess, or does not display. He could lead the Lords well, because the Lords, granted certain conditions of birth and knowledge of the world, greatly appreciate intellectual cleverness, and listen to oratory like Sir W. Harcourt's with a sense of sipping champagne. The fizz is pleasant to them, as well as the flavour. But to lead the Commons is to lead the constituencies, and the constituencies ask something—call it character, or morale, or the stream of tendency which makes for steadfastness, or what you will—which they do not see in Sir William Harcourt. They do not distrust him so much as they feel inclined to ask seriously what are the reasons for trust. Sir W. Harcourt is not the man to be a self-deceiver, and must see all this far better than we can; and, therefore, we disbelieve that he exaggerates the position which, from his ability, his standing as Minister, and his undoubted cleverness, must belong to him. If he does, he will find, and his colleagues will find, that he has reckoned without the people, who now-a-days make leaders of the Commons by a very direct, though informal, method of election.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH ON THE CHURCH.

THE Bishop of Peterborough compares the position of every ecclesiastical reform proposed to the House of Commons, to that of a chubby little boy left for the first time remote from loving parents and sisters in the play-ground of a great school, and rapidly surrounded by treacherous playmates, who, under the disguise of deep interest in his welfare and his person, proceed to all the well-known amenities of crushing his hat over his eyes, pulling his hair, pinching his arms, chalking "ass" upon his back, and overwhelming him with every kind of practical joke and indignity. The picture was a lively one, and suggests to us that Dr. Magee must once have understood perfectly the art of making the early school experience of chubby little boys severely instructive to them. Even now, if some well-known Dissenter should be made a Peer, we do not feel quite sure whether Dr. Magee might not find it in his heart to revive in some more dignified, though not, perhaps, less exquisitely painful form, on the stage of the House of Peers, those innocent tortures which he so well remembers and so graphically describes. But however this may be, we cannot remember that any Bill for the real reform of the Church of England has been treated in the House of Commons in the manner which Dr. Magee so vividly and significantly suggests. No doubt, such Bills when sent down very late in the Session to the Lower House have been snuffed out by the Radicals, who insist that all ecclesiastical measures shall be fairly discussed, and not slipped through sub silentio in thin houses at the fag-end of a Session; nor do we think that Radicals are greatly to be blamed for insisting on such full and adequate discussion. But it is easy to recall ecclesiastical Bills which have been most fairly treated by the House of Commons,—the Bill, for instance, giving power for the amendment of the old Table of Lessons; the Bill for altering the form of the clergyman's adhesion to the Articles and Prayer-book; and most of all, we should say, the Burials Bill, in relation to which we wholly deny the Bishop's statement that it was desired by the enemies of the Church, and deprecated by its friends. As for the enemies of the Church, everybody knows that the passing of the Burials Bill was a serious blow to the Disestablishment agitation, and that many of the Liberationists avowed their regret that they were losing the help of so substantial a grievance in their campaign against the Establishment itself. Moreover, if the laity of the Church of England, as distinct from the clergy, could have been polled, there is no manner of doubt that an immense majority of them desired to see the passing of the Burials Bill, for the very reason that they regarded it as an act of justice which would tend to restore the Church to her true position as the Church of the nation. Doubtless, some of the laity and some of the national Clergy objected to that Bill, just as some of the laity and almost all the clergy objected to the Irish Church Disestablishment Bill; but in both cases alike the true friends of the Established Church saw clearly that, so far from the Church suffering by this measure of justice, a most telling weapon was in each case struck out of the hands of the advocates of Disestablishment and Disendowment. So far is it from being true that the Liberal party in the House of Commons object on principle to all measures which render the Church of England more popular, that we sincerely believe the worst ecclesiastical measure passed within recent years,—that measure for "putting down Ritualism" which had the assent of the great majority of the Bishops,—was passed solely in the view, a very short-sighted view, we confess, of meeting the popular demand, and removing one of the most unwelcome features in the services of the Church of England. So far as we can judge from close observation of the House of Commons, the Bishop of Peterborough's ideal Dissenter—can he, by the way, name the man, or is he a mere legend?—who piously prayed that the Church of England might grow worse than she then was, in order that she might stink in the nostrils of the English people, has absolutely no existence amongst the Radicals of that House. When they oppose an ecclesiastical reform brought forward in time for a full discussion, it is not because they fear that it may improve the Church of England, but because it is, in their opinion, a change for the worse.

"The Church of England," says Dr. Magee, "has not yet earned from the Prime Minister the dubious and unfortunate compliment that she is the backbone of the Liberal Party." Certainly not; and such speeches as Dr. Magee's show why she has not earned that compliment. She is not only not the backbone of the Liberal party, but so far as her Bishops and Clergy are concerned, she must be said to be the backbone of the Conservative Party. We do not deny, of course, that there are exceptions to this rule, that in the mind of the Bishop of Exeter, and, perhaps, of the Bishop of Oxford, there may be a true sympathy with the great masses of the people; that there are a few clergymen who, like the Dean of St. Paul's or Canon Liddon, or Mr. Llewelyn Davies, think of the true interests of the innumerable poor first, and of the numerable rich afterwards; but on the whole, the Clergy of our Church are "the backbone" not of the Liberal, but of the Conservative party, and anything more contrary to fact than to speak of them as in any sense "neutral," which was the mild word chosen by Bishop Magee to describe their attitude towards the two great political parties in the State, we cannot well imagine. There are clergymen—we hope Dr. Magee is not one of them—who, if they had been asked to anticipate the Beatitudes, instead of giving them as St. Luke gives them, would have put them all the other way; who would have described as the grossest Socialism and Radicalism our Lord's blessing, "Blessed are ye that hunger now, for ye shall be filled. Blessed are ye that weep now, for ye shall laugh. . . . But woe unto you that are rich, for ye have received your consolation. Woe unto you that are full, for ye shall hunger. Woe unto you that laugh now, for ye shall mourn and weep," and who would have described this as the partisan blessing bestowed by a bitter revolutionist on the dregs of the earth. Indeed, it is because the Liberals,—some of them, no doubt, without the least sympathy with the religious motive of our Lord's blessings, more of them, as we hope, in the eager desire to realise the full force of that religious motive,—attempt to diminish the great gulf, both physical and moral, which separates the rich from the poor, that the dignitaries of the Church of England look down upon them with such profound distrust, and even contempt. Mr. Gladstone was unfortunately right when he described the Dissenters as the backbone of the Liberal party in England. And it is not because we cannot afford to resist Dissenters, as Dissenters, but because we cannot afford as Liberals to resist those who wish to do something towards attenuating the awful contrast between the lot of the poor and the lot of the rich, that we must recognise the greater number of Dissenting Churches as the backbone of the Liberal party. It would indeed be a good day for England if the clergy of the national Church ever became as truly national, as truly neutral in mere politics, as heartily willing to take up a Liberal measure if it promises to win our poor to a better spirit, as even Lord Shaftesbury, whom we regard as, in this sense at least, much more of a Christian than a politician. It is the bias of all who hold sway in the national Church in favour of the petty oligarchy of the rich, which keeps our Church where she is in popular esteem. If there were men in her who, like a very few of the Evangelicals, more of the Broad Church, a few of the High Church, and the greater number of the small party of extreme Ritualists, appear to know nothing of party ties when they interfere with the deeper spiritual ties, there would be none of the coldness towards the Church of England in the House of Commons, of which Dr. Magee complains, but which he does the best that his genius and eloquence can do, to increase. The neutrality of the Church, indeed! Why, Dr. Magee and most of his brother-prelates are about as neutral in politics as the prelates of the Church of France are neutral in any contest between the Republic and the White Flag. Which would be the more difficult to the majority of our English Prelates,—to believe their Christianity mistaken and their politics true, or to believe their politics mistaken and their Christianity true? Let them answer that question to themselves honestly, and judge by it which is the deeper in their character, the Conservative politician, or the Christian disciple.

PRINCE BISMARCK AT CANOSSA.

PRINCE BISMARCK has at last discovered that artillery, however scientifically constructed or carefully served, is of no avail against ghosts. The Roman Catholic Church, though without a soldier, has beaten him and all his forces, and after a struggle of nine years he has retreated from his position. The essence of the "May Laws," by which the Chancellor hoped to impose upon the Roman Catholic Church the yoke of the State, was contained in two clauses, one prohibiting the appointment by the Church of any priest to any office without previous notification to the Ministry of Public Worship, and the other punishing the administration of the Sacraments in proscribed parishes by unauthorised priests. The Chancellor calculated that between these two provisions Catholic parishes would, if Rome were obstinate, be left empty, and that the people, deprived of all the Offices, would either become schismatics, or would apply such pressure to Rome that the Papacy perforce must yield. The plan seemed at first sight astute, but the method of coercion was in reality singularly ill chosen. Upon the notification, Rome could have yielded, but she was bitterly reluctant to yield. A priest's sanctity is not impaired by a secular acknowledgment of his qualifications, which is to the Church pure matter of indifference; but in recognising such assent as necessary, the Vatican would have given too strong a weapon to its foes. Any scheme of education, any method of teaching, almost any variety of opinion might have been fostered by the State, by the simple expedient of rejecting all candidates who dissented from the official views. Rome, therefore, refused to yield, and then the second proviso came into play. Parish after parish was left vacant, and no "unauthorised priest" could perform the ceremonies in lieu of the beneficed clergy, until over large sections of the country the holy offices were almost unattainable. It is said that in no less than a third of Catholic Prussia when the Sacraments are required it is matter of difficulty to find a priest, and that very often the only resource is to risk the penalties of the law. This state of affairs should, on the calculation, have increased either schism or discontent with Rome, and on those two results Prince Bismarck had relied; but he had forgotten two elements in the question, the character of his people and the tradition of the Vatican. The German Catholics were as obstinate as German Protestants had ever been. Instead of becoming schismatic, they became much more religious; men who had previously been indifferent feeling that, under direct persecution of this kind, they must in honour as well as from morality cling to their Church with a new fervour. Rome, again, though sorely vexed by what she regarded as "heathenism" in so many parishes, could not even attempt to yield. She might have notified her candidates to the State, but to admit that the substitutes for them, the missionary priests, could lawfully be subjected to punishment for performing their most imperative religious duties, was on the face of things impossible. The Church might as well have denied her divine mission altogether, renounced her independence, and recognised human laws as necessarily and rightfully above the laws of Heaven. We cannot conceive how the Ministry of Public Worship, which must know the theories of the different creeds, could have expected concession on this subject, and half suspect that Herr Falk intended to introduce an impossible proviso into his statutes, so that, as they could never be accepted, the quarrel might become irreconcilable. Rome, of course, did not retreat, the German Catholics adhered to Rome with new fervour, and Prince Bismarck found that their entire voting strength of more than a hundred Members was steadily thrown against him. Utterly baffled, unable to secure a majority for any proposal, and aware that in one-third of the kingdom discontent was growing shrill, the Prince offered compromise after compromise, only to be met in Rome by a smiling immovability which led him on one occasion to hint a wish that the Papacy still had territorial possessions. His very last offers—offers carefully revised by the King, who has never been hearty in the Kulturkampf—were rejected, and then at last, eager for votes in favour of his biennial Budget, he gave way. He "did not go to Canossa," as he proudly avers, but he did introduce a Bill which we shrewdly suspect is regarded in the Vatican as establishing a system preferable to the old one.

By the fifth clause of this Bill, the penalties imposed on Missionary or other priests for administering the Sacrament in proscribed parishes are abolished, and the effect of the May laws upon the people is finally destroyed. Rome leaves no member of her flock without the offices, except upon compulsion; and the people do not care who provides them, provided only he is a priest acknowledged by the Church. The absence of the regular priesthood, therefore, signifies nothing, except an inconvenience to the Bishops, who have to find too many Missionaries, and the whole efficacy of the May Laws is destroyed at a blow. They become mere opinions, without effective sanction. Prince Bismarck has, however, gone further than this. He not only proposes to legalise the functions of Missionary priests, but by the first clause of his Bill he surrenders the claim of the State to a notification whenever the candidate is not irremovable,—that is, whenever the priest is "adjoint," or curate, or chaplain, or anything except the regular incumbent of a benefice. The effect of this is that every parish in which the regular Catholic pastor is inhibited or absent can at once be supplied by an adjoint selected by the Bishop, and removable by him at will; and Rome loses, by resisting the laws, nothing but a trifling stipend. If every parish were empty, she would lose a moderate amount in cash, but gain a priesthood absolutely submissive of necessity to her disciplinary orders. That is triumph, not defeat, and we do not wonder either at the exultant tone of the Roman organs, or at the wailing statement of the Liberals, that this is surrender all along the line. So it is. It would positively be less advantageous to Rome to have the May Laws definitely and permanently repealed. She gains in authority, gains in prestige, and yet keeps the vague but real advantage which every Church acquires from appearing to labour under petty and irrational persecution.

Two thoughts will, we think, suggest themselves to all politicians who study this Bill, which, we may add, is sure to pass, as the Conservatives, Ultramontanes, and Poles when acting together possess a clear majority in the Chamber. One is the old one that persecution is, in our day, a stupidity; and the other is, that the Papacy has gained strength in some directions from the loss of its temporalities. As to the first, we have little to say, Englishmen having nothing to learn, except that the Prussian instance is a nearly perfect illustration of the old truth. There never was a country in which persecution could have a better chance. The Catholics were lax in opinion, careless in discipline, prejudiced against Italians. The anti-Catholics were two-thirds of the people, and had with them the most powerful of European Governments, the majority of the "educated," two-thirds of the Parliament, and a military force so irresistible that resistance to the law was not so much as thought of. Nevertheless, persecution failed, as it invariably fails when the persecutor dare not extirpate those who differ, and the only result was to strengthen slightly the persecuted Church. That is the unvarying teaching of history, and it is as applicable to dissidents from Protestantism as to dissidents from Rome, and should be remembered in trials for blasphemy as fully as in discussions on anti-Catholic legislation.

On the other point, however, there is a word to be said. This is the first occasion on which the Vatican, since it was deprived of its temporal power, has fought a great State, and it is clear to all observers that, because of the absence of that power, the Papacy has been more powerful. Prince Bismarck could do nothing against his enemy for want of leverage. Had the Pope been King still, he could have sent ships to Civita Vecchia, or threatened a siege of Rome, or have stirred up insurrection within the Pope's dominion, and the Curia, though it could not have yielded, would have been enfeebled and in bonds. As it was, it was free. The ruler of Germany could do nothing against his unarmed opponent, except excite a dangerous fear in part of his own subjects as to the safety of their souls. His forces were paralysed by the absence of other forces to oppose them, and he was left in the absurd position of a man who is ordered to arrest invisible foes by aid of a cordon of policemen. Rome had nothing to fear, and, therefore, Rome could wait; and the Church which can wait is, as against every foe but opinion, that is against every foe less spiritual than herself, an unconquerable Church.

THE VIOLENCE OF PARTY FEELING.

IT is a curious fact that the Conservative speakers who most vehemently condemn Mr. Gladstone for what they call the violence of his Midlothian speeches, themselves use language in comparison with which the language of the Midlothian speeches is leniency itself. As a matter of fact, those who have really studied these speeches know that speeches more devoid of personalities, more strictly limited to a manly condemnation of a policy which Mr. Gladstone held to be morally wrong and politically mischievous, were never delivered than the speeches delivered in Midlothian. The Conservatives, however, who are always speaking of those speeches as initiating a new era of violence in politics, do whatever in them lies to make good their position by the extreme passion with which they now attack the object of their animosity and, we fear, of their envy. Thus, only last Wednesday Lord Lytton spoke of Mr. Gladstone as having at first denied the existence in Ireland of those criminal conspiracies of which he "afterwards encouraged the development." That seems to us equivalent to a charge against Mr. Gladstone of the blackest treachery and treason,—certainly not the sort of charge which has any tendency to diminish the party passion of which, when it comes from their antagonists, the Conservatives complain. Again, Lord Lytton says:—"I think the day of dupes is drawing to its close, and the hour of reckoning is at hand. They [the Liberals] may still make their great feasts and drink before thousands of their followers; their soothsayers in the Press may prophesy to them smooth things, and praise those brazen political idols to which they have sacrificed the honour of the country, but the retributive hand has written 'Mene, mene,' upon their walls; they have been weighed in the balance and found wanting; their incongruous kingdom is divided at the core, and the power of its mischief is passing away from it." That, too, is hardly language which has a tendency to bring back a tone of moderation into politics; indeed, it is only excuseable on the principle that all political language may be violently over-coloured without producing any more of the effect of over-colouring, at the distance from which ordinary politicians survey the political scene, than the painting-up of actors' complexions produces the effect of over-colouring on the spectators in the gallery and the pit. On that principle, we should find little fault with Lord Lytton's language,—which, no doubt, he does not really mean us to accept without deducting a very large discount for theatrical effect,—but then, on the same principle, how can he find fault with the Liberal attacks on the late Government, especially with Mr. Gladstone's, which are almost reduced to the character of mild expostulations, when compared with the violent abuse to which he and his Government are now subjected? At the same meeting, we find Mr. D. Plunket, usually an extremely moderate man, speaking of the present Administration as "the Maniac Ministry." And Lord George Hamilton proceeded to echo Lord Lytton, describing Mr. Gladstone's victory in 1880 as gained "by the denunciation of patriotism, and the encouragement of sedition and discontent." And yet these are in no degree remarkable speeches. Lord Randolph Churchill has frequently spoken with infinitely greater violence,—violence to the point of fury, if there were not so much appearance of manufacture about the fury,—than either Lord Lytton, or Mr. Plunket, or Lord George Hamilton. It may be said to be the regular course of a Conservative speech of to-day that the orator begins by accusing Mr. Gladstone of turning Lord Beaconsfield out of office by a series of the grossest misrepresentations of his policy, and continues it by travestying in the most marvellous manner the policy which he affects to condemn,—that is, by so depicting the policy of the present Administration, that no one who had simply followed it with the eye of an impartial historian could well recognise what it was that the orator was describing.

It is an interesting question whether this exaggerated tone of speech be really due at bottom to the democratic extension of our Constitution, and the necessity for broad effects and glaring colours in order to impress the masses at all, or whether it be due only to a false theory that such broad effects and glaring colours are needful in order to popularise an otherwise unpopular policy. We are inclined to adhere to the latter view. We do not doubt that Liberals, like Tories, have often been guilty of a good deal more party violence than was at all justifiable, though we do wholly deny that Mr. Gladstone, or any, indeed, of the elder Liberal chiefs, have been guilty of such violence. Mr. Gladstone's speeches in Midlothian, and Lord Hartington's speeches in Lancashire, are models of manly but carefully-reasoned party criticism. Nor can we find any trace that the masses of the people prefer to hear violent language from the leaders, to hearing restrained and carefully justified criticisms. Lord Beaconsfield undoubtedly had a theory in favour of personalities, and indulged in them, not from passion, but from policy,—as when he referred to Mr. Gladstone as no better than the Bulgarian atrocity-mongers. But though, of course, he got cheers and laughter when he perpetrated these savage personalities, as any man of position will always get cheers and laughter for attacking his political opponents mercilessly, it is extremely doubtful whether he really added to his popularity by his political personalities. At least, Lord Salisbury, who has taken up the same line, has not inspired so much confidence among his party as Sir Stafford Northcote, who always abstains from this sort of acrimony. Again, are not Colonel Stanley and Mr. Stanhope of more account than Sir R. Cross or Lord George Hamilton, just because Colonel Stanley and Mr. Stanhope are very measured in their speech, while Sir R. Cross is impulsive and rash, and Lord George Hamilton deliberately unmeasured in his declamation? Again, on the Liberal side of the House, we venture to doubt very seriously whether the men who are at present regarded as the hardest hitters ever inspire so much confidence as those who are regarded as the most guarded and careful critics. Does Sir William Harcourt, for example, with all his brilliancy, inspire half as much confidence as Mr. Childers, who never indulges in personalities at all? Does Mr. Chamberlain, who shows at times a rather dangerous wit, inspire so much real confidence amongst Radicals as Sir Charles Dilke, who is as self-restrained as he is cautious and accurate? Why, again, is Lord Hartington better trusted than any one in the Cabinet except Mr. Gladstone? Is it simply because he is a Duke's son, or mainly because all his statements have the air of being carefully weighed, accurately expressed, and free from all exaggeration? It seems to us a great mistake to believe that in England, at present at least, violence tells half as well as moderation. Amongst the Radicals, again, does violence seem to have any special popularity? Where is there a more moderate speaker than Mr. Burt or Mr. Broadhurst? Do Mr. Henry Fowler and Mr. Dillwyn gain the confidence of Radicals which they so completely enjoy by any violence of language? The truth appears to us to be that there are no really violent speakers in the House on the Liberal side, and that those on that side who wound the most, are probably the least trusted by the Liberals; while the few violent speakers on the Conservative side, though they may have gained notoriety by their violence, have not gained the confidence of the people at all. Lord Beaconsfield's theory, that in order to win the Democracy you must lay on the colour thick and draw your lines with exaggerated violence, seems to us, like most of his political theories, altogether false. The English people are amused with invective, but it does not inspire them with confidence. We believe that what they look for is rather force of character than anything else; and in general, force of character is much better guaranteed by moderation than by violence. Of course, there are exceptions to either rule. There is a moderation which is vacillation in disguise; and there is violence which is carefully calculated, like the late Lord Beaconsfield's. But, on the whole, strong men are moderate men; and when it is so, their moderation is positively liked, and not disliked, by the British people. As for the Irish, we say nothing. But even in Ireland, the one man most trusted by his party, violent and dangerous as he has been in action, has been conspicuously the most moderate of them all in talk; while even in action he has probably felt himself compelled by his colleagues to go beyond what he himself desired.

ELECTIONEERING AGENCY.

THE debate on the second reading of the Corrupt Practices Bill was characterised, as is usual on such occasions, by an edifying unanimity as to the necessity of doing something to secure purity of election. But there is undoubted truth in Mr. Lewis's remark that legislation undertaken under an impression on both sides that something must be done generally turns out very bad legislation. The check ordinarily supplied by Opposition criticism is weakened, and men are afraid of saying that a punishment is too severe, or that it is likely to fall on the wrong head, lest they should be suspected of wishing to shield really guilty persons from any punishment whatever. The difficulty is increased in the case of a Corrupt Practices Bill by the necessity that exists of punishing one man for another man's sins. There is no escape from this, because if a candidate were only made to suffer for his own offences, he would never suffer at all. There is not the least necessity, in a well-managed election, that the existence of corruption should ever be brought to his knowledge. Agents are ready to do everything that is wanted in the way of bringing the electors to see the merits of the candidate by whom they are employed, and they must be very new to the work, if they cannot manage to hide from their employer whatever it is expedient for him to remain ignorant of. Consequently, it is indispensable that the rule of justice which limits a man's criminal responsibility to things which he has either done himself, or been privy to in others, shall undergo some modification in the case of corrupt practices at elections. At least, if it is not modified, we may as well give up the hope of making elections any purer.

On the other hand, if this doctrine of constructive responsibility is pushed too far, it is certain to work its own defeat. Judges and jurors will not be made the instruments of a law which they hold to be unjust; or if once in a way they consent to be so used, the public are so shocked by the inconsistency of punishing one man for doing what a score of others do and escape scot-free, that the law is at once amended. The extension of the customary rule that seems best to meet the case, is that a candidate should be held answerable not merely for what he does, or was privy to, but for what he might have prevented, had he chosen to take the necessary trouble, or make the necessary sacrifices. For example, suppose that a candidate is at the pains to inquire into the ordinary methods of bribery, and gives specific orders to all the men whom he knows to be his agents that not one of these methods shall be resorted to. The agents are afraid that if they disobey this direction the candidate will refuse to pay the bills they present, and they consequently take care that their employer's wishes are scrupulously carried out. By-and-by, when the candidate has been returned, and a petition is presented, it turns out that some of these methods have been resorted to by men whom the candidate did not know to be working on his behalf, and over whom he had no possible control. Those who are learned in the history of Election petitions are well aware that when political passion runs high in a constituency, men will often be found willing to spend their own money, and take their chance of ever getting it back. Though they are members of the candidate's committee, the bribery of which they are guilty is not committed in their own persons, and so the candidate never suspects that it is going on, until he discovers that under the doctrine of constructive agency he has lost the seat, by reason of things done by men of whose very existence he was ignorant. As regards the loss of the seat, we see no help for him, for unless the doctrine of constructive agency is very severely interpreted, a candidate who is not averse from bribing, if he can but bribe safely, would be able to do pretty much what he likes. But it is a different matter when we come to criminal liability. To subject a man to punishment over and above the loss of his seat, for things in which he really is not in the least concerned, has an obvious injustice about it which is not calculated to build up a sound public opinion on the subject.

The present form of the Bill is less severe than the form in which it appeared last year, and the chief inconvenience to which an agent can expose an innocent candidate is disqualification for representing the constituency in Parliament. No doubt, that is a milder penalty than imprisonment; but to a politician it may be still a very severe penalty. It is true that where a candidate has been reported guilty of corrupt practices by his agents, this disqualification goes no further than the particular constituency. It is only where the candidate is personally guilty that it extends to all constituencies. But to many men, disqualification for a particular constituency is tantamount to disqualification for all constituencies. They have really no chance of being returned, except for the one constituency with which they are locally connected. The instance mentioned by Mr. Lewis certainly seems hard. An agent takes a voter to the poll in a carriage. He knows very well that the conveyance of voters is illegal, but he sees that if the man is left behind he will probably not come to the poll at all. And he tells him to jump in and be carried there. The act is so innocent in itself, and may be so innocent even in an election agent, that it may be committed without the least corrupt intention. Yet to prove the absence of corrupt intention may be impossible, and for want of such proof, a candidate may not only lose his seat, but be disqualified for standing for that constituency for seven years. Would not the loss of the seat be penalty enough for an act so trifling, and, possibly, so harmless? It may be quite right that a man should not gain by an illegal act done on his behalf, even though it be done by some one he does not know, but is it necessary that he should lose by it? Must his position at the end of the election be not only no better, but positively worse than it was at the beginning? If the Corrupt Practices Bill is to pass in its present form, it ought at least to be accompanied with some limitation of the doctrine of Agency. There is Lord Bramwell's authority for saying that as it stands the law is very harsh in its bearing upon the candidate, that by it men have been unseated "under very cruel circumstances." If this harsh law remains unaltered and the Corrupt Practices Bill undergoes no amendment, these cruel circumstances will become decidedly more cruel. The loss of the seat will be followed by inability to contest the same seat for seven years. We have no desire to make corruption a less dangerous offence. It is because we have no such wish that we suggest a modification of the Bill. In so far as definition of corruption or the punishment allotted to it becomes more rigid than the public conscience bears out, corruption will be a less dangerous offence. Convictions for it will be less certain, because in many cases what is called corruption in the Statute will not be regarded as corruption, even by those who are genuinely anxious to see elections made purer. It ought not to be impossible to devise methods of disclaiming Agents or forbidding specific acts of agency which should exempt a candidate at all events from the penal consequences of conduct which he had honestly, and as he believed successfully, endeavoured to prevent.

THE FAILURE OF RECRUITS.

TWO points strike us strongly and painfully in the Lords debate of Monday on Recruiting. One is, that there is even now no consensus of opinion as to the comparative advantages of long or short service; the other is, that we have even now not succeeded with all our immense expenditure, in making service in the Army attractive. As to the first, the facts are almost unintelligible. The country was under the impression that although some old officers still murmured, and although the Duke of Cambridge still expressed his hunger for a conscription, and although there was a serious question as to the youthfulness of the men, the Short-service system had, upon the whole, succeeded. Recruiting had doubled, as compared with the old system, the ranks were fairly full, indeed slightly in excess, and the Reserves had risen to 35,000 men, who responded at once to any call for active service. The Egyptian Expedition was believed to show that the Army, though still insufficient, could be mobilised with rapidity and ease. Now, it appears that this impression was delusive. The rank and file are short by 6,000 men, at least. Lord Morley, in one part of his speech, gave 8,000 men as the figure, of whom 5,000 are missing from the Indian roster. The Indian Army, which is an army on active service, and ought to be ready for a campaign at any notice, is 10 per cent. short of its strength, never more than strictly adequate to its work. It is said that the deficiency is due in part to accident, the turn for retirement of an unusual number of old soldiers having arrived, in part to the raising of the age of entrance from eighteen to nineteen, and in part to the condition of the labour market; but the fact is as unquestioned as it is disappointing and disastrous. The merit of short service is that it brings recruits, and still they do not come. So great is the loss and the impression of the loss, that the Government which was committed to short service up to the lips half gives up the reform from which so much was hoped. It does not, indeed, abandon the principle of short service, for it still allows all recruits to retire into the Reserve after three years; but it tries, by small bounties and pensions, to tempt them, or a section of them, to stay for seven, twelve, or twenty-one years, that is, in fact, for their whole efficient lives. As the men who stay are the men who would have gone into the Reserve, and are also the men who like soldiering, this change depletes that invaluable force, and deprives it, moreover, of its most trustworthy men. In other words, the scheme on which the country has relied for its future Army is sensibly weakened, both as to numbers and efficiency. This would never have been risked, if the real managers had been quite convinced of the advantages of the scheme, and we are forced to the conclusion that there is still doubt, still uncertainty, among the highest experts as to the very basis of our whole Military system. That is most disheartening. We are absolutely without prejudice as to one system or the other, or any probable alternative, and are prepared to accept without demur any suggestion on which competent experts are agreed; but we ask that at least some system shall be adopted, and steadily carried out; that if we are to rely on Reserves, they shall be filled, and if we are not, they shall be abandoned. It is not any plan, but the want of decision as to any plan, which fills us with alarm, and rouses in us anew the old doubt whether, after all their sacrifices, the people of England will ever have an Army. At this moment they pay, speaking roughly, and adding the Indian expenditure, £140 a head per annum for every white soldier, and they are thousands short of a strength intended always to be comparatively small.

The second point, the unattractiveness of the Army, is more disheartening still. All this talk about the age of entrance, the methods of discipline, the desire for more promising careers, though most important, is, broadly considered, beside the matter in hand. There are in England scores of thousands of young men, strong, healthy, and unskilled in the highly-paid trades, who are in search of a maintenance, and only ask fairly secure lives. They are not timid, they bear in the field, in the mine, and in the railway-cutting, severe toil, and for the most part they ask only ten shillings a week in money and their keep. Why cannot the State get them? Because, say the economists, the State cannot pay enough; but the State in India and England pays more than £2 10s. a week per man, pays as if her private soldiers were Oxford students, and how is it that out of all that is spent there is not for the men a fair market wage? The Duke of Cambridge says about once a week, and repeated in this debate, that it is not because the State cannot, but because it will not pay sufficient money, that the ranks are ill supplied. Well, how much does he want us to give? What is the sum which would bring the men? The work is not hard, fair chances are open, the number who are fit is indefinite; what is the necessary figure? Instead of grumbling without effect, and remonstrating in vain on £15,000 a year, why does not his Royal Highness try to teach the people what is, in truth, the sacrifice they must make; and if they refuse, resign? He says they are unteachable; but that is the opinion of a man bred in a palace, not of a man who comprehends the English Democracy. Convince them that it is indispensable to pay twopence in the pound on sugar, to secure an efficient Army—and that is an extreme suggestion—and they would pay it at once. It is because they are not convinced, or rather are convinced that the money would be wasted, that they are so reluctant to see Military estimates advance. But is the difficulty money? The Duke says so; but he has no sooner said it than he adds that it is not money, but the practice of shifting the men from regiment to regiment, so that they are never among their friends. The Cavalry are not so shifted, and there is never any want of recruits for the Cavalry. "It is not that," says another great authority, "but the recruits' hatred of an oppressive and niggling discipline, a discipline which to raw hands makes life a burden." The punishments are too numerous. "Oh dear, no!" says a third, "it is not the pay nor the discipline that is in fault, but the want of a civil career after the man quits the Army." "And even that is nonsense," declares a fourth, "for the secret lies not there, but in the aversion of the English-speaking races for military life of any sort, an aversion so deep that in the United States the Government is compelled to hire foreigners at an extravagant wage." The opinions are endless, but they are all ineffective. The Government listens to all, accepts all in some degree, makes endless reforms and improvements, and still finds that the youngsters whom a private employer with the same means would secure by the hundred thousand hold aloof. We do not believe one word of it all,—either that the burden of sufficient wages would be unendurable, or that the lads of the country repudiate discipline, or that the British people are averse to a military life. We could pay the highest civil wage, if it were necessary; the lads bear in mine, and stable, and factory harsher discipline than that of the Army; and as to military life, there is not a grandee who is not persecuted for help towards a commission, or a middle-class family in which some lad does not urge that he may be educated, at great cost and with severe toil to himself, in order that he may be "a soldier." And yet we open careers for private soldiers, and there is no result; we abolish flogging, and the recruits stay away; we raise the wage almost annually, and the vacancies exceed by thousands the competitors for them. If there were three applications for every two vacancies in the Line, Great Britain would have no military troubles; and yet, with thirty-five millions of people, most of them workers, with limitless wealth, and with a history of triumph in the field, this great country cannot make military service acceptable, and her greatest soldiers, when asked the reason, stutter, rather than speak. The defect must be in management; and yet after fifty years of incessant discussion, effort, and expense, the country fails to get that management improved, and with its whole future depending on success, cannot so much as ascertain clearly why sufficient recruits are not attainable for the Army, and hears her Commander-in-Chief affirm that they never will be obtained, and that they must be taken, as on the Continent, by force.

THE PRINCES.

IN almost every Monarchy the position of the members of the Royal Family is one of the difficulties of statesmen, and we should not wonder if it became one even in England. Princesses, indeed—unless they fall in love unwisely, an event which, though it has occurred both in France and Austria, witness the cases of the Duchess de Berry, and of Napoleon's widow, the Grand Duchess of Parma, happens wonderfully seldom—are rarely troublesome. Either they marry more or less acceptably, and go away, or they live at home as quiet daughters of the house, or they vegetate apart from the current of affairs in dignified retirement. They cannot form political parties, they very rarely lead society, and they have not often been so popular as to be individually formidable. In modern history, two Princesses, our own Mary Stuart, and the German lady who became Catherine II. of Russia, have headed successful rebellions, the Duchess de Berry was Louis Philippe's most dangerous foe, and the Princess of the Asturias was for a short time supposed to govern Spain; but as a rule, the lives of Royal ladies have interested courtly biographers, rather than serious historians. Princes, however, are often troubles. It is, we suppose, impossible to base a system upon pedigree without conferring some kind of importance upon all who can claim that pedigree as their own; and in all States the rivalries, ambitions, popularities, or unpopularity of Princes have fretted or perplexed statesmen. Either the Princes have been employed by the Sovereign, which is the more usual policy, and then their disasters have reflected disgrace upon the dynasty in a special manner, and have cost it popularity with the Army; or they have been shunted out of politics, and then they have been discontented subjects, formidable from their rank. Some families, such as the Hapsburgs, have been nearly exempt from this danger, which is scarcely noticed in Vehse's pages; but it has been a great one for the Bourbons, it was felt by English Tudors, Stuarts, and the House of Brunswick, and it has not been entirely absent from the history of the Romanoffs. Even in very recent years the Russian Grand Dukes have headed parties in a dangerous way, and the son of Alexander I., the Grand Duke Constantine, never reconciled himself perfectly to his brother's elevation. The late Emperor was repeatedly called upon to "regulate" family difficulties, and in the gossip of Russia, at all events, they press heavily on the present Czar. Even in England, where all such cabals are supposed to be hopelessly out of date and forgotten, history has been compelled, and that very recently, to take note of them. Not to speak of the Tudors, whose reigns were one long war against possible rivals resting their claims on pedigree, and of the Stuarts, who were three times supplanted by cadets—Mary and Anne both reigning because they were Stuart Princesses, and the Electress Sophia being selected by Parliament for the same reason—there was that still obscure affair of the old Duke of Cumberland in 1835. Thousands believed that he aspired to the Throne—aspired, we mean, by active intrigue—and Joseph Hume, a keen observer with exceptional means of information, attacked him in his place in Parliament. It is difficult to believe that the Duke could have so deluded himself, but he had an energetic Orange following, party spirit ran very high, and he may have hoped for a Parliamentary vote. He had a much better position than Monmouth, and it seems incontestable that Monmouth thought the people of England would declare for him, and against the legitimate line. He was not wrong in thinking that a "usurpation" was possible.

The rise of a cadet branch in this country with a distinct political or social position justifying a pretence to the Crown seems quite impossible now, and, we presume, it really is so. A soldier Prince might save the country from an invasion, and so establish a claim; but, apart from the improbability of the event, the English people would be shocked by his asking for that particular reward. They would give him anything else, in money, or honours, or even office; but, from a change of feeling which has been little observed, but which, we think, has certainly occurred, they would think him as unreasonable in aspiring to the Throne as they would have thought the Duke of Wellington. Napoleon believed the Iron Duke would never remain a subject, and could not imagine that if ten days after Waterloo he had ordered a regiment to march on the House of Commons, his officers would have laughed in his face, and the people would have considered him a lunatic. No Prince in a country like this could show himself a Bismarck or a statesman of the first order in other ways; and if he did, though he might conceivably be beyond dismissal, he could never get the vote of Parliament, without which he would be powerless as an aspirant to the Throne. Even in extreme circumstances, with the Empire visibly falling, the claim to that one prize would destroy the public confidence and the popular affection. The single contingency in which such a trouble could occur would be the existence of a Jacobin Prince of the Blood in whom the body of the people confided, at a moment when they were demanding something, say the nationalisation of the land, which the Sovereign and the middle-classes were resolute not to grant. That contingency is not probable, as little probable as another which was once threatened, and by possibility might occur, the election of a cadet Prince by the people of Ireland to be their favourite and their King. A Guelph Parnell would be an ugly phenomenon, but it is out of the range of practical politics, and even of political dreams. Nevertheless, though we do not expect to see an English House of Orleans, English statesmen may yet be troubled by the Princes. Every Sovereign may not be as wise as Queen Victoria, or as coolly constitutional, and we can easily imagine an unpopular Premier seriously embarrassed by a claim like that which, on Monday, Mr. Gladstone, with a frown for Baron H. de Worms and a smile for the Duke of Albany, so quietly pushed aside. That will not be the last claim of the kind. It will be much more difficult one day, unless the House of Commons possesses more backbone than at present, to resist the claim of the Duke of Connaught, "who has seen service," to the Command-in-Chief; and by-and-by, the Princes of the English House may possibly be many, and their position worse. Even now, a Prince of ability is most unpleasantly placed,—he is forbidden by etiquette to take a political part, the function of social leadership is to many minds most ennuyant, and the great offices are practically closed to him. Mr. Gladstone wisely refused to say why he had not appointed the Duke of Albany, hinting that if he could be questioned in favour of one Prince, he might be questioned out of hostility to another, but we doubt not that, if he had spoken, the nomination of Princes would have been proved to be impossible. Thirty years hence we may see a dozen personages in society all within the succession, all claiming to take precedence of the Dukes of Norfolk, all noticed by the people as few statesmen are, and all in circumstances which of all others most provoke ambition. Parliament will be most reluctant to vote them incomes—every such vote now calls out a democratic demonstration—and will certainly not vote them adequate incomes, and without such votes their position will be indescribably provoking. Some of them may be able men, as the Coburgs have often been, and a solidly able Prince, poor to pauperism, but so favoured by Society as to have a party at his back, would be a severe embarrassment to any but a first-class Premier. If the Sovereign favoured the claimant, the Premier would have to resist the claim by nearly impossible explanations to Parliament; and if the Sovereign disapproved, he might find party feeling extend itself to hostility to the wearer of the Crown. Observers say, and sometimes write, that the difficulty will be met by the abolition of George III.'s Royal Marriage Law, and that the Princes will carry off the heiresses, and so become county gentlemen; but in that case they will be subjects, and a Prince not restrained by the etiquettes of his caste might be a dangerous politician. Is there any law or binding custom which prevents a Prince, not being either Peer or pensioner, from standing for the House of Commons, to which, if he were able, a big democratic borough—say, for example, Stoke—might be quite willing to send him? The suggestion will strike most of our readers as a little bizarre, but the "Royalties" are growing numerous, and, but for accident, there might have been in twenty-five years half-a-dozen Campbells alive, each one eligible to Parliament, and each one a direct and acknowledged representative of every family ever seated on the British Throne. Time arranges all things, the matter is not pressing, and the drift of opinion is Republican; but some day the question what to do with so separate a caste will be among the preoccupations of a Premier who, even before that time, will be puzzled whether to find appanages indefinitely, or to face the risk that a Prince may open a theatre, turn Jacobin politician, or marry a dancer at the opera.

COWARDICE.

MR. O'KELLY'S magnificent scorn for Mr. MacCoan because the latter gentleman very properly declined to fight a duel, is a survival from a world now almost passed away, the world in which all indisposition to risk your life on another's challenge was supposed to arise from cowardice, and in which cowardice was the one unforgivable sin. The thinking world of to-day accepts neither of these assumptions. It is well aware that unwillingness to risk your life on the challenge of another, though it may arise from cowardice, may be strongest of all in a mind incapable of any kind of cowardice; and again, it is well aware that while what is called cowardice is often pure selfishness, and nothing else, it is often a mere nervous recoil due to intense sensibilities, which, if these sensibilities be controlled by the will, as they often are, may give rise to the most magnificent form of courage. The officer who was taunted by a comrade in a fiercely-fought battle for appearing to be in a blue-funk, and who replied, "My dear fellow, I am in a blue-funk, and if you were in half such a funk as I am in, you would run away," knew what true courage meant a great deal better than his friend. True courage is the power to control impulses to desert your post springing out of terrors which, as mere terrors, are not to be subdued. In ordinary speech, a man is supposed to be courageous whose temperament never allows him to feel terror at all, but rather stimulates him to a keener and more aggressive activity under danger than he would display if no danger beset him. But that is the mere courage of temperament. It is a far higher courage which, from the mere sense of duty, can keep down these impulses to run away, and probably a much rarer kind of courage as well as a far higher kind. The truth, doubtless, is that physical courage—in men—is more or less of an inherited quality of temperament, a quality closely connected with the masculine sex, and greatly developed during the barbarian period, in consequence of the immense advantages which the men possessed of it have always had in life over those who did not possess it, not only in the favour of women, but in the general respect of the society in which they lived. Even in our time cowardice which is regarded as wholly ignoble in a man, is not condemned at all seriously in a woman; and this implies, we take it, that the average man is much more likely to be courageous by temperament, as regards the ordinary shocks of life, than the average woman, though the average woman will doubtless show more of the passive courage of fortitude in bearing inward pain than the average man.

But even as regards the temperament itself,—we are not now speaking of that very common sort of cowardice which is pure selfishness, like the cowardice of the man who will not save a drowning fellow-creature because he is afraid to wet his feet on account of the bad cold and headache that wet feet always give him,—we hardly do justice as yet to that timid or cautious temperament which is so often wrongly called cowardly. Man's warning instincts are always of the nature of fears, that is, recoils from dangers not really visible but more or less suspected, yet dangers all the more real for being, like sunken rocks, so little visible. The recoil of true innocence from vice is always more or less the recoil of a warning instinct which does not and cannot disclose the true meaning of the dread felt. Such was the horror which Gretchen, in Faust, feels for Mephistopheles, and which, had Goethe been greater than he was, he would have represented her as feeling also for those urgencies of Faust which were suggested by Mephistopheles, and the outcome of his evil compact. A great deal that is falsely called cowardice is nothing in the world but the recoil of man's best nature from what is really destructive to it. Not only is there a warning recoil in true purity from what taints it, but there is an equally warning recoil in true holiness of nature from the worldly ambitions which threaten it, and in true singleness of nature from the multitude of half-sincerities with which society is honeycombed. Again, in many minds, minds in their best nature solitary, there is a true recoil of this same kind from the confusion and distraction which the demands of society make upon them. There is, we are persuaded, more of sound teaching in what we often call cowardly fears, than most men are at all aware. Of course, we are now explicitly excluding that selfish dislike of inconvenience of which we entirely understand the meaning and the scope. That is cowardice for which nothing is to be said. But much that is supposed to be cowardice of temperament is nothing but the same kind of warning instinct in the soul which, in the body, makes the eyelid automatically shut to protect the eye from dust, and the head instinctively shrink to avoid a shattering collision. It may be urged truly enough in reply to this, that as we instinctively shrink from the surgeon's knife, even though it only cuts away what must be cut away if we are to live, so the soul instinctively shrinks from much which it is of the very essence of true courage to bear, and not only to bear, but to become indifferent to,—as, for instance, ridicule of one's higher principles. And that is perfectly true. But though that may be called instinctive shrinking, since in its origin it is so, yet so soon as we know what it is we shrink from and why it is that we shrink from it, the warning function of dread is over for us, and it becomes as purely cowardly to shrink back from a pang which we understand, and which we know to be useful to us, as it is right and natural to shrink back while the shrinking is a recoil from danger only half-understood. We are not saying for a moment that men ought to be ultimately guided by the innumerable warnings of danger which their sensibilities give them,—but only that they may often be greatly the better for these warnings, if they will only use them as warnings, and look out carefully for the character of the mischief threatened. Fears are only watchmen, whose cry ought to make us not blench, but be vigilant, and anxious to discern what that hidden danger of the approach of which we were warned, really is. Sometimes it will be seen that that danger was nothing but pain, and wholesome pain; and in that case we can, of course, set ourselves to work to subdue the fear. But very often it is much more than pain, some real invasion of the inner truthfulness, or inward purity, or the essential personality of one's character,—of something which it is impossible to lose without losing a part of our best self, and in this case the warning recoil ought to make us more clear-sighted to discern the true nature of the contagion from which we shrink back, even though it be our duty, as it may be, after being thus put on our guard, to run the risk of that contagion. There is nothing more delusive than the idea that the shrinkings of the mind are all mere forms of cowardice.

That only is cowardice which impels us to flee from what it is a duty to resist. But one of the great arts of life is to discriminate between what it is a duty to resist and what it is a duty to flee from. For instance, there are some men and some women perhaps, whom flattery does not hurt, because it does not even please them, and these feel no warning instinct when they hear it. But there are others who, much as they enjoy it, feel a sort dread of those who praise them, just because they instinctively anticipate the harm it may do them; and there are men who, if they have gifts which may bring them much popularity, should be all the more careful so to use them that they may not court popularity, and may even invite a healthy unpopularity where there is room to choose between different exercises of these gifts. The so-called cowardice which makes some men shrink from public life is very often indeed, we believe, a true warning instinct, an instinct that they are too self-conscious for public life, or too incapable of living their own life when others' opinions upon them are always being freely expressed, and that their true life can only be lived in an atmosphere free from the constant pressure of public praise and blame. Of course, that applies chiefly to men of no great weight of character, for men of any great weight of character can face and master, and, indeed, wholly subdue, many temptations which another might not be wise to face. We do not in the least say that the warning instincts ought to guide, but only to warn us, to make us gauge in all their force the temptations which will have to be subdued if the warnings given are to be used only as warnings, and not as vetoes on the course against which they seem to warn us. We are not in the least arguing that our fears are to give us a law. That would be cowardly doctrine, indeed. We only say this, that the recoil of the soul, like the recoil of the body, constantly points to formidable dangers which it may or may not be our duty to confront; but whether it is so or not, it must be our duty to gauge these dangers, and either to avoid them, or to confront them, if we confront them, with a clear knowledge of what it is that they threaten. The temperament which is sometimes called anxious, sometimes timorous, and sometimes cowardly, is generally, we believe, a temperament that really needs the warnings which this shrinking disposition gives,—not by any means always for the purpose of disarming the intentions formed, but always for the purpose of putting those who form them in possession of the real danger. The active men of the world are too often supposed to be the greatest men. There are other men, however, who are great in consequence of their anxieties and fears, men great, like Bishop Butler, by virtue of their caution and sobriety of mind, great through the warnings of their nature against moral dangers which they would otherwise despise, but which the inward timidities to which they so wisely attend, enable them to gauge, to disarm, and ultimately to conquer.

A DRAWING-ROOM LECTURE.

PROFESSOR RUSKIN, to please some of his friends who could not obtain admission to his Oxford Lectures, repeated to them this week, in a private house at Kensington, much of what he had said as Slade Professor on the merits of Miss Kate Greenaway; but he gave his hearers besides the pleasant surprise of finding in Miss Francesca Alexander, some of whose drawings were exhibited, an artist whom we may take to be a good exemplar of Professor Ruskin's lifelong teaching. Slightly altering their application to Miss Greenaway, his words express so well what these drawings appear to us to do, that we venture to quote them:—"The beauty of them is being like. They are blissful just in the degree that they are natural, and the fairyland"—or, in Miss Alexander's case, the spiritual land—"she creates for you is not beyond the sky, nor beneath the sea, but nigh you, even at your doors. She does but show you how to see it and how to cherish. Long since I told you this great law of noble imagination. It does not create, it does not even adorn, it does but reveal the treasures to be possessed by the spirit."

And these drawings by "Francesca" go far, by their power of truth and grace, to reveal to us Professor Ruskin's meanings. They show us wherein his magic lies, and partly explain to us the spell by which he binds all who acknowledge him as a teacher. The opening words of his lecture express the sympathy which exists between his delight in "whatsoever is lovely" and "Francesca's" expression of peasant life and wild-flower beauty in their fairest forms. "I have never until to-day," he said, "dared to call my friends and my neighbours together to rejoice with me, over any recovered good or rekindled hope. Both in fear and much thankfulness, I have done so now; yet not to tell you of any poor little piece of upgathered silver of my own, but to show you the fine gold which has been strangely trusted to me, and which before was a treasure hid in a mountain-field of Tuscany; and I am not worthy to bring it to you, and I can't say what I feel about it, and am only going to tell you simply what it is and how it came into my hands, and to leave you to have your joy of it."

In the first part of the address, the Professor roused his listeners, as he alone knows how, to sympathy with Miss Greenaway's genius, supporting his admiration of her "minuteness and delicacy of touch carried to its utmost limit" by a quotation from M. Chesneau's volume on "La Peinture Anglaise." Then Professor Ruskin, with earnest words, spoke of the idyllic English landscape in Miss Greenaway's drawings. "Would you wish me," said the critic of the ideal life not less than he is the critic of modern Art, "with Professorial authority to advise her that her conceptions belong to the dark ages, and must be reared on a new foundation; or is it conceivable to you that perhaps the world we truly live in may not be quite so changeable as you have thought it,—that all the gold and silver you can dig out of the earth are not worth to you the king-cups she gave you of her grace, and that all the fury, and the flutter, and the wistfulness of your lives will never discover for you any other than the ancient blessing, 'He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters, he restoreth my soul!'"

The canons of taste, which he declared in his lecture, canons so well known that we need not discuss their adequateness, were very remarkably illustrated in twenty drawings in pen and ink by Miss Alexander, an artist, we believe, until Mr. Ruskin's recent Oxford Lectures, unknown in England. Since Leonardo da Vinci's flower studies, we can recall no drawings of the "herb of the field" equal to "Francesca's" for strength and delicacy, for truth, and the reverence that comes of truth, though she has perhaps somewhat to learn in expressing human form. From an improvisatrice of the Tuscan villages Miss Alexander received most of the legends and hymns which have suggested her drawings, and which have been collected by her during many years of constant intercourse with the Tuscan contadini. They are the sparks which have kindled her imagination and given life to her skill. They remind us, in their innocent freshness, of the Fioretti which, six centuries ago, gathered round the memory of St. Francis. The illustrations of "La Madonnina" visiting, with St. Joseph and her child, the gypsy's cottage, in four designs, are, perhaps, the most charming of the drawings which were shown to his friends by Mr. Ruskin; and of them, we may select the group which illustrates Mary's words to her humble hostess as specially full of true sentiment. Of the Divine Child she says, and the drawing declares:—

"Figlio è dell' Eterno Padre,
Come Dio di maestade,
E come uomo; e figlio mio,
Per sua mera cortesia."

We know no modern design comparable to this for meaning and grace, unless it be one by the same artist of a Tuscan woman sitting, and the study of the daisy-plant which illuminates the text is worthy of the main figures. "Francesca's Book" deserves, as it is to have, publication, and we trust that before long these twenty drawings may be available to the public, not only because of their intrinsic excellence, but as they are a commentary on much of Professor Ruskin's teaching, and are a presage of hope for a future Art that may possess the qualities for which he now looks to Pre-renaissance centuries. The Tuscan legends, no doubt, had large part in the spiritual suggestiveness and the singular sweetness which give their charm to Miss Alexander's conceptions. The radiance she evokes from the simplest visible things makes belief in what is not seen easy. The faith of the Tuscan peasant guides, perhaps unconsciously to herself, her accurate design, and she reveals more than she may herself know of what her "Holy Family," her "St. Christopher," and even her lovely "Tuscan Women," truly mean, to those who, shutting out the nineteenth-century glare, study them in earnest and in quiet.

Meantime, they aptly hit the special mark in drawing at which Professor Ruskin teaches his disciples to aim. They illustrate the dictum that all the magic and power of Art are in its truth to Nature, as Nature was created by the Great Artist. The fidelity of "Francesca's" drawing in black-and-white, forces many complex and far-reaching truths on us, and proves once more that very simple means are adequate to rouse in us the highest emotions, when used in good-faith by genius of "good-will."

All Professor Ruskin's friends must be glad to see how well his Oxford work has agreed with him. He has gifts of insight and power of reaching the best feelings and highest hopes of our too indifferent generation which are very rare. Agree or disagree with some of his doctrines as we may, he constrains the least hopeful of his listeners to remember that man is not yet bereft of that "breath of life" which enables him to live in spiritual places that are not yet altogether depopulated by the menacing army of physical discoverers.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE BARRISTERS' AGITATION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The letter signed "A Member of the Junior Bar," in your issue of Saturday last, is, I am afraid, of a nature likely to arouse unnecessary misapprehensions, if allowed to pass without comment.

The new Bar Committee is not designed to be a "Trades Union," nor is there any ground for the conjecture that the recent pronouncement of the Attorney-General upon the point of etiquette referred to by your correspondent was made in response to its inquiries, or at the instigation of its members. It will be an object of the Committee, no doubt, to protect the Bar, wherever and whenever it is necessary to do so; but there ought to be, and there need be, no antagonism between the two great branches of the profession. Each is necessary to the other, and both to the public.

On the contrary, it is to be hoped that the formation of a Committee thoroughly representative of the whole Bar, and with whom the Incorporated Law Society may be able to confer upon the various matters affecting both branches of the profession which from time to time arise, will do much to dissipate any unworthy feelings of jealousy or animosity which may have been silently gaining hold and strength under the old régime.

In reply to a somewhat common sneer levelled at lawyers, which has been repeated by a certain portion of the Press since the present movement took shape, let me point out that there is no profession or class in the country so strongly represented in Parliament which has shown itself so entirely disinterested in the matter of legislation as the Bar of England.—I am, Sir, &c.,

Hon. Secretary of the Provisional Bar Committee.

CHARITABLE ORGANISATION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I have read with great interest the article of your correspondent on the charitable organisation of the Canton of Bâle. From that article it appears that forty-five separate objects are included in the work of one society, which has an income of £3,000 and a fund of £8,000. With all due respect to the excellent individuals who form this society, and to the principles which have united them for so many good purposes, we should like to hear a little as to the successful results achieved in each of the forty-five branches of work which occupy the attention of the society, and as to the way in which the money is distributed. To say the truth, £3,000 does not appear to be a very large sum, and if divided by forty-five, would barely allow £66 to each department of the work.

No, Sir, the cumbrous English system, in spite of its many defects, works best, if we may judge by the results achieved, and for this simple reason, that it is more in accordance with human nature. No nine humane gentlemen in the world could feel an equally keen interest in forty-five different charities. There is, probably, not a county town, certainly not a county, in England, where a larger aggregate sum is not collected, and where the work of, say, forty-five societies is not carried on by those who are most interested in their own department of beneficence. While one man is wild about washhouses, another is of opinion that nothing is so much needed as a hospital dispensary.

It is true that the English system involves a slightly increased expenditure of paper and envelopes. But even this is good for trade, and exercises the public, who are asked to give, in the virtue of patience. I could say more, but forbear.—I am, Sir, &c.,

COMMUNION IN THE GREEK CHURCH.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Are you not mistaken in saying that "the Greek Church, like the Roman Catholic Church, grants to the laity Communion only in one kind?" Dr. Harold Browne, in his book on the Articles, says:—"The fear of spilling the consecrated wine led to the administering of the two elements together, by dipping the consecrated bread into the cup: which custom still prevails in the Eastern Churches."

Moreover, even in the Roman Church, the Kings of France communicated in both kinds till the Revolution. And at coronation, the cup seems to have been usually given to a King. Mr. Walcott, in his "Sacred Archaeology," says:—"The Emperor of Constantinople, at his coronation, partook of the chalice; and Clement VI. allowed the King of Gaul to partake at pleasure, although other Princes were permitted the privilege only at their coronation and at the hour of death."—I am, Sir, &c., Chelmsford, June 4th.

R. E. BARTLETT.

SIR,—Allow me to correct a serious mistake in your article on the Czar's Coronation. The Greek Church is most scrupulous in communicating the laity in both kinds, and the only approach it knows to Communion in one kind is that an infant's first communion is made with the species of wine alone. The ritual difference made between clergy and laity is that the former receive the two kinds separately, and that of wine from the chalice; while the laity receive both together, in a spoon. The Czar is allowed, on the ground of his sacerdotal anointing, to have a hieratic character, and thus communicates as do the clergy. It was the custom to communicate the Kings of France with the chalice at their coronation, long after it was taken away from the rest of the laity in the Latin Church.—I am, Sir, &c.,

[We have had quite a mass of letters on this subject. It appears from them that the Russian etiquette as to Kings is also the Roman. The Kings of France received the Communion in both kinds till the Revolution, and our own Kings before the Reformation. The King, in short, is considered consecrated.—Ed. Spectator.]

"SAINT, OR SINNER?"

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—You are not "Notes," and I am not "Queries," but some of your readers may solve me a question, upon some authority which I can accept. What is the name of the chief city of Russia? The question sounds elementary, but in conversation, at all events, nobody seems to know. Or rather, as usual in conversation, everybody knows; but no two people know in the same way. All the Britons (telegrams included) call the place St. Petersburg; all the French, I believe, Petersburg. It was certainly built by, and called after, Czar Peter, whom I imagine to have been as little like St. Peter as anybody can well be. Some very remarkable letters in the Times a year or two ago, by some outsider ("aut Freeman, aut Diabolus," I thought), ridiculed the English fashion, as against the French (a nation much more exact of true scholarship than ours is), of calling Czar Peter's city St. Petersburg. Which authority I adopted, and stated that only Englishmen so called the place. Whereupon I was at once confronted by an Indépendance Belge, which called it "St. Pétersbourg," without variation. I consulted a friend, who said that "Petersburg" was a mere traveller's familiarity, and "St. Petersburg" the proper name, the city having been christened after St. Peter and St. Paul. Why not "St. Peter and Paul's-burg," then, after the usual precedent of the sweet Zanipolo (Giovanni e Paolo) of Venetian Italy?

On the other hand, a young lady of the modern-educational school, whom I at once consulted, as more likely to know than anybody, assured me that all her professors taught her to speak of "Petersburg," and to laugh at the conventional ignorance of the British newspaper. Which, then, on genuine authority, is right? One must be very wrong.—I am, Sir, &c.,

VIVISECTION AT OXFORD.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR"]

SIR,—The Convocation of the University of Oxford has just voted £10,000 for building a laboratory, and supplying means and opportunities for Dr. Burdon Sanderson to pursue his "researches." Your readers do not require to be told what these "researches" of the well-known vivisectioner are.

I write now, as an old member of the University, which I once could honour, and which still I love, to ask your valuable aid in appealing to other members of that University who know what vivisection is, who know what Dr. Burdon Sanderson has professed himself to be, and who feel that the vote of last Tuesday, if it be not rescinded, or at least qualified and guarded by very stringent provisions, will commit the University to a course of action which we may lament as a misery and a deep disgrace, but which it will be hardly possible to restrain or to regulate. I am not aware whether the vote of £10,000 to carry on these cruel and useless brutalities can be appealed against or rescinded in the ordinary course of University procedure. If anything can be done by those who are on the spot to prevent altogether the execution of this iniquitous scheme, I trust it will be done; but if it cannot be altogether prevented, it must be quite possible to enact provisions forbidding the practice of vivisection cruelties for any purpose. Dr. Burdon Sanderson pleads that vivisection will not be practised in this laboratory "for purposes of instruction," but only "for purposes of research," hence, no doubt, the number of animals required for torture would be smaller; but I have yet to learn that the cruel and deliberate torture of a helpless and inoffensive animal is at all the less a brutal act, or at all the less a disgrace to the man who performs it, because it is done "for purposes of research," and not "for purposes of instruction."—I am, Sir, &c.,

POETRY.

A CRY FROM ERIN.

ERIN, our country,—our dear one!
Sadder thy days grow, and sadder;
Never a promise before thee,
Hardly a record behind.
Ever a yearning for greatness,
Ever a crying for freedom,
Ever with failure on failure;
Thy children untrue, disunited,
Blind men leading the blind.

Oh, for a leader to lead us!
O God for a leader to lead us!
To teach us our strength and our weakness,
To tell all the world we are true.
Oh, that one rose up among us
Who should be as the voice of thee, Erin!—
The cry, for which we have waited,
The cry that has never been uttered,—
A leader to show us our trouble,
And meet it, and carry us through.

But never the true one arises;
Only false leaders, self-seekers,
Showing the world all our folly,
All that is worst in us, weakest;
Always the selfish and little,
Never the true and the strong.
Branding us unto the nations,
As one which has bartered its birthright;
Yelling for rights which are no rights,
Leaving unspoken our wrong.

O green isle in the ocean,
Land of the soldier who fears not,
Land of the warm-hearted comrade,
Land of the true-hearted maid!
Fought have our fathers,—how nobly!
Joy there has been in the old time;
Songs in the past, in thy sunshine,—
None can sing now, in the shade!
All our hearts' gladness is darkened,
Heavy the shame lies upon us.
Fight! We have nothing to fight for.
Dishonoured we are, and dismayed.

We hear our own false ones belie us;
We hear how the English misjudge us;
We hear their pity and blame.
But we know the fire of our spirit,
And we know we are misunderstood.
We are proud, and despise all the pity;
And yet we have no voice to speak with,
And needs must abide in our shame.

Not so in olden time, Erin.
Once thou wert famed among nations
For piety, honour, and learning,
Peace, and good-will unto men.
Holy men came from afar off,
Lived tranquil lives in thy shelter,
And, among turbulent nations,
Thou sentest glad tidings again.

But now we are fallen, are fallen!
Discord, and tumult, and murder,
Clamour, and impotent ravings,
Are the voices we give to the world.
We are slaves to our own meanest passions;
The flag of mad licence is brandished,
The flag of old Freedom is furled.

Because of our love of our country,
Because we are simple and trustful,
Because our hearts soon may be fired,
So twice be the shame upon those Who knew it,—made Erin the watchword
To make us unworthy of Erin,
To goad us to murder and meanness,
And made us our own hardest foes.

And because of our love of our country,
Because we are simple and trustful,
Because our hearts soon may be fired,
O God that a leader would rise,
To speak for our desolate country,—
To show us the way we may serve her,
To wipe out our shame and dishonour,
And open our enemies' eyes!

THE GROSVENOR GALLERY.

[THIRD NOTICE.]

In this notice we intend to speak, as fully as our space will permit, of the majority of the pictures which we have hitherto left unmentioned; but we do not profess to give at all an exhaustive description. Many meritorious works must remain unnoticed, simply for the old reason that "a quart cannot be put into a pint pot," with which brief apology we begin our article with the mention of Mr. Holloway's large picture of "The Old Wellesley." This is a river-picture, somewhat similar perhaps in character to that very famous one of the "Old Téméraire," and taken from pretty much the same spot. We do not mean to depreciate Mr. Holloway's work, if we say it possesses little of the charm of the last-mentioned picture, for Mr. Holloway has a pleasant poetry of his own, which, though it bears little relation to Turner's glory of colour, has a sufficient attraction. For several years we have called attention to the peculiar fidelity with which this artist paints harbour and coast scenes, and we can only say with regard to the present work that perhaps the subject reminds one too closely of the "Old Téméraire," to be fairly judged. We doubt whether the artist understands, or cares for the beauty of calm water as much as that of a rough sea. Compare with this large picture, the small oil-study of "The Mouth of the Harbour," by the same artist; it will be seen at once how much more at home Mr. Holloway is, when he seeks to express motion, than when he paints repose. Near this, Mr. Ernest Parton has a rather fine twilight landscape, in which a man and horse are going up the avenue of a wood, behind the leafless trees of which we see the last glimmer of sunset. Mr. Parton paints his tree-trunks capitally. May we suggest to him that there are other things in Nature not less worthy of his attention? The little picture by Mr. T. M. Rooke, which hangs next to this, should be noticed for its unpretentious and elaborate workmanship, and for a certain charm of colour, which, though somewhat monotonous, marks all Mr. Rooke's paintings. Mr. Nicholson's study of "The Market-place of Verona," has all the merits which accurate draughtsmanship, and careful observation can give; it is only deficient in that it is "a study," and not a "picture." And perhaps this same remark might be fairly applied to the exquisite little Venetian scenes by Mr. E. J. Gregory, of which we have spoken in a former notice.

Mr. Arthur Lemon is an artist whose work is less known in London than it deserves to be, and for this perhaps his very unattractive subjects are partially responsible. He has this year a large picture of "Ploughing in the Tuscan Maremma," in which the principal feature is the fine drawing, and the quiet careful painting of the white oxen; the whole composition moreover is good and effective in its simplicity. The artist has scarcely attempted to give any great beauty of colour to the scene, and has deliberately forborne to alter or beautify any of its details; but his picture has, nevertheless, a very marked style, and even dignity of its own. Sir Robert Collier's "Deserted Pond" may be cited as an example of the utter unattractiveness of careful landscape-painting, when it is neither informed by any special beauty of workmanship, nor made interesting by any special object. The "Deserted Pond" is as careful and accurate as could be wished, but we doubt whether one in a hundred of the visitors to the Grosvenor Gallery will pause to notice its accuracy or enjoy its care.

Mrs. Jopling's portrait of Miss Ellen Terry as "Portia," in a scarlet robe and cape (which, as a matter of fact, that lady did not wear when she played the part), is a picture whose merits are almost as unpleasant as its faults; we mean by this that it is one of those good portraits which, while it is undeniably faithful to each individual detail, manages in some unfortunate manner, to miss all the finer characteristics of the sitter. Miss Terry's strongly marked and attractive face, has here lost the greater part of its charm, while it has gained only a sort of smooth varnish, such as Madame Rachel might have laid thereon, at a somewhat similar price. The actress has come out of Mrs. Jopling's bath "beautiful for ever," but her most intimate friends will hardly know her again. The picture, nevertheless, is brightly and industriously painted, its worst point being the hands, which are badly drawn.

Mr. P. R. Morris, A.R.A., has next to this, "The Model," a naked little boy who has taken up an artist's palette, in the intervals of his "sitting." It is in no unkind spirit that we notice that this artist has three or four pictures of babies in the Royal Academy, and two here; they are all very nice, plump, healthy, pretty children, with the reddest of cheeks and the roundest of limbs; and Mr. Morris seems to be quite happy and quite successful in their delineation; in fact, the painter has, at last, found his métier. At the present rate at which the population increases, there is no reason why he should ever lack occupation; no mother could ever wish for prettier baby-pictures than these. A passing word must be given to Mr. Haynes Williams's "Gleam of Sunshine," a picture of an old gentleman, in a square-cut coat, taking his grandchild's face between his hands, and tracing the resemblance therein to his dead daughter. The composition is, perhaps, a little mawkish, and the whole picture too evidently made up in the studio; but it is fairly well painted, and expresses its motive clearly. Mr. Jacob Hood's "Half-holiday" deserves somewhat similar praise; it is artificial, but pleasing. So, again, is Mr. Brewtall's large composition, "The Fairy-tale," an old grandfather telling a story to his grandchildren, under the shadow of a chestnut-tree in a sunny garden; this last is full of brilliant colour, graceful forms of women and children, and displays a considerable amount of good painting; but it is utterly unspontaneous, has no meaning whatever, and no reason to exist; the painter has nothing to say, not even of the sunlight and the chestnut-leaves, and therefore cannot interest us by the way in which he says it.

Very different, indeed, and deserving of far more careful notice than we can give in this place, both for its faults and its excellencies, is Miss Pickering's "By the Waters of Babylon." We confess a certain sympathy, uncritical, but quite irresistible, for a young painter who takes such a subject as this, and struggles with it so earnestly; and her failure, if it be a failure, is worth more than a good many babies smudging themselves with neglected palettes, or listening to their grandfathers' cock-and-bull stories. But the picture is hardly to be rightly described as a failure, for it has, despite certain conventionalities of treatment and a too obvious echo of other artists' work, much truth of feeling, with considerable beauty of colour; the figures are well grouped and well painted, the whole work is distinctly pleasant to look upon, and improves upon closer acquaintance. Not the rose, but one who has lived near her. Miss Pickering deserves this praise,—that she honestly prefers to fail in the highest school, to succeeding in the lowest, and perhaps her chief fault is that she disdains almost too entirely, all the cheap attractiveness of modern painting.

Mr. George Howard's "Vale of Mentone," though a landscape, has a somewhat similar quality of painting, or at least a somewhat similar reference to the work of the elder schools, as that of Miss Pickering. We do not think that this is a good example of the painter's merits, but it is worthy of attention for the curious manner in which it combines realistic detail and a conventional method of treatment; it sees everything very sharply, but sees it through ancient spectacles, and the result is a curious combination of what is, with what has been.

Mr. Herkomer's chief portrait in the Gallery is that of Herr Joachim, violin in hand. As usual with this artist, it is somewhat exaggerated in size, and is, we are bound to say, exaggerated in manner and effect. The truth is, that Mr. Herkomer is spoiling his undeniably great artistic gifts, by treating them as an American contractor treats a railway line,—laying down so many hundred miles per week. This might have been a picture of a great artist, by a great painter. It is only a caricature of a musician, by one who has no time to be an artist. The haste and what we should call the "insolence" of the painting are evident throughout, but especially evident in the thick, shapeless claw which represents Herr Joachim's hand. Those who remember Mr. Watts's magnificent study of the same subject will be little apt to forgive Mr. Herkomer for this later rendering. We do not in the least mean to deny Mr. Herkomer's ability, but only to point out that it is ability to which its possessor refuses to give a fair chance.

At the very opposite pole of Art to this, is Mr. Watts's little landscape, called "Haystacks," which hangs close by. It is simply a slope of arable land, on the crest of which stand two or three haystacks, against a blue sky, into the height of which a great, cumulus cloud is slowly rising. Somehow, all the music which ought to have been in "Herr Joachim" has filtered through into Mr. Watts's "Haystacks;" but we cannot stay to enlarge on this subject, nor to speak of Mr. Watts's "Knight," an almost too roughly painted study of a man in armour. Mr. Walter Crane's "Diana and the Shepherd," only demands notice here as another example of how futile it is for an artist to rely upon his imagination, beyond a certain point. Mr. Crane has been a resident in Italy now for some months, yet we doubt if any artist who had ever seen an olive-tree, could have painted with less fidelity to nature than Mr. Crane has displayed here, in the grey foliage and silver stems. Still more notable is the absence of accurate knowledge in the drawing of the figures in this composition. We must conclude the present notice of this exhibition, with a mention of Mr. Poynter's very faithful and beautiful study of Dover Castle, one of those simply veracious landscapes which Mr. Poynter executes every now and then, to show us that he can see beauty in simple English scenery, though he is accused of being unable to display it in ancient Greek legends. Perhaps the truth is that the earnestness of Mr. Poynter's work as a figure-painter, though unsuccessful in raising him to the height at which he aims, enables him to touch all slighter subjects with something of the dignity and meaning of those elder artists in whose footsteps he follows so conscientiously.

BOOKS.

SIR JAMES STEPHEN'S HISTORY OF THE CRIMINAL LAW OF ENGLAND.*

[SECOND NOTICE.]

SIR JAMES STEPHEN'S work has a twofold aspect. It constitutes an important addition to our knowledge of English history; it also consists of a series of disquisitions on moral and logical problems suggested by the study of law. Our aim to-day is to consider the book not as a narrative, but as a treatise on criminal jurisprudence. Of its interest, when looked at from this point of view, candid critics can hardly speak too highly; but a reviewer who tries to imitate Sir James Stephen's own outspokenness and honesty must, out of the very respect due to an eminent writer, state freely that the book contains a large number of positions which are meant to excite—as, no doubt, they will excite—criticism and opposition. On this matter, we need not confine ourselves to prediction. Lord Coleridge has already questioned from the Bench one at least among the numerous hard doctrines propounded by Mr. Justice Stephen. It is certainly not our business to pronounce any opinion upon the point at issue between the Lord Chief Justice and his colleague. The differences, however, of eminent magistrates, as of respected divines, have at least the advantage of restoring to humbler individuals a perfect freedom of judgment which is untrammelled by excessive deference for legal or theological authority. The rapidity, moreover, with which Sir James Stephen's views have evoked contradiction calls attention to a characteristic which marks the whole body of his already voluminous and always instructive writings. Narrative in his hands always turns into discussion, with him discussion always means controversy, and controversy means a vigorous onslaught upon the errors of sentimentalists, humanitarians, admirers of popular government, and numerous other classes of persons who maintain, or are held by Mr. Justice Stephen to maintain, fallacies, errors, or follies, which it is his mission utterly to rout, confound, and destroy. We have ourselves considerable sympathy with the polemical spirit of Mr. Justice Stephen's controversial writings, but it may perhaps be doubted whether his manly pugnacity, and the strength of feeling which lies at the bottom of his combativeness, is compatible with the scientific calmness necessary for the complete solution of the problems presented by legal science. With much of Sir James Stephen's sentiment, all sensible readers will agree. "It does one's heart good" (as the expression goes) to hear murderers described as the villains, scoundrels, liars, sneaks, and generally contemptible persons, which they invariably turn out to be, on close acquaintance with their characters. But though there is a real pleasure in seeing gallows-birds stripped of their false claim to sympathy, it is impossible for thoughtful readers not to remember that the attitude of a denunciatory moralist is different from the position of a scientific investigator; a student of crime has no more reason to be angered at murder or murderers, than a student of disease to be filled with wrath at the contemplation of fever or of smallpox.

We dwell on the element of personal sentiment discernible in our author's speculations, because, while it adds to their popular interest, it detracts a little from their juristic value, and occasionally affects even the logical worth of conclusions drawn by a trained and acute logician. Of all the sentiments obviously entertained by Mr. Justice Stephen, few are more respectable and, in their way, more useful than the bias of his mind against popular, and what is pretty much the same thing, lax and inaccurate modes of thought or of feeling. It is, however, quite possible for a thinker to be too much on his guard against the idols of the market-place, and it is still more possible for a trained logician to assume that notions which are inaccurately expressed in the current language of mankind are themselves inaccurate and worthless. The Plutarchian hero—Phocion, if our memory does not deceive us—who, whenever his speeches were applauded, asked what folly he had uttered, was not, after all, more successful as a statesman than as an orator. And a writer who is determined never to be the victim of fallacies which pass current with the crowd, is liable to miss truths which are none the less important because they are expressed in lax terms and defended by inconclusive reasoning. No better illustration of our meaning can be found than Sir James Stephen's treatment of the question of intention. Every word he writes on the matter is worth the most careful consideration. No one, whether he agrees with all our author's conclusions or not, can read the dissertation about intention and motive without feeling that the subject is one on which popular conceptions are so hazy and indefinite as often to amount to misconceptions which cause profound moral confusion. It is well every one should be warned in the clearest terms against that identification of motive with intention which fosters the pernicious idea that a man cannot rightly be punished for acts, however criminal, which have been done with a laudable object, or even with an object which he may reasonably think laudable. It is high time for conspirators to be told that murders committed by patriots are just as much murders as murders committed by highwaymen or burglars. But when Sir James Stephen, not content with noting the confusion between motive and intention, goes on, apparently, to assert that the "supposition that the presence of an ulterior intention takes away the primary immediate intention" is a fallacy, cautious pupils feel that their teacher is getting on to shaky ground, and that a statement which is in one sense a truism may be so used as to cover very startling inferences. This suspicion is increased when we find what is the practical conclusion to which Mr. Justice Stephen's doctrine leads him, in reference to the well-known case of "R. v. Woodburne, 16 State Trials, 54." In this instance, one Coke was tried, under the so-called Coventry Act, for wounding Crispe, "with intent to maim and disfigure him." The "intent," be it noted, was, under the statute, part of the crime. What Coke did was to attempt to murder Crispe, and in carrying out the attempted murder, he maimed and disfigured his victim. His object, and, as we should say, his intent, was to murder Crispe, and he was utterly indifferent as to whether, in the course of the murder, Crispe was disfigured or not. At the time when Coke was tried, an attempt to murder was only a common-law misdemeanour. The curious result followed that if the prisoner could be rightly convicted of wounding "with intent to maim and disfigure" Crispe, he could be punished far more severely than on conviction for what would popularly be called his real offence. Coke, who was a lawyer, defended himself on the ground that his acts did not bring him within the statute under which he was tried, since he intended Crispe to be killed, and not that he should be disfigured. Coke was, however, in accordance with the charge of Lord Chief Justice King, found guilty of wounding Crispe with intent to maim and disfigure, and was in due course hanged. Mr. Justice Stephen maintains, as we understand him, that in logic and in law Coke's conviction was right. Laymen would, we suspect, be of opinion that though Coke well deserved his fate, he was executed for a crime which he had never committed, because he could not be adequately punished for his real offence; in other words, that by a monstrous straining of the law, a bad man was judicially murdered. And we are strongly inclined to hold that in this case the view of a layman would be logically and legally right.

It is, of course, true that the motive or even the object with which a man does a criminal act does not, in most cases, affect his criminality. Suppose that each of the men who killed Lord Frederick Cavendish had a different motive or object. The one wished to promote the independence of Ireland, the second revenged a private wrong, the third did not care to kill Lord Frederick Cavendish at all, and only desired to disable a friend who might have saved Mr. Burke. None of these differences in the objects, motive, or intent of the criminals prevented each and all of them from being guilty of murder. So far, we entirely go with Mr. Justice Stephen. But to the general rule that the intention or object of a crime makes no difference in its criminality must be introduced the exception that the law may make the character of an action depend upon the "intent," or, to use plain language, the "object" with which it is done. "R. v. Woodburne" comes precisely within this exceptional instance. The offence at which the Coventry Act was aimed was a peculiar crime,—namely, wounding with intent to maim and disfigure, or (in popular language) wounding a man for the purpose of maiming and disfiguring him. Now, Coke's purpose was not to maim, but to kill an enemy. No doubt, the mode in which he attacked Crispe did involve incidentally the infliction of wounds which disfigured Crispe. But this was not the object or intention of the attack, and the assault, therefore, did not fall within the meaning of the statute under which Coke suffered death. That this is the right legal view of the matter may be maintained with the more confidence because, as our author himself points out, there is judicial authority distinctly opposed to his view of the law. "Williams' Case, 1 Leach, 529," was decided under a different Act, but involves precisely the same considerations as "R. v. Woodburne." Rhenwick Williams was the so called "Monster," who a little less than a century ago used to go about stabbing any woman whom he had an opportunity of assaulting. On January 18th, 1790, he stabbed one Anne Porter. He was indicted not for his real offence, but under 6 George I., c. 23, for the special crime of assaulting a person with intent to tear his clothes. His real crime was a murderous assault, the offence charged against him was tearing Miss Porter's petticoats. The judges, not, be it remarked, a single judge, held that the indictment would not lie. This conclusion was, it is true, rested on several grounds, but the majority of the Bench were of opinion that "the case, as proved, is not substantially within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. This statute was passed upon a particular and extraordinary occasion. Upon the introduction of Indian fashions into this country, the silk weavers made it a practice to tear and destroy the clothes which were of a different commodity from that which they wore; and to prevent this practice the statute of 6 George I., c. 23, was made. To bring a case, therefore, within this statute, the primary intention must be the tearing of the clothes; whereas, in the present case, the primary intention of the prisoner appears to have been the wounding of the person of the prosecutrix." This is sound law, and in spite of Mr. Justice Stephen's ingenious line of argument, we venture to assert that it is also sound sense and good logic. If a decision resting on the principle involved in "R. v. Woodburne" could stand, which, in the face of "Williams' Case," we maintain it could not, there would be no guarantee whatever against enactments passed to punish a definite offence being construed so as to cover acts of a totally different character.

We have gone at length into Mr. Justice Stephen's doctrine as to intention, because it happens to present a point of interest which admits of being definitely dealt with within a limited space, and also because it affords a specimen of the sort of bias against popular opinion which, to a certain extent, colours many of his theories. It may, for example, be doubted whether this bias is not discernible in the treatment of what it must be admitted are, from any point of view, the very difficult questions raised by any attempt to define the law relating to libel, to treason, or to blasphemy. But it would be the height, not only of injustice, but of stupidity to treat what seem to us the occasional flaws in Mr. Justice Stephen's mode of argument, or, perhaps, rather in his turn of thought, as if they were in any sense fair specimens of his work. Whoever wishes to see how much our author can do towards clearing up a subject about which lawyers, no less than laymen, are apt to entertain very confused ideas, he should read the few pages which treat of the nature of property, and which impress on the reader the constantly forgotten fact that property consists not of things, but of rights, though, by an unfortunate ambiguity of language, the word is constantly used to designate the things with which certain classes of rights are associated. It would have been a gain if Sir James Stephen had pressed his analysis a step further, and had pointed out that the common characteristic of the rights which make up property is the fact that they may legally be dealt with as objects of sale, or, to use slightly different language, are legally capable of having a money value. Though one may regret that this fact was not pointed out to the reader, it is hardly possible to rate too highly the service rendered to legal science by a writer who dispels a great part of the confusion and mystery which in ordinary English law-books obscures the whole topic of ownership. If, again, a critic wishes to see how ably Sir James Stephen can, when he brings his whole mind to a subject, discuss a most difficult problem, in which legal, moral, and medical considerations are curiously mixed together, he should read and ponder over the chapter on the relation of madness to crime. It is plain that the learned Judge has studied the matter from every point of view, and the careful thought which he has given to a difficulty has prevented him from falling into the temptation, which besets every lawyer who writes about madness, of becoming so indignant at the pretentious fallacies often propounded by so-called mad-doctors as to believe that no attention ought to be paid to the medical aspect of lunacy. The result is that with the law as propounded by Sir James Stephen, no moralist of ordinary judgment and no physician endowed with common-sense need quarrel. The only question which may fairly be raised is how far Sir James Stephen's exposition may not be called rather a judicial amendment of the law, than a statement of the rules intended to be laid down by the different judges who, under one form or another, have stated and, in fact, have made the law as to the criminal effect of lunacy. A careful perusal of his account of the relation of madness to crime leaves on our own minds the impression that the earlier Judges took a very narrow view of the nature of lunacy, and that the celebrated answers given by the Bench to the inquiries submitted to them in McNaghten's case rested on imperfect knowledge of the phenomena presented by mental disease. It is, however, apparent that if, even so late as 1843, the law as to the connection between madness and responsibility was, in effect, created by men who knew much more about law than they did about lunacy, the Judges have, like less able persons, modified their views, under the influence of increasing knowledge. The law, in short, as understood and enforced by the members of the High Court of Justice, consists of rules as sensible and fair as can be framed under the present condition of medical and moral science, but it is not exactly the law which existed in 1843.

Here, however, we touch upon a topic far too interesting and intricate to be dealt with at the end of an article, namely, the nature and limits of that judicial legislation which is the source of the greater and by far the best part of the Law of England. Three remarks, however, on the subject, suggested by the study of the History of the Criminal Law of England, are worth making. The first is that judicial legislation has not only been tolerated, but has, on the whole, met with popular approval, because Judge-made law is, in many respects, superior to the Statutes, which are the fruit of Parliamentary fussiness, ignorance, and partisanship. The second is that half the defects of judicial legislation are due to this, that Judges, failing to recognise the fact that they constantly act as legislators, and that it therefore may well be doubted whether one mode of improving the law would not be to recognise openly, and rather to increase than diminish, the legislative authority of the Bench. The third remark is that writers like Sir James Stephen, who are in search of fixed and definite rules, underrate the flexibility and expansiveness of judicial legislation. Whether these qualities are virtues or vices is fairly open to discussion. What cannot be fairly disputed is that the so-called principles established by the decisions of the Courts are rules which have nothing like the fixity of statutory enactments. If you wish to know how a given case will be decided, or in other words, if you wish to ascertain what is the law on a given topic, you must, if the matter depends on reported cases, look rather to the tendency of the decisions, than to the absolute rules which they establish. Williams' case overrules or repeals "R. v. Woodburne." An expression such as the dogma that "Christianity" or "hereditary monarchy" is "part of the law of the land," has a different sense in the mouth of Lord Justice Coleridge from the sense which it had in the mouth of Coke, or even of Mansfield. The legislation of the Courts gives, like other legislation, expression to the changing sentiments, principles, and beliefs of each succeeding age. This point needs to be pressed home, because a logician and a codifier such as Sir James Stephen almost of necessity tends to impress upon his readers an idea that cases which show the direction in which judicial legislation moves, can be taken as embodying principles or rules as strict as those to be found in the Statute-book. This notion is to a certain extent erroneous. But readers who wish either to increase their knowledge of English law, or to study most interesting applications of logic to the actual affairs of real life, can take no wiser course than to try to determine for themselves what is the nature of Judge-made law by a careful perusal of the History of the Criminal Law of England. It is very rarely that laymen have an opportunity of studying an account of a whole province of law, written in English which every man of education can understand, by a writer who is at once an eminent judge and a trained jurist.

IN THE OLDEN TIME.*

WE regret to have anything but praise to bestow upon so charming a writer as the author of Mademoiselle Mori and The Atelier du Lys, but we hope that she will look upon our blame as the very opposite of that faint praise which is condemnation, when we say that what we chiefly complain of as to her last story, is that she has chosen a subject which does not suit her genius,—or rather, that other subjects suit it so very much better, that it seems not to suit her genius. In the Olden Time is an historical romance; and if we had not been spoilt for historical romances by Sir Walter Scott and a few others, or even if this story were not by an authoress who excelled in another branch of fiction, our criticism of it might appear hyper-criticism. The scene is laid in Germany, and the story begins during the time of the Peasant War which raged in some parts of the empire in the reign of the Emperor Charles V., in the years 1524-5—a turbid and dark period, marked by tyranny and oppression on the part of the nobles, and by savage revenge and crime on the part of the serfs; by rivalry between the different Courts of Austria and Germany, scheming and plotting amongst the nobles against one another, and amongst the powerful monasteries,—then more like small courts than anything else, with soldiers and money at their command, which they lent now to one of the rival princes now to another.

Through all the confusion of these public affairs runs the history of a child,—the daughter of a noble who is murdered at the instigation of his cousin, the next heir to his property in succession to the little heroine of the story, Rosilde of Burgstein, whom he makes his prisoner, and destines to be the bride of his savage young son; and of her deliverer, a lad, the son of a freed-man on the neighbouring lands of Geyer. Parallel to the history of these two—we may almost say—children, moves that of a young priest of noble birth, exiled by some jealous superior to the Ilzthal, a valley in the Thuringian Forest belonging to the Barons of Burgstein; and of a leper—or one supposed to be a leper—who lives apart from his fellow-men in a cave above this valley. The stories of these four characters, as we have said, runs through or by the side of all the historical incidents of the book, but are too independent of them for the latter to give any very absorbing interest to the plot. The times being such as we have described them, it would require a master-hand, such as Sir Walter Scott's, so to interweave the fortunes of the hero and heroine with the failure or success of all the political schemers, as to give intense interest to the tale. Few men, and still fewer women, are able to throw themselves successfully into other times than their own, and the power of creating real, living characters out of the actors in the stormy, warlike Middle Ages, is a very rare gift indeed. The dash and fire, the lawless aiming at the overthrow of others, the skilful and, at the same time, wary carrying-out of plot and scheme, are beyond most of us who live in this lawful and, for the most part, law-respecting nineteenth century of ours. Again, plot should be one of the strong points of the writers of historical romances, and we do not consider that it is a strong point in the stories of this author. The dangers and difficulties through which Rosilde and Hildemund pass, are rather a series of short adventures, out of each of which they emerge safely and soon, than one continuous danger which is triumphantly overcome in the end, although the peril arising from the Graf von Lichtenberg's tyranny runs through the whole story. The re-establishing of Rosilde in her rightful rank and position—which of course is the chief purpose of the story—excites no strong feeling of interest in the reader's mind, because Rosilde herself is indifferent to it, or rather, because she has cast off, in disgust, the class to which she belongs, and embraced, with all their cares and dignities, the burgher class, amongst whom she has found a good home, and in which she has centred all her affections. Now, this may be, no doubt is, the right state of mind, but it is not the one which lends interest to the righting of a great wrong, the main point of the story. The author stands too much apart from her characters, and from their mediæval life, superstitions, and class-prejudices, as few indeed could avoid doing. She writes back, as it were, from her own age to theirs, instead of being—as Sir Walter

Scott, for instance, is in Quentin Durward, a tale of only a few years later date—one apparently of the time, writing of them as a contemporary might do, sympathising with all their violent loves and hates, and not putting the reader into a critical state of mind about all their old-world faults and superstitions. The authoress of In the Olden Time fails also in creating a good, sound, hateful villain; for though the actions of the Graf von Lichtenberg are bad enough unquestionably, and though his character is as unprincipled and unscrupulous as self-interest can make it, he does not, somehow, create in our minds the active and comfortable hatred which the true villain of a piece should do, and his downfall, therefore, is not the gratification to our love of retributive justice which it might have been.

The story shows very minute and careful study of the times and of the manners of the people, and it is unnecessary to say, in speaking of this writer, that the English and the style of expression are faultless, and that the sentiments throughout are of the highest and purest. The character of the leper is very good indeed, and his terrible struggle for resignation, to a lot so hideous, touchingly and admirably described; the only thing we have to regret about him is the short episode in his life in which he appears, after his return to the world, as a lover. To see him in this character jars upon our feelings a little, and spoils the striking picture of the lonely man—striving to give himself up, both body and soul—helped and encouraged, amidst the contempt and loathing of his fellow-creatures—or at best their pity and compassion—by the admiration and love of a child, and the unshrinking caress of the hare and other wild animals around his cave, which he tames. Had he at once, on being restored to life and health, given himself up—as he eventually does—as an offering of thanks, to ministering to such wretched ones of his fellow-creatures who are actually what he had believed himself to be, the picture would have been complete. In Pfarrer Basil we have the most attractive character in the book, and in his life there is no discordant element. Believing ardently in the great doctrines at the foundation of the Christian religion, his affection for the Church from which he had learnt them, the force of early training, and his modest want of confidence in himself, bind him, from first to last, to the Church of Rome, though his intellect and his sympathy with the people incline him to embrace the broader teachings of Luther, and to join the band of Reformers which is every day augmenting its ranks. His final step in joining the Brotherhood of St. Lazarus of Jerusalem, who devote themselves to ministering to the wants of lepers, and to assuaging, as much as possible, the wretchedness of their outcast lot, is characteristic of the way in which—just because, as it were, of his doubts of his Church—he subjects himself to her severest discipline. To atone for the shrinking of his sensitive nature from the loathsome disease of leprosy, when endured by one so noble as Ulrich von Lichtenberg, he relinquishes all the pleasures of life among his fellow-men, and dedicates himself to the alleviation of the leper's lot. The excessive refinement of his sympathy with suffering, and his shrinking from pain, are beautifully illustrated in the following passage, which is perhaps the most striking in the book. Pfarrer Basil meets the young Hildemund one evening after mass, and walks with him through the glades of the Thuringian Forest. They are speaking of a serf, who had had his hand struck off for poaching:—

“You were not alone when you left the village. Who was that I saw with you—a tall, meagre, swart man, with one hand?”—“Kaspar, sir; he was maimed for fishing in the Freiherr von Burgstein's waters, but it truly was to keep his sick mother from starving.”—Hildemund could not read the look which passed over the priest's face. Killing game or catching fish was so grievous an offence, that it never occurred to him it was abhorrence of the cruel penalty exacted which that look expressed.—“And the sick mother?” asked Pfarrer Basil, abruptly.—“She died, sir. Old Martin, Kaspar's father, was ailing too, and could earn nothing, and it was winter-time, and the ways blocked with snow; no one knew they were in such evil case till Kaspar was set free from the castle prison, and came home and found her dead, and the old man too weak to seek help to bury her. But the Baron showed them mercy, for he remitted the death-tax; so they put her under ground.”—“Ah!” said Pfarrer Basil, with a sarcastic curl of his finely-cut, sensitive lips; “aye, that was merciful! What is that?” He spoke with a start and accent of dismay which astonished Hildemund. “A rabbit, sir; yes, see, there it comes, and a weasel after it; how the poor beast screams! Nay, then, master weasel, not this time, let my lord's game alone;” and he sprang forward and snatched up the exhausted, terrified little fugitive just as the weasel was upon it. The rabbit lay powerless with exhaustion and terror in Hildemund's hands; the weasel glided swiftly into the fern. “I would I had a stick here; the beast should not have escaped so easily,” said Hildemund, caressing the panting captive. “There, get to thy burrow; see, sir, it lies still, too fearful to stir; now it lifts its ears; it will be gone directly.'—'What a cry! Can a beast feel such mortal terror? It will ring in my ears all night,' muttered Pfarrer Basil. He was quite pale and overcome. Hildemund, though a thoroughly kind-hearted boy, and fond of all live creatures, could not help feeling a little wonder and contempt at the effect produced by the rabbit's danger. 'You often hear it, sir. If you did not know what it was, you might think a hawk had screamed.'—'In that sight and sound I see and hear the impotent anguish of all helpless, tortured things,' said the priest, passing his hand over his brow. 'My God, how dreadful pain is, wherever it is found.' Hildemund only dimly understood his meaning, and more dimly still the over-sensitive, nervous nature that could feel thus,—a nature that must inevitably have suffered keenly wherever and whenever it existed, but was certain to cause its owner peculiar pangs at such a rough time, and in such hard and uncultured surroundings."

We should very much like to be allowed here to make a suggestion to authors. It would add greatly to the convenience of reviewers and of the public in general, and would, we imagine, also promote the sale of authors' books, if a complete list of all the previous works of the author were attached, as a matter of course, to each fresh production, and a revised list to each new edition. In the present case, for instance, we see In the Olden Time, "by the author of The Atelier du Lys," and in other works of hers, "by the author of Mademoiselle Mori." Now, to our minds, the two infinitely most attractive of those of her works with which we are acquainted are systematically omitted, namely, On the Edge of the Storm and Denise. Mademoiselle Mori is, like the story we are noticing, more or less of an historical romance, though of modern time, and is also a good deal inclined to be guide-booky and long-winded, and the Atelier du Lys falls off decidedly in interest towards the end; while On the Edge of the Storm, though historical also, as treating of the French Revolution, yet touches upon history only as it affects the private life of the heroine; and, in Denise, this authoress has struck the most harmonious chord of her genius. The quiet, yet wonderfully picturesque life of the little town of Farnoux, on the steep hill-side, with its pale, olive groves above its vine-covered hills, and its delicious orange gardens overlooking the exquisite blue waters of the bay below, and the delightfully interesting and comic old artist aunt, Mademoiselle le Marchand, and, above all, the beautiful, peaceful, and devoted character of Denise herself, make a story quite perfect in its way. We should welcome with delight another such novel from the hands of the author of Mademoiselle Mori and The Atelier du Lys.

THERE are many signs that the chief religious controversy of the immediate future will be concerned, not with the questions of the existence of God, of design, or even of immortality, but with the great and singularly difficult subject of Personality. Among the really educated, sheer atheism hardly exists; and even Agnostics will generally own that there is a God, if only because there must be a First Cause. But there comes in the fundamental difference,—Is your God personal, or is He not? The difference is fundamental, for in the belief in the personality of God there seems to be involved the belief in our own personality, and therefore in our own personal immortality. And it is this gulf that men are making the most earnest efforts to bridge over, or rather to conceal. The author of Ecce Homo leaves the study of the historical person of Christ to manufacture a Natural Religion which shall be accessible to all; and he makes it accessible by shrouding the personality of God in a convenient vagueness, and by making admiration, not love, the foundation of religion. And just as Theists and Agnostics are invited to join in a common admiration of a God who need not be personal, so Christians and non-Christians are every day being called upon to unite in a common reverence and "sympathy" for a Lord whose present personal existence need not be believed or maintained. Christians will have to define their thoughts and phraseology more strictly than they have hitherto for the most part done, if they wish to preserve that which seems to us to be the very central point of their religion, a personal union to a personal Saviour.

These thoughts have recurred to us on reading Mr. Fremantle's earnest and vigorous and often lofty attempt to widen the common conception of Christianity, so as to make it include all secular life. Put shortly, the whole volume is a development of the idea that sacred and secular are one. Faith, he declares, is the great uniting power that brings together those whom Churches and creeds have separated, because faith is "a deep moral principle," and no mere belief in dogmas, and therefore faith can be the moving force in every department of life. There is no separate sphere for worship, but Christianity is a social state, and in that social state true worship, the true religious life, is carried on, through the spirit of Christ. Christ is shown to be supreme over the whole field of life, over education, trade, literature, art, natural science, politics. The work of establishing this supremacy is common to all, and religious privileges only mean pre-eminence in this work. Of course, therefore, Mr. Fremantle is led to lay stress on the universal Christian priesthood, and to minimize any clerical or sacerdotal claims; of course, also, he bases these conclusions on what he calls the "immanence of God," the doctrine that "God is a Spirit;" and finally, he uses this doctrine of the Holy Spirit to prove that progress is the law of the Church, by the quickening influence of the Spirit of Christ.

We feel it difficult, in criticising a book of this kind, to avoid giving a wholly incorrect impression of our own position on the subject it deals with. It is hard not to be one-sided in discussing a book which seems to us so true and lofty in its positive assertions, but so deficient and untrue in what it denies. We are compelled to lay stress on the deficiencies, and therefore to run the risk of seeming indifferent or hostile to the positive merits. And the difficulty is increased by the fact that Mr. Fremantle only leaves us to infer his defects, for there are few negative passages in the book. And yet we suppose he would hardly deny that in identifying the secular and the sacred, in making so prominent the work of the Church on the common life of men, he really intends, though he does not say so, to obscure and put into the background the function of "worship" and the supernatural aspect of the Church. Now, we may say most strongly that in much that he lays down we heartily agree with Mr. Fremantle. We hold with him that "Christians should be interested in and should foster all that is excellent in science, or art, or political life." We agree with nearly the whole of the third sermon, in which he claims for the Spirit of Christ "supremacy over the whole range of the secular life," especially with the admirable passage on trade. (pp. 98-101.) We should echo much of what he says on religious privilege, even though we could by no means say, with him and in his sense, that it is "simply the opportunity of doing good." And we need not say that we fully appreciate the fine eagerness for the elevation and improvement of the world that Mr. Fremantle consistently displays throughout these sermons. But, with these qualifications, we cannot but take great exception to the omissions and negations of his theories, and, above all, to the fundamental vagueness on the great question of Personality.

We admit that Mr. Fremantle begins by laying down that "Faith is trust in a person;" and that he safeguards his doctrine of the immanence of God by premising that "whatever the supreme power is, He cannot be thought of as destitute of mind and love." But these passages are, more or less, isolated and peculiar; the tone of the whole book is against them. Mr. Fremantle's tendency is to make of God not a righteous and loving person, but Righteousness and Love; Christ is an image of abstract qualities, rather than a living Person. What else can we make of such passages as this?—"Whether the strict monotheistic tendency be maintained, or whether that more spiritual tendency prevail which tends to trace out the divine in the evolving forces of nature and of mankind, the image of Christ remains ever before us," &c. The words we have italicised apparently mean that, in Mr. Fremantle's opinion, Pantheism is more spiritual than Theism; and, at all events, he seems to contemplate with equanimity the possible transformation of "personal" religion into what can surely be nothing but Pantheism. Again, in the statement (p. 198), "we are no longer to think of the Divine as confined within the personality of a man," Mr. Fremantle seems to go counter to either one or other of two Christian truths, both of which, we suppose, he would acknowledge. Either he means that God once existed only in the Person of Christ, which contradicts even the vaguest form of the doctrine of the Trinity; or he holds that the human personality of Christ no longer exists since the Ascension, which surely destroys all that is most elevating in the doctrine of the Incarnation. The qualification, indeed, on the previous page, that the personality of Christ "has passed away from the earth," would partly evade this dilemma; but throughout the book, nevertheless, there seems to run an indistinct notion that the "personality" or the Person of Christ has passed away altogether, and left us with only "the image of Christ," to which (p. 43) we are united by faith, and which (p. 59) is at the root of our religion. Now, we cannot help asking as we read, whether Mr. Fremantle really thinks he can bring all Christians to unite in this amorphous belief. Is a God who is spoken of as "the divine" to be "traced out in the evolving forces of nature and of mankind," and a Christ who has become nothing but an "image," a recollection, to take the place of the Christian Father of souls, of the Christian Lord and Saviour to whom, and not to whose image, every Christian is now united? We are not quibbling on a word or a definition; we hold that the essence of Christianity is personal union to a personal Saviour, and we see underlying all the vagueness of Mr. Fremantle's writing about the image of Christ, the futile modern tendency to substitute a recollection and an example for the abiding presence of Christ in us and in the world. Whether we misrepresent these sermons our readers may judge from such a passage as this:—"The faith which is strongest, and which unites men together is not primarily the belief in the Church or the sacraments, in the miraculous birth of Christ or his bodily resurrection, nor even that which we call, perhaps with too much confidence and strictness, the Personality of God. These are the supports and guarantees, the external fences or the outgrowths of faith. But the faith which saves and which makes us true to our Lord is that which welcomes truth and goodness, and treasures them up; for these are the very nature of God. Let the heart be filled with the image of Christ; and this will lead you on to life and immortality, to a fuller view of God, and to the filling-up of the outlines of the life of Christ." All this may be very good and true, but Christianity is surely something more; and it is that something more that Mr. Fremantle has, to our mind, failed to grasp, or at least to display.

As he falls short in his doctrine of the personality of God and of our Lord, so he seems to us to misrepresent faith. Faith, he says, "has suffered much more from over-definition than from indistinctness in its object." This struck us as strange, for though it may be true to say that the life of the Church has, historically speaking, suffered from over-definition, we do not see how it can be held that faith, the means by which we apprehend God, can fail to benefit by whatever makes the character of God clearer to the mind, and it is a mere petitio principii to say that definitions of faith fail to do this. But our difficulty was removed by the next sentence:—"Certainly, the greatest quarrels among Christians have arisen from the attempt to define what might well have been left indefinite" (p. 43), for then we recollected that what Mr. Fremantle calls faith is "a deep moral principle," a "sympathy with divine goodness a communion of service rendered to mankind, an aspiration for a goodness unseen, unrealised." He may well say that no one "can refuse to admit" faith of that kind (p. 134), but whether there is any advantage in confusing faith with every other spiritual faculty, with love, with hope, and with admiration, we may well doubt; and this doubt becomes certainty when we find him, in the passage above quoted, identifying "quarrels among Christians" with the "suffering" of faith.

In order to fuse sacred and secular things, Mr. Fremantle devotes one whole sermon and many incidental remarks to attacking the principle of worship. Of course, this is not openly, perhaps not consciously done. In the prefatory essay, he simply sets worship aside, as out of his scope, and as well provided for by existing organisations, and directed by "competent men." "It is not necessary," he says, "to disparage the ordinary work of the Church." (p. 8.) But in his second sermon he sets himself to prove nothing less than that the Apocalypse presents us with an ideal Church, in which "the appliances of worship are completely absent." This remarkable assertion is based, in the bad fashion of preachers which we should have thought Mr. Fremantle would have scorned, upon one text, "And I saw no temple therein." Surely, no one can read the Apocalypse without recognising there the ideal, the almost exaggerated ideal, of a life which is all worship, in the technical sense of the word. And though the harps, and the incense, and the golden crowns, and the altar are not mentioned in the description of the New Jerusalem, yet the reference to them in the earlier part of the Apocalypse should at least prevent the inference that "it is not a system of worship that Christianity came to bring to mankind." Quite true, in one sense; Christianity came to bring much more than this, and it did not promulgate any very definite system of worship; but it is a great misrepresentation to say that "the ideal of the Primitive Church was one not of worship, but of a life pervaded by the Spirit of God." (p. 64.) Mr. Fremantle here falls into the common fallacy of opposing two perfectly compatible things, and he is led into it by his calm assumption that worship, as generally understood, is a thing "abstracted from the common life of men." "Faith is not best promoted when men try to realise it in a system of religious worship and teaching which is kept separate from the general aims of human life." (p. 70.) We do not deny that this has been, and is, perhaps, still a danger; but it is a danger not to be avoided by disregarding worship altogether, or by trying to prove that our Lord "ignored" the ceremonial law and the Temple services. His practical example must in this matter be taken with his teaching, and in his practice there was certainly no ignoring of the ceremonial law. Christianity maintains a system of worship because of the very necessity that Mr. Fremantle emphasises so much, the necessity of consecrating the common routine of life. This is to be done not by waiting till we find God in our "trivial round," but by bringing Him into it from the special moments of communion and intercourse with Him in acts of prayer and worship. The difference between a religious life and a life of high morality is the difference between a life coloured and transformed by periods of devotion, and a life which is one dead-level of duties, with no special points of intercourse with God. Perhaps Mr. Fremantle would agree with us, but if so, it is a pity that his sermons leave so partial an impression on the mind.

A few separate matters of criticism we may shortly notice. The statement that the "distinction between things sacred and things secular was unknown to the early Church" cannot be maintained, in the face of the appointment of the seven Deacons to look after those matters which were considered too secular for the Apostles. What does Mr. Fremantle (p. 73) mean by saying that "the arrangements for the serving of tables was (sic) in the hands of the Apostles?" There can scarcely be a clearer refutation of his view than Acts vi., 2-4, where the "serving of tables" is opposed to "prayer and the ministry of the Word," which were to be the special occupations of the Apostles.

There is a most misleading reference on p. 22 to Dr. Westcott's Gospel of the Resurrection, as justifying the statement that "the Resurrection itself is to be viewed rather as a disclosure of another state of existence, than as belonging to the order of events with which physical science is conversant." It is enough to say that in the introduction to that work Dr. Westcott deals exhaustively with the whole subject of miracles and law, in order to justify the Resurrection of our Lord as an historical fact.

Lastly, we would remark that Mr. Fremantle, in his anxiety to abolish Sacerdotalism, is led into some very wild statements about its results in England. (pp. 52-3.) No one who knows what Ritualism, as distinguished from the other sections of the English Church, has done, will be inclined to agree with any one of his charges. It is "alienating class after class of men." "We are no nearer to union with any of the forms of so-called Catholicism." "Religion is being gradually eliminated from common life," and Christianity, under this influence, becomes "the foe of human progress." Whatever the faults of modern English sacerdotalism may be, and we shall not be suspected of ignoring them, it often strikes us as strange that it is so commonly and closely linked with Radicalism in politics, and that it has shown itself so powerful to win back at least one class, the working-class, which Evangelicalism and the high-and-dry school had effectually "alienated." Such charges too faithfully reflect the one-sided character of Mr. Fremantle's sermons. In his generous desire to be just to secularists, he misrepresents his own fellow-believers; and in his energetic zeal to Christianise secular life, he succeeds only in secularising Christianity.

on the subject—and that it is “digested and arranged with a clearness and system that at once hold the interest and attention of the student and reader, and present the clearest picture of its theme, it is believed, to be found in the language.” From this prospectus, which, no doubt, has been kindly drawn up in the interest of reviewers, who, according to Professor Welsh, rarely look beyond the preface of a work, it may be as well to take some more particulars. They are very impressive, and must make many a poor English author wish he were blessed with publishers at once so capable and so willing to magnify his work:—

“Each of the periods,” we read, “into which the work is divided is introduced by a sketch of the features which distinguish it, and of the forces which shape it, including politics, the state of society, religion, learning, language, poetry, the drama, the novel, the periodical, history, theology, ethics, science, philosophy. Periods are re-created, the past is resuscitated. The actors are made to reveal themselves in their own words. Passions are not simply described as existing, but are exhibited in the souls and hearts possessed by them. . . . The work satisfies the imagination, by being individual and minute; it satisfies the reason, by being interpretative and philosophical. The author has aimed at a judicious union of facts and philosophy, of narrative and reflection, of objective description and subjective meditation; above all, to make a truthful and useful book in the highest degree,—one that will tend to form habits of reading with discrimination and with ardour, that will add power to the intellect, range to the imagination, and finish to character.”

This eulogistic estimate of Mr. Welsh's volumes, so far from making them attractive in English eyes, will probably lead the critic to regard them with suspicion. And this feeling of distrust is likely to be increased upon reading the rather pretentious prologue, in which Professor Welsh states that he has aimed at a judicious union of facts and philosophy, of narrative and reflection, of objective description and subjective meditation. “Colour and form,” he adds, “may be desirable to attract the eye, but the interlacing spiritual force, that blends them into harmony and coherence, is required to make their lesson disciplinary, available, and enduring.”

The first three chapters describe with sufficient knowledge and skill the earliest history of Britain, the origin and development of the language, and the representative writers who, like Caedmon and Bede, sowed the seeds of our literature in verse and prose. Then follows what is called “The Initiative Period,” which brings us to the age of Mandeville and Wycliffe, of Gower and Chaucer, the first great poet of England having his genius illustrated by copious and well-selected passages. Mr. Welsh's style does not add any attraction to his matter, but this portion of the work and the succeeding chapter, called “The First Creative Period,” show a careful study of the subject. Yet even here, though by no means so much as in later chapters, bad-taste, absurd imagery, and the grandiloquence so often mistaken for eloquence, are conspicuous features of the narrative. We may let Mr. Welsh's inaccurate assertion pass when he calls the Church of England a flourishing branch of the Church of Rome, but he loses his head altogether when he describes this branch as “shooting forth in the open air, amid satin doublets and stage attitudes, amid youthful bluster and fashionable prodigality.” The account of the literature of the Tudor period, although without novelty, might be read with interest, were it not for the author's jerky, interrogative, and irritating style. Yet at times an evident attraction to his subject gives comparative simplicity to his diction, and the comments on Sir Philip Sidney and on Hooker are likely to impress the reader favourably. Several of our early writers Mr. Welsh seems to have read with care, but on coming to a later period the references appear to be made in many instances at second-hand.

The picture drawn of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries is in the main a correct one, but Mr. Welsh studies grotesqueness in his comments, and succeeds to admiration. Of Dryden, after saying that he has left no single work which is universally read, he observes:—“Without an unapproachable mirage of excellence, for ever receding and for ever pursued, no man reaches his full or conceivable stature. A self-reliant independence is the Adam and Eve in the paradise of duties.” And of the essays of Addison and Steele he writes, “The end was moral health, the means were sugar-coated pills.” Mr. Welsh is carelessly inaccurate, by the way, in calling the Spectator a news-organ, and his estimate of its writers shows, at least, that he has not studied Addison's style with advantage. Of Steele, he says, “Occupying a more elevated plane than many of his contemporaries, he is paled in his powers by the overshadowing presence of his illustrious friend;” and in the criticism on Addison, we read:—

With a similar pomposity and absurdity, Mr. Welsh writes an epitaph over the grave of Swift, which we are supposed to hear “as in the sigh of the wailing wind.” “This hideous treatise, so shudderingly calm,” is the exclamation called forth by The Modest Proposal, and we are told that Swift was constitutionally incapable of religion. “Joy is wanting, save the joy of tearing.” Defoe is, on the whole, fairly estimated, though no account is taken of the six letters which reveal his political tergiversation, nor of the grossness with which such works of his old age as Moll Flanders and Roxana, are so painfully infected. And in depriving him of the ears which he never lost, we suppose the author has accepted too literally the statement in the Dunciad. In the critic's judgment, the Essay on Man is the noblest of all Pope's works and the surest guarantee of his immortality. Yet the reader is informed on the same page that Pope was not master of his subject, and undertook to teach what he could not comprehend. “He aspired to harmonise conflicting systems of thought, and succeeded in making a chaos.” And what does the student of poetry gain from the common-place statement that Pope is without the universality of Shakespeare, or the sublimity of Milton?—or from the observation, which sounded commonplace in the last century, but has been long ago exploded in this, that to Pope the English language will always be indebted, since “he more than any other, before or since, discovered its power of melody”? Goldsmith would probably have preferred Johnson's epitaph to the stilted praise of the author who observes that “he who was once a journeying beggar, now rides on the shoulders of the world.” This gentle poet combined with his other gifts a true sense of the niceties of language, and he would not, we feel sure, have written, as Professor Welsh does, of Marlow and Hastings as “two parties.” And passing from Goldsmith to Cowper, we read that when he died, “English poetry was again in possession of its varied endowment,” and it became apparent for the first time “that the despotism of Pope and Addison had passed away”; but Addison as a writer of verse had no followers, and exercised no despotism.

The extraordinary progress in physical science in the present century is duly chronicled by Mr. Welsh, who observes, when writing of the electric telegraph, that “thought was postilioned across the air.” On the men of letters who have flourished during this period, the author writes vaguely, as if he were not always sure of his ground. After praising what in reality are the weak points of Campbell's verse, and leaving without recognition the lyrics, on which his reputation rests, the critic adds, “Another of sterner tone and fuller swing is Southey,” an observation which means anything or nothing; and Moore, who follows Southey, is described as “equally factitious, but more radiant.” Coleridge receives, as he deserves, higher recognition than either as a poet, and when the writer observes of one poem, “how trancingly rolls its melody!” and quotes another with the question, “Who shall estimate the wild beatings and the widowed longings of the heart of genius?” we must at least acknowledge that his method as a commentator is unique. “Shakespeare's works,” we are told, with very great inaccuracy, are “models of Teutonic simplicity;” to judge from Mr. Welsh's own style, he does not understand the meaning of the term. If a student, for example, turns to the chapter on Tennyson, he will read that his style is,—

“Pure, simple, correct, polished, elegant, ornate; wanting the variety and freedom of the forest-like Shakespeare and the impassioned Byron, yet not unfrequently rising to the level of the former in expressiveness; sometimes Homeric in severity and elevation, sometimes Spenserian in splendid imagery and cloying music; mingling in chaste harmony the flowers of all ages, native and exotic.”

It must not be supposed that this history of our literature is the work of an ignorant, though it is certainly the work of an uncultivated man. Professor Welsh has, no doubt, read much of the history and literature of the different periods he undertakes to describe, but he includes far more in his plan than he is able to treat adequately, and wastes whatever strength he has and his readers' patience also in the futile effort to write impressively. A vast amount of material is brought together, and an attempt has been made to give unity to the work. It contains 1,100 pages; but, if we may venture to oppose the estimate of the publishers, the book will neither satisfy the reason nor the judgment.

A few words only must be said with regard to Mr. Nicoll's Landmarks of English Literature, but they will be words of praise. It is possible that Mr. Nicoll has far less knowledge than Professor Welsh, but he knows better how to use it, and his well-arranged volume will be of service to the student and interesting to the general reader. Biography and history are combined with criticism, so that the men are seen as well as their works, and seen, we think, more clearly, because described more simply, than in Mr. Welsh's volumes. In those volumes dates are employed so sparingly that the reader in search of the exact period referred to is forced to look elsewhere. On the other hand, the copious and careful table of chronology constructed by Mr. Nicoll gives a distinct value to the book as a work of reference. The volume is without pretension, and deserves praise for simplicity of purpose, as well as for careful workmanship. We have noticed some slight errors. It is not quite correct to say that Rogers called on Dr. Johnson. He went with his friend Malthby to his house in Bolt Court, but on reaching the door their courage failed them, and they retreated. Mr. Nicoll rarely goes far wrong in his criticisms; but in saying that in Sir Charles Grandison, Richardson sinks below the level of Pamela, he must have forgotten the finely-drawn character of Clementina, whose madness is described with a subtle art unsurpassed, in our judgment, by any English author save Shakespeare. Again, we meet with an apparent contradiction in his estimate of Richardson's great rival. "Fielding," he writes, "at all times resembled Thackeray in having a thorough and healthy aversion for anything approaching to making a hero out of a blackguard." Yet on the next page he is disposed to agree with Byron's verdict that "Tom Jones" was "an accomplished blackguard," a judgment which few modern readers will be likely to contest.

TWO NEW NOVELS.*

MR. MURRAY in his preface criticises with a severity that is scarcely courteous the opinion expressed by a brother-novelist that all the stories have been told. The statement is an exaggeration, and was, of course, meant for an exaggeration. It is certainly true that many incidents and combinations of incidents which were once effective, have now become so hackneyed by use as to be practically unavailable for the purposes of fiction. Mr. Murray himself, who evidently takes much pains with his plots, and is generally very successful in constructing them, begins this his latest novel with a repetition from his latest but one. The motive of Val Strange was the struggle between friendship and love, and the motive of much, at least, of the story of Hearts is the same. We do not say that Mr. Murray does not introduce so much difference into his second treatment of the subject as to justify the repetition. We think that, on the whole, he does, though the resemblance will certainly suggest itself to any reader of the two novels, and will probably diminish the pleasure that is given by the second. To enjoy a tale thoroughly, one ought not to have lurking in one's mind even a suspicion that one has seen the same thing, or something very like the same thing, before. It is obvious that the impression of reality, in which the success of all fiction mainly lies, must be more or less impaired by the thought.

Mr. Murray has not been fortunate enough to invent a character that can be matched with Hiram Strange, the admirable Yankee who is so conspicuous a figure in the pages of Val Strange. A novelist could, indeed, hardly hope to achieve very soon another such success. The most notable personage in Hearts is of a very different type. Mark Carroll is a villain of the most pronounced kind, whose utter wickedness is artistically justified by the author by the example of Shakespeare's Iago. Whether or no we admit the justification, we must allow that the picture is drawn with remarkable skill. The man has a genuine disbelief in goodness, yet the cynical frankness with which he disavows for himself all higher motives gains for him a certain credit for honesty. "He cannot be as bad as he makes himself out," is the common verdict. The art with which he trades on this impression, the skilful diplomacy with which he increases, while he seeks, it would seem, to cure the mischief which he has wrought, and the fatal taint of weakness in his villainous plans, which makes him find out at last that honesty is really the best policy,—all this is worked out with much skill. This Mark is perhaps the real hero of the story, as Satan is of the Paradise Lost; Tom Carroll, to whom the place rightfully belongs, is scarcely a success. He would be an admirable fellow in real life, but his weaknesses, rather than his virtues, impress us, as he moves before us on the stage of fiction. The Italian Barretti, on the other hand, is a fine study. Tom has befriended him, and he finds himself making him the atrocious return of robbing him of his love. There is much dramatic power in the struggle in the Italian's heart between his love, which, as Mr. Murray describes it, is something like the overmastering power which the Greek tragedians imagined, and the sense of gratitude and duty. As for the way in which the cross-purposes are set right, it is managed, perhaps, as well as the circumstances admitted. The novelist who has to make these transferences of affection appear tolerable to his readers has not an easy task, and all that we can say is that it is accomplished in Hearts as well as we have any right to expect. Mention must be made of another skilful portraiture in Carroll the elder, with his sublime belief in himself, ending in the monomania that he is the one sane man in a world of madness. In this ending there is, perhaps, a touch of farce, and we are reminded of Mr. Easy, Senior, in the best of Captain Marryat's stories. As for the tale, regarded as a tale, it is good throughout, and towards the end, where the action becomes more rapid, rises to a high level of merit. One noticeable feature in Mr. Murray's writing must not be omitted, and that is the acute observation of life with which it is not unfrequently illustrated. We notice a tendency—we should say, having read the author's novels from the first, a growing tendency—to occasional cynicism, but we find reflections that are often both vigorous and just. It is well said, for instance, that "the clock that stands still tells the truth twice a day, and the mental attitude which never varies will find itself justified on occasion;" and it is only too true that "conscience, popularly supposed to be a sentry, is so untrustworthy that he will go to sleep on guard, unless you watch him keenly."

The ingenious lady who writes under the name of "Ouida" need never fear that for her "all the stories have been told." She has the enormous advantage over her rivals in fiction that she can invent at her pleasure worlds quite different from those in which others are constrained to move. The number of possible—but why should we say "possible?"—combinations thus becomes unlimited. Wanda gives us a faint conception of what the world of "four dimensions," as some philosophers phrase it, might be. That the heroine herself is a more magnificent personage than these common-place times of ours can endure, a feudal princess with right of life and death within her domain, is but a little thing; her castle, Hohenzabraburg (a curious compound, symbolising, we suppose, Austro-Hungary), is an imagination that transcends terrestrial limits. "A thousand glaciers [how many, we wonder, does all Switzerland boast?] glow in the sunrise, and bar the sight of sunset." Such is one of its surroundings. The interior is not less marvellous. The library is "a great, cedar-lined room, holding half-a-million volumes." Thus, even on page 60, it far surpasses the Bodleian. When we come to page 91, we find that it has outstripped the British Museum, for it now contains "a million volumes." Everything else is in keeping with this more than human magnificence. The "opium-eater's" dreams seem tame, in comparison with it.

We must not, however, let our readers think that there is nothing better than this foolish extravagance in Wanda. Judged as a romance, it contains much that is striking, and however often we may smile at the wildness of its vagaries, we read it certainly without weariness, and for the most part with pleasure. The central idea—extravagant, perhaps, in itself—is finely worked out. There never could have been so magnificent an impostor as the Marquis de Sabran. But granting his existence, his story is powerfully told. The love of Wanda wins him from idleness and pleasure to a life of noble effort; but the consciousness of the falsehood on which his whole existence is built poisons all his enjoyment. He dare not reveal his secret to his wife. Her pride of race, he feels, could never allow her to pardon him. But the secret is discovered at last. How the toils close in upon him, till he lies helplessly entangled in them; how all the while his real love for wife and children make life a bitterness to him, is finely described. We have seen nothing from "Ouida's" pen that struck us as being, on the whole, so well conceived and so skilfully wrought out, and, we may add, containing so little that need offend. There is no attempt here, as we are constrained to say there has been in some of her tales, to put a gloss on vice, but she takes vice too much for granted. She admires virtue, and certainly in Wanda gives a noble portraiture of it, but she seems to accept it as an axiom that many women and very nearly all men are profligate. If she would cultivate a less cynical habit of mind, would prune a too luxuriant imagination, and curb her strong desire of seeming learned (the girls on Wanda's estate learn botany, that they may not "poison their people at home with a false cryptogram," while soldiers "from Scylla to Michael Skobeleff" are fond, we are told, of a certain martial coquetry), we would gladly give to "Ouida's" work more unmixed praise than we have been able to bestow on Wanda.

THE MAGAZINES.

We have already noticed one or two of the papers in the Fortnightly, especially those by Mr. A. Dicey and Mr. MacColl, on the relation of the Clergy of the Church of England to the law, and the one on "The Social Discipline of the Liberal Party." Mr. John Macdonell sends another very good one on the law of blasphemy, which he maintains, differing therein from Sir James Stephen, has varied in every age with the current of opinion. The statutes remained unchanged, except by the repeal of William III.'s law for the protection of the doctrine of the Trinity; but the tone was changed and the Judges' with it, until in the period between 1797 and 1817 the Judges' charges became constantly evasive. They were willing enough to say that such and such a publication was a blasphemous libel, but they were not willing to state distinctly what kind of denial of Christianity was a civil crime. Lord Coleridge is willing, and his dictum that any belief may be assailed if the decencies of controversy be observed, is, in Mr. Macdonell's opinion, perhaps "the first clear rule on the subject expressed from the Bench by an English Judge." The law, however, even when thus explained, is harsh, and as Mr. Macdonell points out, might be interpreted by Judges without juries so as to have serious civil consequences. For instance, a bequest for the publication of Buchner's or Hæckel's works, or, we should imagine, Darwin's Descent of Man, must inevitably be held invalid. Moreover, even if Christianity is protected, no special form of religion, if unestablished, is, and the Jew, or the Swedenborgian, or, we may add, the Roman Catholic, may be subjected to merciless ridicule or direct abuse. He would, therefore, repeal the blasphemy laws, and substitute for them the Indian law, which makes attack on any religion with the intention of insult a penal offence, adding, however, the proviso that the insult must be serious. Even that law, however, might be worked so as seriously to hamper controversy, and we disagree with Mr. Macdonell in his proposal that the magistrate shall decide, and not a jury. The country clergyman, who is often the magistrate in a country district, is hardly qualified for the exercise of such great power. Mr. Boulger's paper on China, though not novel, except in the paragraphs as to the jealousy felt in Peking for the land-borne trade of the Empire, is very thoughtful and convincing. Mr. Boulger's proposition is that China cannot maintain her authority over her distant provinces without a great army, unless she keeps foreigners from her frontiers, and that the ruling men in Peking are thoroughly aware of this. They will, therefore, struggle energetically to keep the Russians out of Kuldja and the French out of Tonquin, and ourselves out of Thibet; and they will, Mr. Boulger thinks, succeed. They have millions upon millions of brave and hardy subjects who approve the ancient system, and they will in the end succeed in making from them a formidable army. If the Empire were really endangered, he believes that the Chinese would demand, and perhaps ensure, a total cessation of all foreign intercourse. Mr. Sydney Buxton draws a frightful picture of the state of Connaught, with its congested population, and shows that emigration from it has hitherto been far less than from richer districts. Some counties have lost 10 per cent. of their people, but Galway has lost only 3 per cent., and Mayo only $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Moreover, in the latter counties, those who go are exclusively the bread-winners, the strong young men, the remainder being too poor. These latter, moreover, are growing poorer, all accidental sources of income dying away, while the land becomes less and less productive of corn. Mr. Buxton therefore argues strongly for family emigration, and shows that wherever it takes place the population does not fill up, but remains thinner, and the holdings are consolidated. He thinks, moreover, that the relief required is sometimes exaggerated, and that the departure of 25,000 families will make a sensible difference.

This number of the National Review is decidedly the best which has appeared. Mr. A. J. Balfour's argument that the Tories are criticising, not obstructing, is most temperately written, and supported by figures which show that the Liberals in 1881 and in the debates on Supply in 1882 consumed more time than the Tories. That does not prove that the Tories were not obstructing, for the object of the consumption of time must be considered; but it does prove that blank denial has been abandoned for argument, which is an advance. Mr. Colquhoun, the explorer, sends a most valuable account of the great Shan race, who now occupy the whole of Indo-China, except the portions immediately touching the seaboard. They are keen traders, devoted to their independence, and have shown such vigour that the Chinese have never been able to conquer them. Mr. Colquhoun believes they will contend just as successfully against the French, though he does not draw the deduction we should, that the two peoples should be left to fight out their own battle. Mr. Mallock is as bitter as usual, and much more shallow, in his article on "The Radicalism of the Market place," which is really only an extension of the old taunt that the cause of Liberalism is envy. He says that a minority, the new middle-class which has risen within thirty years, wants to oust the old families from their position in the land, and that this is the root of Radicalism such as Mr. Chamberlain's. His object is not democracy, but middle-class sovereignty. All we can say in reply is that if so, the object is sought in a very curious way, for the new Radicals are steadily, and, as many think, rashly increasing the power of the workmen, whose love for the new aristocracy is very small. It is certainly not in the interests of Villadom that they are enfranchising the agricultural labourers, whose votes, wherever they go, will certainly not go to the kings of the counting-house. The whole argument belongs to another age than ours. There is force, to us unexpected, in Earl Percy's answer to the question, "What is a Whig?" We cannot agree with a sentence in the answer, but Lord Percy clearly has an opinion, and expresses it with a strength and a moderation which in his speeches we do not find. His charge against the modern Whigs is that they are opportunists; that, unlike the Radicals, whose "intense belief in general principles" gives them strength and energy, they attend only to what is immediately before them, and so drift in the direction settled by their more resolute allies, the Radicals. They "regard politics as a field to which tentative processes only are applicable," and therefore lose all power. There is a certain truth in the statement, but Earl Percy should not forget that in accepting movement, even if it be blindly, the Whigs check and regulate it; and that if, as he wishes, they seceded from the Liberals, the country would be split into two camps, those who possess or approve privilege, and the entire remainder. That would not be a safe situation for men of his opinions, who in fact regard with distrust any further change, as leading inevitably to Revolution, not, he is careful to say, in the sense of anarchy or disorder, but in the sense of a change in the fundamental principles of accepted political science. Mr. Moffat in his paper "On National Unity" maintains that this change has gone so far already that a struggle of principles is at hand, and that national unity is already lost, as it is among some nations of the Continent. There is no idea common to the whole people upon which general action can be based. We believe Mr. Moffat wrong in his facts, the cleavage of ideas being more shallow than he supposes, but he points to a danger which statesmen are feeling very seriously. We seem to approach a time during which parties may be, at least apparently, irreconcilable. Mr. Saintsbury, in his sketch of Quinet, is amusing and shrewd, as usual; and Mr. Austin's poem in defence of the Northern Spring deserves a less foolish title than "Lines to an Unknown Cockney." It is full both of poetry and feeling for Nature, and after a fine burst of appreciation of the South, "where fades not flower, nor falls the leaf," ends thus:—

"But none of these, nor all, can match,
At least for him who loves to watch
The wild-flowers come, hear wild birds sing,
The rapture of an English Spring.
With us it lingers more than where
It comes, it goes, half-unaware;
Makes winter short, makes summer long,
In autumn half renews its song,
Nor even then doth hence depart,
But hibernates within my heart."

Professor Goldwin Smith, in the Nineteenth Century, asks why we should send more Irish to "America," that is, Canada or the Northern States, and would prefer to send them elsewhere, to Crown Colonies, or even to the Southern States. The article is, however, in the main, a tirade against the Irish, a lecture on the expediency of putting down "the rebellion of the vote." The answer is clearly that the Irish will only go to America, that abuse of them, just or unjust, is of no more use than scolding at one's wife, and that a rebellion of the vote cannot be suppressed by mere force, any more than a rebellion of opinion. We must convert the votes, not silence them, if the country is to be governed by the Parliamentary system at all. Mr. Finlayson, in a paper on "Falling Trade and Factory Legislation," attributes the occasional defeats of English manufacturers by foreigners to over-humane legislation, which has reduced the hours of labour, and sighs for a return to the old thirteen hours per diem as the proper stint of work. He might as well ask for the eighteenth century back again, and even if he were right, would be sacrificing to success the objects of success. If the English cannot live here with fifty-four hours of toil a week, they are better elsewhere. Mr. W. Bromley Davenport repeats the well-worn arguments in favour of fox-hunting, in a good-humoured, breezy style, which it is pleasant to read. He does not argue that fox-hunting is a divine duty, but that it is a pleasing folly, good to be kept up, for the happiness it confers. He dreads a saturnalia of prigs, an apotheosis of claptrap, and fears that a day is coming when "the butcher shall lie down with the lamb, the alderman with the turtle, and the oyster shall not be eaten without anæsthetics; when nature itself shall be under the eye of the police, and detectives watch the stoat's pursuit of the rabbit and keep guard over spider's webs; when all property (and not in land alone, my advanced friend!) save that of Hardware magnates, who have made a monopoly and called it peace, shall be confiscated as an 'unearned increment' to the State," and when many other woes shall be on the land. It is all nonsense, but Mr. Davenport writes nonsense with a vigorous heartiness that Radicals should appreciate. Mr. Howell sends an instructive paper on "The Dwellings of the Poor" and the operations of the Peabody Trust, and evidently agrees with Lord Salisbury that the State ought to extend the system by lending money for the construction of more Peabody houses at low rates of interest. He should promote the Government plan of creating a corporation for London strong enough to grapple with the evil. Mr. George W. E. Russell, in spite of his hereditary position, is nearly as sharp upon the Whigs as Earl Percy, declaring that it is impossible to become a Whig, that the men of the party are born so, and that "Whiggery will have no place in the Liberalism of the future, because it distrusts the people." Is not that a little like Frederick the Great's "You ought to love me, sirrah"? Demos, as we hold, is rightful monarch, but a little gentle distrust of any monarch is a security for liberty. We are unable to forget that if one people elects Lincoln, and another Grévy, a third, with hurrahing and delight, sends up Parnell. Prince Kraptokine continues his argument with Mr. Lansdell about Russian prisons, and gives at least one frightful and authenticated story of the confinement of a prisoner for fifteen years in a dark and damp cell. This was M. Pushkin, who was only released in 1881, having been confined for that long period in solitude because he expected a new Messiah to descend. There are two agricultural papers, in one of which Mr. J. Howard shows that the Tories are not the farmer's friends; while in another, Mr. W. E. Bear criticises the Agricultural Holdings Bill, first, because of the agreement clauses, which, he thinks, make the Bill permissive; secondly, because it does not protect the sitting tenant; and thirdly, because it retains the right of distress, even for one year. It is satisfactory to find that so steady an advocate of tenant-right as Mr. Bear has discovered no new defects in the Bill. Mr. Blanchard Jerrold's paper on "The Manufacture of Public Opinion" has the merit of originality. He maintains that the great debating clubs, of which a hundred have been opened all over England, and which imitate the procedure of the House of Commons, form a great educational agency, in which the subject of education is politics. The amateur members take to their work earnestly, and their rules of procedure are clearer and more definite than those of the House of Commons. They usually limit speeches to ten minutes, and insist on a division on the fourth night, at the latest. Mr. Jerrold, we think, exaggerates their influence; but such as it is, it is undoubtedly beneficial.

By far the most readable article in the heavier magazines of June is Mr. Traill's, in the Contemporary, headed, "Wanted, an Elisha." Mr. Traill answers Lord Randolph Churchill, and boldly intimates his doubts whether Lord Beaconsfield ever was an Elijah, whether he had any mantle, that is, any policy, to leave; and whether, if he was Elijah, and did leave a mantle, and Lord Salisbury has received it, anything will come of those facts. Mr. Traill's theory is that defeats in Parliament are of little moment to the Government, for the householders scarcely notice them; that the sway of opinion in the electorate is absolutely beyond the ken of the most experienced, and that in all human probability the voters will insist on a change when they want repose, and not before. He adds that Lord Beaconsfield's idea, if he had one, was to conciliate the masses by improving their condition, that although he brought out this notion in 1871, he never acted on it, and that the probability is it was one of his many dreams. Even if it was not, the policy is not a working one, for though there may be Democracy in it, there is no "Toryness." There is nothing in the conception on which the Liberals could not outbid their rivals. The article is the more striking because the rest of the number is a little heavy. We doubt if M. Émile de Laveleye's proposal to neutralise the Congo by placing the control of the river in the hands of an International Commission is not a little premature, and England certainly will not as yet declare all stations on the Congo founded by the International African Association neutral. Nobody could protect their neutrality but herself, and she has more African work already on hand than she can well manage. The article contains, however, a lucid account of recent explorations. Miss Cobbe writes a fine protest against that doctrine of hereditary conscience, as distinguished from intuitive conscience, which she says is necessary to the Agnostic system, and must ultimately kill morality, leaving only a kind of rule of the road. She maintains that with agnosticism triumphant, there would be no Father, and, therefore, no obligation of benevolence, and no personal duty owing to man himself by himself. There would be nothing but duty to the community, which would perish under the sense that its fulfilment or neglect would in a short time not matter. Yes, and would not duty to the community produce, instead of pity, mercilessness? If that duty is to be the sole law, the killing-out of the unmanageable would seem to be the most effective method of improvement. Suppose we hang the whole criminal class, all hereditary paupers, and all incurable idiots and lunatics, would not the race have a much better chance? And if it would, which is undeniable, where, if there is no God, no future state, and no duty except to the community, is the objection? Sir Arthur Hobhouse argues with great wealth of illustration and evidence that the Ilbert Bill is a necessary consequence of all recent Indian legislation, and is essential to our policy of doing equal justice to all subjects. If it is so, cadit questio; but the opponents of the Bill argue that the white man is as much entitled to justice as the dark man, and that he does not get it when he is made amenable to a Judge who, from radical differences of creed, civilisation, and upbringing, is unable to understand him. Mr. Gordon Cumming, in defending cremation, gives some curiously disgusting details of American funerals. The practice of making the dead look alive has there developed an art, and the embalmed and painted corpse is exhibited to friends in a "casket" with a glass top, and lined with different-coloured velvets:—"A gentleman returning from the Philadelphia Exhibition told me that he had heard two ladies discussing the exhibits, and they agreed that the Funeral Department was quite the most interesting. Said the first, 'Oh! that lovely casket of delicate blue velvet lined with pale-rose satin so beautifully quilted!' 'Well,' said the other, 'for my part, I preferred the black velvet with crimson-velvet lining. You know, crimson is so becoming to a corpse!'" Mr. Sheldon Amos defends the new Egyptian Constitution with needless vehemence. Already the world has decided that nothing is wanting to it, except the public spirit which must be its motive-power.

The Cornhill announces that from next month its price is to be sixpence, and it is to be "readable from cover to cover." That is an excellent promise, but then, readable to whom? Apparently, to those who love short stories; but there may be better matter behind. Macmillan is already under its new management, and its editor contributes a thoroughly workman-like account of the politics of the month, full of interest and suggestion. We cannot agree with it all, especially with the prophecy that we shall annex Zululand; but in every page there is something to arrest attention, e.g., the remarks on the universality of "block" in the legislatures of the world. The sketch of Mr. W. R. Greg is delicate, as well as appreciative, though the praise given him for humility covers too large a surface of his mind. Like most strong men, Mr. Greg believed in himself on points with decision. The paper styled "French Souvenirs," really a study of M. du Camp and some of his friends, by "M. A. W.," is a fine example of delicate, white-light criticism, by a mind almost pitilessly impartial. This is new to us. We had fancied that in France the littérateur was well paid:—

"Another is the impression of the material difficulties which surround the French literary man. As we all know, pure literature is nowhere a very lucrative profession. But certainly it would seem that in France the intelligent reading public is more limited, and the rewards of the critic or the poet more scanty than amongst ourselves. Alfred de Musset would gladly have sold the copyright of all his poems, towards the end of his life, for a life-income of £100 a year. Théophile Gautier earned a bare pittance out of his dramatic feuilleton for the Presse, and found existence a hard struggle to the end. Flaubert, after his generosity to his family had ruined him, thankfully accepted a post of about £100 a year at the Mazarin Library, well knowing that he could not count upon his pen to support him. Charles Barbara was all but killed by the intensity of the writer's struggle to live; and so on. In England, the reading public is more widely diffused; in France, for literary, as for political purposes, Paris is the country."

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Art and Letters gives its readers an ample supply of illustrations. There are twenty in all, of which the most attractive are the two views of Mont St. Michel. The pieces of detail are not so good. Wood engraving of the orthodox kind does not find it easy to hold its ground against etching, on the one hand, and the wonderful effects produced by American artists on the other. The frontispiece of the present number, "The Poultry Market, Paris," for all its merit as a drawing, strikes one as being a little hard. The chief articles, besides the description of the Abbey of Mont St. Michel and its surroundings, are "Pottery and Porcelain" and "Modern French Sculpture." Literature is represented by Mrs. Comyns Carr's tale of "Fortunina," which is brought in this number to a conclusion.—It is almost needless to say that St. Nicholas is very good. The adventures of a crew of three on a cabin that was carried off by a Mississippi flood and "Recollections of a Drummer-boy" are full of interest. So, in another way, is the account of the "Fresh-air Fund," an admirable New York charity, which last year gave a fortnight's holiday in the country to between five and six thousand poor children. We wish that something of the kind could be done in London. Possibly there is, and yet we, so vastly overgrown is this city, know nothing about it. The story of these little creatures' ignorance of country things, and delight in country ways, is touching in the extreme. One is glad to have the relief of a little mischief, as when some youngsters paint the deacon's young pigs, while the good man is at church. The illustrations of St. Nicholas are plentiful and excellent, and there is a great store of puzzles and enigmas of all kinds.—Aunt Judy's Magazine begins with a pretty fairy-story, "Midsummer's Eve in an Old Oak;" the two tales are carried on another stage, and the useful has its due share. There is an article on "Signals," beginning with Agamemnon's message of fire from Troy to Argos; and ending with an Australian invention, for which a name has yet to be invented, by which electricity projects to a distance the images of objects. It might be called "telephany." Another describes "Summer Flowers."

The Portfolio. The gem of this number is the etching, by M. Menpes, of a "Breton Beggar," an admirable figure. The editor carries on his description of Paris, but the formal and monotonous outlines of the Louvre do not lend themselves very readily to graceful illustration. There is a very interesting account of a Greek vase found in Kertch (the ancient Panticapæum), the design on which Mr. W. Watkiss Lloyd interprets to be the warning of Themis to Zeus against his marriage with Thetis.

About Yorkshire. By Thomas and Katharine Macquoid. With sixty-seven illustrations. (Chatto and Windus.)—A partnership of a pleasant kind has been undertaken by Mr. and Mrs. Macquoid. Already they have travelled together in the Ardennes, through Normandy, and through Brittany, and in each instance an attractive-looking volume has been the fruit of the tour. Mrs. Macquoid pictures what she sees with the pen and her husband with the pencil, and the workmanship both of author and artist is excellent of its kind. About Yorkshire will do admirable service, if it induces many readers, as it may well do, to visit a county so full of historic interest and of natural beauty. Emerson said that to see England properly would take a hundred years, and if so, several years out of the hundred should be devoted to Yorkshire, which, for things of fame, if not for things of beauty, ranks even above Devonshire. The pretty volume before us makes no pretence of describing the county, and in what it does describe is of necessity superficial. Mrs. Macquoid has a bright, cheerful style, and carries her readers over the ground without any feeling of exhaustion. She can tell a story well, and her descriptions of scenery are appreciative and judiciously brief. Indeed, from the literary stand-point there is no fault to be found with About Yorkshire, if it be regarded as an agreeable drawing-room book. To work of a higher character, the writer probably does not aspire; but her achievement is no idle labour. Kindly feeling, a hearty sense of enjoyment, an unaffected style, a love of what is beautiful, an interest in the associations of literature and history,—these are no mean virtues in a traveller, and they are conspicuous in the volume. The illustrations are admirable. They recall familiar spots at once, and feed the memory, if they do not satisfy it. This, indeed, would be impossible. Who, for instance, that has lingered with a lover's incapacity of saying farewell by the ruins of Bolton and Rievaulx, which have so much more than their own beauty to commend them, or has spent summer days amidst the scenery of Scott's "Bokeby," can be contented with the restricted scope of a colourless illustration? The artist has done his best, however, and deserve our thanks.

P. Ovidii Nasonis Ibis. Edited R. Ellis. (The Clarendon Press.) This volume reminds us of the days when scholars were learned men. We have scholars now more than it would be easy to number, men versed in the difficulties of moods, particles, and the like, but our learned scholars we might almost count on the fingers of one hand. School-books, admirably done for the most part, and forming a most satisfactory contrast to the almost worthless books with which our fathers, and even the middle-aged among ourselves, had to be content, come forth in multitudes. But they are confined within a narrow round, and editions of books that may be called extra-academical are very rare. We welcome, therefore, all the more this work of Mr. Ellis. There is no particular value in the Ibis, though it is an ingenious composition, but it is optimi exempli that a great scholar should busy himself with work that lies outside the narrow circle of academical requirements. The Ibis seems to have been a translation or an adaptation of a poem written by Callimachus against Apollonius Rhodius. Against whom Ovid directed it is not certain, nor is it certain how great were his obligations to his original, as of that original not a fragment remains. Its chief claim on the reader's attention is its relation to the poems of exile,—a part of Ovid's surviving work which has scarcely received the attention which it deserves. A good edition of the "Tristia" and the "Epistolæ ex Ponto" is a desideratum. There has, indeed, been no edition, good or bad, for many years in this country. Mr. Robinson Ellis gives us "Prolegomena," in which he discusses the origin of the poem and its critical history; a text abundantly illustrated with various readings, "Scholia in Ibin" reaching to more than sixty pages, and a "Commentarius" amounting to eighty-eight more. Altogether, we have here a model of completeness and careful labour.

Transplanted. By M. E. Fraser-Tytler. (Bentley and Son.)—

"Ein Jüngling liebt ein Mädchen, Die hat einen andern erwählt;
Der andre liebt eine andre,
Und——"

The above quotation from Heine, which stands on the title-page, supplies a better clue to the contents of this book than does its name; and the reader must be prepared to follow young people whose affections have a tendency rather to pursue each other in a circle, than to come to a satisfactory meeting-point. This naturally gives a sort of half-plaintive tone to much of the work, something like that of a piece of music wherein the minor key predominates. One peculiarity about the story lies in the difficulty of determining precisely who is meant to be the hero, as there are two brothers whose claim to that honour is so evenly balanced as to make it hard to tell which of them had the preference in the mind of the author. The tale is not an exciting one; but it is told smoothly and gracefully, and will beguile a spare hour pleasantly enough. The characters would have been all the better for additional force of colouring.

The Chronicle of James I., King of Aragon (written by himself). Translated from the Catalan by the late John Forster, Esq., M.P. for Berwick, with Historical Introduction, &c., by Pascual de Gayangos. 2 vols. (Chapman and Hall.)—These bulky volumes present us with a translation of the "Comentari dels Feyts Esdevenguts en la Vida del molt alt Senyor," James I., of Aragon, whose long reign (1218-1276) forms one of the most interesting and important epochs of Spanish mediæval history. The most remarkable events of which these Commentaries give a detailed record are the conquest of the Balearic Isles, which was completed in 1232; the expulsion of the Moors from Valencia, accomplished towards the middle of the thirteenth century; and the abortive crusade, undertaken at the instance of the Khan of Tartary, in 1265. The King had not been long at sea when a storm arose, and so battered his fleet that he came to the conclusion that God "thought it was not for our good nor for that of Christianity" that they should not return home. Towards the close of the second volume, a curious account will be found of the King's interviews with Pope Gregory X. at Lyons, where a Council had assembled, in 1274. The Pope could not sufficiently praise his visitor for the readiness he had shown in organising an expedition for the conquest of the Holy Sepulchre. James thought the opportunity a good one for getting crowned by the Pope, but Gregory made a slight difficulty. He wanted the Aragonese monarch to confirm a tribute granted by the latter's father to the Holy See—"which was of two hundred and fifty masmodines jusefiche" (golden masmodis, struck by the Yusuf dynasty, according to a foot-note), together with payment of arrears; but James replied that he had come as a guest, not as a tributary, and that he would rather return home without the crown than with it at such a price. A preface, together with numerous explanatory foot-notes and several appendices on the Moorish annals of Spain, by Don Pascual de Gayangos, greatly enhance the value and interest of these volumes, and the simplicity and quaintness of the narrative are additional attractions to the student of old-world annals and manners.

Q. Horati Opera. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—A very elegant little volume, printed in beautiful type, on dead-white paper. But why the gilt top? Surely the rough edges are better, especially when the process of gilding seems to leave a disfiguring brown mark, for which we cannot account otherwise. So very pretty a book ought to have no drawback. The text has been carefully edited by Mr. F. W. Cornish.

The Galilean Gospel. By Alexander Balmain Bruce, D.D. (Macniven and Wallace.)—We heartily commend to our readers this little volume, as giving an outline, ably drawn, of the teaching of Christ, as it is found in the Gospels. The "Beatitudes," "The Sympathy of Christ," "The Vicarious Virtue of Faith," "Christ the Great Innovator," are among the subjects discussed. We cannot do better than quote, as a sentence representative of Professor Bruce's teaching, the following:—"These miracles may be regarded in three lights, in all of which they are full of permanent significance: as a revelation of Christ, as a prophecy of better days, and as an inspiration to all who honour the name and cherish the spirit of Jesus."

Bishop Ewing. By James Cameron Lees, D.D. (Macniven and Wallace.)—Dr. Lees has given us, in this little tract, one of the series of "St. Giles' Lectures—Scottish Divines," an admirable picture of the Bishop—the finest mind that the Scotch Episcopal Church has had since Leighton. Dr. Ewing's influence was perhaps more felt outside his own communion than within it. Such men as Dr. Lees himself in the Established Church, and Dr. Forbes Robertson in the Free Church, would acknowledge him as one of their teachers. Here, in England, he is remembered with affection and gratitude by many who recognised in him the characteristics of the true prophet, the bold speaker-forth of hidden things into which it was given him to have an insight.

Sir William Hamilton, the Man and his Philosophy. By Professor Veitch. (Blackwood and Sons.)—Professor Veitch had two hours to talk of his subject; and it would have been difficult, perhaps impossible, to compress more within the narrow limits of space thus imposed. The reader who wishes to learn something about this great thinker and his work cannot do better than possess himself of this little volume. And if he goes on to make himself acquainted with the longer account which the author has given of his subject, in the series of "Blackwood's Philosophical Classics," he will certainly not repent it.

The Poems of T. B. Aldrich. (Houghton, Mifflin, and Co., Boston, U.S.)—We have seen the chief, if not all, of these poems before. "Judith" certainly, in which the writer has worked out the fancy, not very happily conceived, of making Judith in love with her victim, Holofernes, "Spring in New England," perhaps the gem of the collection, "Friar Jerome's Beautiful Book," and "The Legend of Ara Caeli," revive, as we read them, an impression generally favourable of Mr. Aldrich's poetical powers. He always works as one who knows his craft; there is no slovenliness about his execution. Perhaps there is commonly a want of fire, except when, now and then, some real feeling seems to stir him. It only remains to say that the volume is of a handsome appearance. We do not wholly believe in these loose-parchment covers, which it is the prevailing fashion to use for binding. The illustrations, the work of the "Paint and Clay Club," are of various merit in design, but in point of engraving almost invariably good.

SCHOOL BOOKS.—The First Greek Book. By Thomas Kerchever Arnold, M.A. Edited by Francis David Morrie, M.A. (Rivingtons.)—We are glad to see these very useful school-books of Mr. T. K. Arnold's adapted to the newer methods of teaching. Excellent as they were, they wanted, above all things, simplification; and this they have received, at the hands of the skilful editors to whom they have been entrusted. One considerable change now introduced into the book before us is the postponement of all discussion of the dual to the end. Prima facie, it commends itself to us, as tending to diminish the very great difficulties which Greek accidence presents to the beginner. Generally, the considerable remodelling which the manual has received seems to have been judicious. But what does Mr. Morrie mean, when he says that "'ai' is sounded as ai in 'aisle'?" Surely the sound is much more full.—Mr. T. T. McLagan's Latin Course: Second Year (W. and R. Chambers), strikes us as scarcely giving the good Latinity which we should expect. The writer of a school-book may often find it convenient to construct his own sentences, but he must be very careful about the construction. Is there any authority for "Babylone discessit [died] Alexander Magnus," or for the accusative in "unum diem pontem in flumine Arare Cæsar fecit, idem Helvetii viginti dies confecerunt?" In Ex. xxi., 2, Mr. McLagan quotes Cæsar's own words, "Diebus viginti confecerant."—We have before us two excellent specimens of "Bell's Reading Books,"—Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare, and Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield, edited by H. Courthope Bowen, M.A. (Bell and Sons.)—The originals have been abridged, but abridged, it would seem, with judgment, by the editor.—Mr. C. L. Dodgson publishes a second edition of his Euclid, I., II. (Macmillan.)—Mr. Dodgson does not think with those who would supersede Euclid altogether, but he regards the "Elements" as being capable of improvement. The changes are not great, but they are of some importance, and all tend towards simplicity. There is a very neat alternative proof of ii., 8, reducing the length by about nine parts out of ten. In this edition, words have been introduced, in the place of algebraical symbols.—Shakespeare's King Richard III., with Notes, Examination Papers, and Plan of Preparation. (W. and R. Chambers.)—The "Plan of Study" is much to be commended.

NEW EDITIONS.—We are glad to see that a third edition has been called for of Professor Bruce's valuable work the Training of the Twelve. (T. and T. Clark.) Professor Bruce is one of the thinkers, happily becoming more common among theologians, who know how to learn and to move, and it is satisfactory to perceive that his contributions to theology are properly appreciated.—The new edition of Studies in Church History, by Henry C. Lea (Henry C. Lea's Son and Co., Philadelphia), has been supplemented by an interesting essay on "The Early Church and Slavery." Mr. Lea has studied the authorities, both classical and ecclesiastical, with care; but why does he speak of the Younger Pliny "having amused himself" with torturing two female slaves suspected of Christianity? The truth is, that the account which those who had abjured gave him of Christian practices seemed to contain nothing that could account for the popular feeling against them. He could not but believe that something more remained behind: "Wherefore," he continues, "I thought it the more necessary to find out, even by torture from two female slaves, who were called ministers, what was the truth." Pliny was a humane man, and his fault was that he believed, as men long continued to believe, that truth could be drawn out by torture.

—We have also received a handsome, illustrated edition of Sacred Allegories, by the Rev. William Adams, M.A. (Rivingtons.)—These Allegories, if we put out of account Bunyan's great work, are as beautiful as anything of the kind in our language. "The Old Man's Home," in particular, is a masterpiece of vivid writing, so vivid, indeed, that, not a little to the author's distress, it was commonly taken as the account of an actual person. A short memoir is prefixed. The illustrations are of varying merit, the landscapes good, the figures not so pleasing.—The Invasion of the Crimea. By A. W. Kinglake. Vol. VII. (Blackwood and Sons.)

MAGAZINES, ETC.—We have received the following for June:—Part 1 of a reissue of the serial edition of the Doré Dante, embracing the "Inferno," "Purgatorio," and "Paradiso," illustrated with the well known full-page illustrations by Gustave Doré. (Cassell and Co.)—The Magazine of Art, the article on "The Slade Girls" in which will be interesting to those engaged or concerned in the work-for-women question.—Part 33 of Picturesque Palestine.—L'Art, the illustrations in which are above the average.—Part 8 of Greater London.—Part 1 of The Fisheries of the World, being an illustrated and descriptive record of the International Fisheries Exhibition.—The Antiquarian Magazine, which is now published by D. Bogue, St. Martin's Place.—Decoration, completing Vol. V. of the new series.—No. 2 of the Social Zoo, entitled "Nice Girls."—Science Gossip.—The Gentleman's Magazine, containing a paper by Karl Blind on "The 'Holy Grail' a Coral Stone."—Time, completing Vol. VIII.—Belgravia, in which the story by Mr. Wilkie Collins is concluded, and a new one commenced by Mr. C. Gibbon.—The Theatre, completing Vol. I. of the new series.—To-day.—London Society.—The Oxford Magazine.—The Nautical Magazine.—The Army and Navy Magazine.—Colburn's United Service Magazine.—Health.—The Folk-lore Journal.—The Catholic Presbyterian.—The Month, containing the first instalment of an account of a personal visit to Ireland, by the editor.—Good Words.—Cassell's Magazine, containing an interesting paper on "Alligator Farming," by C. F. Gordon Cumming. The extra holiday number of this magazine also contains a well selected collection of stories, &c., by well-known writers, the illustrations to which are good.—All the Year Round, in which a series of "Chronicles of English Counties" is commenced; also a new serial story by Mrs. Pender-Cadlip.—Chambers's Journal.—Letts's Household Magazine.—The Sunday at Home.—The Sunday Magazine.—The Leisure Hour.—The Ladies' Gazette of Fashion.—The Ladies' Treasury.—The Continent.—The Atlantic Monthly.—Harper's Monthly, the opening illustrated article in which is devoted to "Lambeth Palace." The woodcut illustrations to the paper on "The Home of Hiawatha" are of a very high class.

We have received from the Fine Art Society a portrait of Dr. John Brown, etched by Mr. C. O. Murray.

SPECTACLES V. BLINDNESS.

"Spectacles can only be perfectly adjusted by those having a thorough knowledge of the anatomy of the eye, combined with optical experience."

WE have the highest Medical Authorities, confirmed by daily experience, that imperfect glasses, together with the haphazard plan of selection generally employed by the mere vendor, is the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Sir JULIUS BENEDIOT writes:—"I have tried the principal Opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have adapted suit admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." The Rev. Professor W. A. Hale, M.A. Cantab., 2 Minford Gardens, West Kensington Park, writes:—"The Spectacles are perfect, and a most decided boon. I had occasion on Monday to write to Lord —, and took the opportunity to mention your name, and the wonderful power of your Spectacles." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age (82). I can now read the smallest type, although suffering from cataract on the right eye." Testimonials from Earl and Countess Lindsay; F. D. Dixon Hartland, Esq., M.P.; the Venerable Archdeacon Palmer, Clifton; Rev. Mother Abbess, St. Mary's Abbey, Mill Hill, Hendon; O. J. Alford, Esq., Gas Light and Coke Company, Horseferry Road, Westminster, &c. Mr. HENRY LAURANCE, F.S.S., Oculist Optician, 39 OLD BOND STREET, W. (late 3 Endsleigh Gardens, Euston Square), PERSONALLY adapts his Improved Spectacles daily (Saturdays excepted), from ten to five. Special arrangements are made for invalids and others unable to wait on Mr. Laurance. Pamphlets—"Spectacles, their Use and Abuse," post free. City Branch—6 POULTRY, CHEAPSIDE.

DAVOS.—Mr. J. W. LORD, M.A., late Fellow of Trin. Coll. Camb. (Senior Wrangler, 1875), wishes to meet with Three or Four Pupils to form a Mathematical Reading Party for the months of July and August.—Address, Davos, Dörfli, Switzerland.

ALDENHAM GRAMMAR SCHOOL, ELSTREE, HERTS.—FOUR JUNIOR PLATT SCHOLARSHIPS of the average value of £20, tenable for three years, will be offered for COMPETITION on July 19th and 20th. Open to boys under 14.—For further information, apply to the HEAD MASTER.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

PARLIAMENT has been the scene of a scandalous discussion this week. Suleiman Sami, the Egyptian officer believed by her Majesty's agents in Egypt to be immediately responsible for the burning of Alexandria, was tried, by order of the Khedive, before a court-martial and condemned to death. Lord R. Churchill, humbly followed by Sir S. Northcote, demanded on Friday week that the British Government should interfere, alleging the sentence to be unjust, and Suleiman a mere scapegoat for the Khedive. Mr. Gladstone, while utterly repudiating these statements, agreed to ask once more if the British agents thought the sentence just. They reported in the affirmative, and the man was executed on Saturday. Lord Randolph thereupon on Monday attacked Mr. Gladstone as guilty of a judicial murder, and reaffirmed that the Khedive had been the author of the burnings and massacres. He offered no proof whatever of his charges, which Lord Dufferin pronounces absolutely absurd; but nevertheless, he was supported by men like Sir S. Northcote, Sir R. Cross, and the Tories generally. We have said enough of the affair elsewhere, but must add here that the discussion was most discreditable to the House of Commons. If our representatives in Egypt are to be publicly discredited, and the Khedive accused of murder, in order to secure a party triumph, our position in Egypt will become untenable.

As regards the actual guilt of Suleiman Sami, the evidence would appear to be conclusive. He himself admits it, to begin with, and only pleads that he acted under Arabi's orders. He was, moreover, seen ordering the burnings by scores of witnesses. The Khedive, too, affirms that the Commission which examined the charges was not ill-affected to the rebels, and its members unanimously found Suleiman guilty, while the court-martial, which was equally unanimous, contained Major Morris, an Englishman, and Federigo Bey, an Austro-Italian, while Major Macdonald watched the proceedings. That the burning was not a "military measure" was, moreover, proved by the fact that the spot where the English would land was the spot which was not burned. In truth, the only plea worth a moment's attention was that Suleiman was acting under Arabi's orders, and that, even if true—as all Arabi's friends deny—is worthless. Suppose that the dynamiteurs plead that they all acted under the orders of O'Donovan Rossa, and that the Irish of New York are at war with the British Government.

The trial of the six Americans charged with the conspiracy to blow up London buildings with dynamite ended on Thursday in a verdict of acquittal in favour of two of them, and of guilty against four. They were all indicted under the Treason-Felony Act of 1848, and were tried before three Judges, of whom the Lord Chief Justice was one; and the four were, if the evidence could be trusted, guilty past dispute. Lord Coleridge, therefore, as mouthpiece of the Court, after pointing out that the accused had absolutely no wrongs to avenge, being "citizens of a great country in amity with the Queen," sentenced them to penal servitude for life. The sentence is terrible, but so was the offence, which was nothing less than a conspiracy to murder innocent persons, out of enmity to this country. It is notable that one of the prisoners avowed that he knew nothing of the history of Ireland.

The Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill passed its second reading in the House of Lords, on Monday, by a majority of seven (165 for it and 158 against it), the division showing a much larger number on both sides than have ever been mustered on this Bill before; the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Connaught, and the Duke of Albany voting for the Bill, while the two Archbishops and twenty Bishops voted against it. Not a single Bishop gave his vote in its favour. The discussion was not a very great one. Lord Dalhousie, who moved the second reading, treated the matter as one virtually settled, so far as argument went, and did not take much pains to review the case. Lord Cairns, who moved the rejection of the Bill, did so partly on the ground that you must go a great deal further than to legalise this particular kind of marriage, if there is to be any sort of principle in the measure, and partly on the ground that the countries in which this kind of marriage is legal are looser altogether in their view of the state of marriage than the United Kingdom, and much less happy in consequence. Lord Bramwell made a vigorous, but rather too jocose speech in favour of the Bill, while Lord Carrington showed that there is a very real demand for it among the working-classes. Lord Coleridge replied to Lord Bramwell, maintaining that no Bill which does not put the whole relations of consanguinity and affinity on some footing of distinct principle is even worthy of consideration; while the Archbishop of Canterbury insisted on the supposed Scriptural prohibition, and argued that the dispensations for such marriages so early given by Rome prove that the Church had disapproved such marriages from the beginning,—which is true; but then, these dispensations also prove that the Church's disapprobation was never of an insurmountable kind. It was disfavour, rather than moral condemnation; and the disfavour might, by sufficient make-weights, be changed into positive sanction.

On Monday Mr. Bright was received in Birmingham, for the week of rejoicing over the twenty-fifth anniversary of his connection with Birmingham, and the fortieth of his entrance on public life, with demonstrations of public affection such as few Englishmen indeed can boast of. The Times says that near a million of persons were stationed along the five-mile course of the procession, and that the continuous roar of their welcome produced an impression of the meaning of popular feeling for which it would not be very easy to find a parallel. Nearly fifty thousand people joined in the procession following Mr. Bright and afterwards passing before him, and amongst the most effective of the symbols displayed were the Birmingham bakers' loaves and the enormous loaf, nearly six feet high and broad in proportion, which the agricultural labourers, headed by Mr. Joseph Arch, carried before him. On each side of the way were densely packed, six and more deep, for the whole five miles, Birmingham artisans and their wives, who cheered Mr. Bright vehemently as he passed. Mr. Bright himself, no doubt, was rather overpowered both by the prospect and by the spectacle of all this homage. But the remarkable thing is that the hundreds of thousands who lined his way far more thoroughly enjoyed rendering the homage than he could have enjoyed receiving it. Birmingham and its neighbourhood felt all the happier for showing their hearty allegiance to the eloquent orator who had so often pleaded passionately for their rights, and denounced the artificial restraints placed upon both their energies and their aspirations.

On Wednesday, Mr. Bright was presented by the Liberals of Birmingham, in Bingley Hall, with a silver dessert service and with the picture painted of him by Mr. Holl, no fewer than twenty thousand people being, it is said, packed into the hall on the occasion. In reply, Mr. Bright, quoting from Young's "Night Thoughts," dwelt upon the wisdom of reviewing the past, and bantered his opponents for the reluctance they very naturally feel to dwell upon that past. The Conservative party insist much on the study of ancient history, but when the history of the last fifty years is referred to, they push it aside with contempt, on the ground that it is "only ancient history," as if that ought not to be, for them, its highest recommendation. Mr. Bright then went on to a powerful contrast between the sufferings of the people before the repeal of the Corn Laws, and their comparative comfort during the last seven years of bad harvests and depressed trade. Mr. Bright anticipated a speedy triumph of the principles of Free-trade in the United States, and thought that the consequence of that triumph would be an example on the part of the great English-speaking communities that would first convince the world, and then pacify it,—a sanguine view of the omnipotence of interest over passion in which we have never been able to follow Mr. Bright's anticipations. "Neither Emperors, nor Kings, nor statesmen, nor the public Press," says Mr. Bright, "will be able to bring nations into war, when these nations are united in their interest by perfect freedom of industry between them." Are the prosperous nations, then, free from passions, both noble and ignoble, which threaten that prosperity? All history replies in the negative. Were not the interests of the Northern and the Southern States most closely intertwined before 1861? And yet neither did that bond of interest strangle slavery, nor did it prevent a most bloody and lasting war. Mr. Bright's hopes for once master his imaginative power.

Mr. Chamberlain, at the same meeting, made an outspoken speech, in which he denied that, under the present distribution of power, the people were represented at all. He believed that the people were more Radical than the House, though not more Radical than the Government. He inveighed against the system under which Warwick had two-thirds of the weight of Birmingham, and one-fifth of the registered electors returned one-half of the House of Commons. All this was excellently put, as was also a most eloquent argument for the enfranchisement of the labourer, who, Mr. Chamberlain maintained, had managed the agricultural strikes with both moderation and temper; but Mr. Chamberlain was not wise all through. He has no right whatever to say that a plébiscite would disestablish the Church, a point upon which the keenest observers admit themselves at fault; and he should not allude to universal suffrage as he does. He has a right to his opinion, if he is in favour of that awful change; but it is not for Ministers of the Crown to excite hopes so indefinitely distant, and throw on the table propositions which, if they were seriously made, would cleave all parties into fragments.

Lord Granville presided at the banquet of Thursday in the Birmingham Town Hall, and proposed Mr. Bright's health. He mentioned that he had suggested to Lord Aberdeen, when forming the Cabinet of 1853,—the Cabinet of all the Talents,—that the Government would be all the stronger for including Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, and that Lord Aberdeen had personally agreed with him, though he did not think it possible to get over the difficulties which others would have made. Lord Granville remarked on Mr. Bright's success in making changes possible which had been thought previously impossible, illustrating what he said by the late Sir George Grey's remark that the Irish Protestant Establishment was "absolutely indefensible in itself, and also impossible to remove." He remarked on the fidelity of Birmingham to Mr. Bright, and on Mr. Bright's love for Birmingham, though that was certainly not the love described in King Lear, which makes "breath poor and speech unable," as Mr. Bright remained "one of the greatest orators ever found on an English platform, or perfected in an English Parliament."

Mr. Bright in reply described, as he had been asked to describe, how his political convictions had grown up. The forcible levying of Church-rates from members of other Churches was the first occasion which had turned his thoughts into active political agitation, and his first public address was delivered from a tombstone to an anti-Church-rate assembly. Then, when he came to pay the small wages which alone he could afford to handloom-weavers, whose work, had the American market been open to them, would have exchanged far more food than the English farmer could afford to give for it, he could not help having his mind forced by pity into the advocacy of Free-trade. Afterwards his mind turned towards reform, of which, however, he maintained that he had always been one of the most moderate advocates, in the sense that he was always eager to accept substantial concessions, even though not up to what he thought the highest mark of justice.

But the most remarkable passage of his speech was that in which, after remarking on his long-trying devotion to the principle of securing the Irish peasants in the possession of their own farms, and making them proprietors where it was possible, he diverged into an eloquent rebuke to the Conservative Obstructives of the hour:—"And, what is worse at this moment, as you see—you do not so much see it here as it is seen in the House—they are found in alliance with an Irish rebel party (loud and long-continued cheers), the main portion of whose funds, for the purposes of agitation, come directly from the avowed enemies of England, and whose oath of allegiance is broken by association with its enemies. Now, these are the men of whom I spoke, who are disregarding the wishes of the majority of the constituencies, and who, as far as possible, make it impossible to do any work for the country by debates and divisions in the House of Commons. I hope that the constituencies will mark some of the men of this party, and that they will not permit Parliament to be dishonoured and Government enfeebled by Members who claim to be, but are not, Conservative and constitutional. Our freedom is no longer subverted or threatened by the Crown, or by a privileged aristocracy. Is the time come—I quote the words from history—is the time come to which the ancestor of Lord Salisbury referred 300 years ago, when he said that 'England could only be ruined by Parliament'? The great constituencies must look to this. The ballot has given all electors freedom. On them the country must rely for the preservation of the honour and the free working of the House of Commons. The reform must come, and cannot long be delayed. It must wrest the power and close the era of the men who now afflict the House, who from night to night insult the majesty of the British people." That is a passage which is likely, we hope, to find an echo in every constituency in Great Britain.

Prince Bismarck has gained two important victories this week. On Monday, Herr Bennigsen, the leader of the National Liberals, announced to his followers that he resigned his post, and with it his seat in Parliament. He retires for a time from political life. His avowed reason is dislike to vote with his party against the repeal of the May Laws; but he is also, it is known, disheartened at the position of affairs in Parliament. There is nothing, he believes, to be done. His resignation, following that of Herr Lasker, has disorganised the Liberals, and Prince Bismarck, supported by the Conservatives and Ultramontanes, has it all his own way. On Tuesday, therefore, the Reichsrath passed the measure on which the Chancellor has most set his heart—the prophetic Budget for 1884-85—and was instantly and quite unexpectedly prorogued, all the social Bills mentioned in the Emperor's speech being thus lost. The Chancellor had gained his end, and did not want Parliament any more. It is believed that next Session, the "Socialist" Bills granting aid in sickness, and so on, will again be proposed, and will be carried, and that the Reichsrath will then be dissolved, the Chancellor believing that with the Liberals so out of heart, and the lowest class conciliated, he will obtain a majority at the polls. His calculation, if the Catholics adhere to him, is probably correct.

A deputation of Armenians waited on Lord Dufferin on Wednesday to congratulate him on his efforts on their behalf, and to express their hope that the Ottoman Government would at last see its own true interest. Lord Dufferin, in reply, told the deputation that he had assured the Sultan of the loyalty of Armenians, and had pressed on him the necessity of sending a Commissioner to govern the province who would remove all corrupt officials, and wherever the Armenians were in a majority would appoint Armenians in their places. His plan is, in fact, self-government for Armenia, under a removable Commissioner. The Sultan listened, Lord Dufferin said, and was gracious; but he had himself little hope, and he had warned the Sultan that "a term must come to patience." The Russian Armenians were in a very different position from those of Turkey, the latter began to draw invidious deductions, and in a short time a situation might arise most disastrous to the Porte and its supremacy. Of course, the object of this very unusual demonstration is to attract attention in Constantinople; but it is hardly probable that the mind of the Sultan will be much affected. What does he care what Mr. Hagopian, or Mr. Apcar, or other Asiatic Christians may feel? When the Russian troops appear on the border, the Sultan will grant autonomy; and till then, his Pashas will plunder hard, taking all the more because the province is going. Think what mosquitoes would be, if they knew that their last chance of sucking had arrived!

The French Government have thought fit to publish a most outrageous statement. Their organs affirm that during an interview with Li Hung Chang at Shanghai, M. Tricou, the new French Ambassador, informed him that orders had been issued to shoot every Chinaman found in the Anamite ranks. It is added, in a tone of pride, that this announcement made a great impression on Li. We should think it did, for even China would hardly issue an order so unjust and impolitic. The Chinese in Anam are in a country in which they have as much right as we have in Canada, and are in the worst case only obeying the orders of their Government. Their appearance under Anamite colours might justify a war with China, but could by no possibility excuse a massacre of men who demand quarter. The consequences of a similar threat ruined the French cause in Mexico, and they will find that the Chinese with quarter refused are very formidable enemies. Are the French Government so in love with defeat, that they refuse to let their enemies run away?

The freedom of the Press means on the Continent something very different from what it means in England. The Queen of Spain wants a holiday, as everybody wants who is condemned to live the Court life, and proposes to pay a short visit to her relatives in Vienna, returning to Madrid at the end of a month. Thereupon, a number of Spanish newspapers affirm that she has left her husband in wrath at his infidelities, and will never enter Spain again. There is not a particle of truth in the statement, the King and his wife being on such terms that she is to be appointed Regent during the approaching tour; but so widespread is the scandal, that the Times' Correspondent has evidently been asked by the King and Queen, through a third party, to deny it by telegraph throughout Europe. The world, perhaps, does not get worse, for scandal always existed; but it certainly grows more vulgar, in that way in which vulgarity is demoralising. It loses, too, the old fortitude, which once enabled Kings, at all events, to live down lies.

Newnham College had a festivity of its own last Saturday, when a portrait of Miss Clough, who thirteen years ago opened with half-a-dozen women students the institution which now holds eighty, was presented to Newnham by the former and the present students. The enthusiasm of the girls appears to have been cordial, though the soprano and contralto cheering rather alarmed the masculine visitors, who were not accustomed to the collective voices of womenkind. Doubtless, the cry was something like that to which Homer compares the cry of the Trojans,—that which the migrating cranes send forth when they bear destruction to the pigmies. And surely the students of Newnham and Girton, of Lady Margaret Hall and Somerville College, do bode destruction to the pigmy race of merely fashionable girls.

Wednesday was a great day at both the older Universities,—Commencement at Oxford, and the day on which the honorary degrees were conferred at Cambridge. At Oxford, Dr. Schliemann, Lord Rayleigh, Lord Justice Bowen (an old and brilliant Balliol Fellow), Professor Fraser, and others received the honorary degree; after which Mr. Merry, the Public Orator, made a Latin speech of much more than ordinary ability and wit, marked by a certain banter directed at his own peculiar Latinity,—with not a few uses of quippe qui, for instance,—and concluding with a humorous apology to his audience if by chance he had not used the subjunctive mood often enough. At Cambridge, where the Chancellor himself was present, an honorary degree was conferred, among others, on Mr. Matthew Arnold, Sir John Lubbock, Dr. Roscoe, and the great artist, Mr. G. F. Watts,—the Public Orator, Mr. Sandys, referring pointedly to Mr. Arnold's birth on the Thames at Laleham, and speaking of him as inspired by its pellucid genius,—“qui amnis, poetarum laudibus celebratus, tranquillus, at non tardus, it, profundus et pellucidus idem est.” Sir John Lubbock was complimented with equal grace on his study of prehistoric times and on the Bank holidays he had given to England, Professor Roscoe on his spectrum analysis, and Mr. Watts on his great classical pictures. Mr. Merry and Mr. Sandys vie with each other in giving a certain lightness to their Latinity, and an effective allusiveness to their criticism of life.

It is clear, not only from the letters which we publish elsewhere, but from other equally remarkable indications, that the Oxford feeling against the organisation of a physiological laboratory with every arrangement for vivisection is very deep and wide-spread. Here is an illustration. The Rev. Coker-Adams, of Saham Rectory, Thetford, has sent to the Bursar of New College, Oxford, the following letter:—“To the Senior Bursar, New College, Oxford.—Saham Rectory, Thetford, St. Barnabas' Day, 1883. My dear Bursar,—If the University of Oxford has no better employment for its money than the expenditure of £10,000 in promoting Vivisection, that learned body cannot want and shall not have another sixpence from me. Should there be any way of becoming unattached to the University, while remaining, technically as truly, attached to my College, I will gladly avail myself of it. Otherwise, I must regretfully request that you will take my name off the books at the end of the academical year.—Believe me, yours, very truly, COKER-ADAMS.” But we sincerely hope that Mr. Coker-Adams will reconsider his course. It is always a pity to diminish the number of the Opposition, especially if there be any chance of turning the Opposition into the Ministry. Our notion is that while there is a good war to wage, an efficient soldier should never throw up his commission.

The Lord Mayor presided yesterday week at the Mansion House over a meeting of the Metropolitan Association for Befriending Young Servants (14 Grosvenor Road, S.W.), held partly to raise funds for this very valuable association, and partly to prepare for a new branch of it to be opened in the City and Shoreditch. The Lord Mayor, Lord O'Hagan, the Dean of Llandaff, Mr. Hubbard, and the Chairman of the Association, the Rev. Brooke Lambert, addressed the meeting, appealing to them for the funds without which it is simply impossible to find homes or find them for thousands of servants out of place, and to provide discipline and training in the temporary homes for shiftless and stupid girls. A few subscriptions, amounting to nearly £50, were raised in the meeting, but much more is needed. We wish the Charity Organisation Society would give us a Lloyd's classification, as it were, of the various charities of London, placing in the highest rank those only which do great good, without doing any harm. If they would, the Association at 14 Grosvenor Road would certainly be classed “A 1.”

Mr. Gladstone announced on Thursday that the Government would consider whether the Agricultural Holdings Bill could not have precedence of the Bill against Corrupt Practices at Elections. It is probable, therefore, that they intend to give the former Bill precedence. It is, of course, assumed in some quarters that the Attorney-General's Bill is, therefore, given up, but this is not the case. Mr. Gladstone informed his followers that it was indispensable, and it will be strenuously pressed. The change of purpose is due to the representations of landlords, who want to discuss the Tenants' Bill and get away, and to the necessity of giving the Lords time for consideration. Those unhappy gentlemen have had nothing to do all the Session, and are naturally not in a pleasant mood. The division of work between the Houses is indeed preposterous, but no one is able to devise a remedy. For a Liberal Government to propose political Bills in the Upper House first is to ensure their rejection.

The following is the official return of the results of the St. Andrews Arts Examination of 1883 for Women,—the examination for the diploma of L. L. A., as that University terms it:—Passed in Latin, 9 (1 with honours); mathematics, 2; logic and metaphysics, 8 (1 with honours); moral philosophy, 6 (4 with honours); English literature, 109 (68 with honours); natural philosophy, 1; education, 111 (33 with honours); political economy, 15 (4 with honours); French, 115 (24 with honours); German, 43 (19 with honours); Italian, 3; comparative philology, 14; history, 47 (9 with honours); chemistry, 1, with honours; physiology, 48 passed; botany, 17 (7 with honours); zoology, 2 (1 with honours); geology, 10 (7 with honours); Church history, 3 passed.

THE EXECUTION OF SULEIMAN SAMI.

THE Government on Monday put forward two arguments in defence of their conduct in allowing the execution of Suleiman Sami, and in answer to Lord Randolph Churchill's outrageous accusations. One of these two seems to us sufficient to satisfy any reasonable mind, to be, in fact, final, as far as this particular affair is concerned; but the other involves a theory which we regard with fixed distrust. Suleiman Sami, after the destruction of the forts of Alexandria, ordered the town to be burned, and the resident Europeans who were its unarmed guests to be massacred. As he had no right whatever to give any order of the kind, his own Sovereign, the Khedive, ordered him to be tried for what was in truth murder, arson, and mutiny combined. He was tried by a mixed tribunal, found guilty, sentenced to death, and executed. Between the sentence and the execution, Lord Randolph Churchill raised the question of his guilt in the House of Commons, and Mr. Gladstone, to satisfy him, asked the Foreign Office to inquire again whether its agents on the spot considered the sentence just. They replied in the affirmative, but because the execution was not delayed, Lord Randolph Churchill, with the support of Sir Stafford Northcote, accuses the Khedive of committing "a judicial murder," and the British Government of conniving at it. The Khedive's motive, he alleges, was to conceal the fact that he had himself ordered the burnings and massacres, and the motive of the British Government is to screen the Khedive. To this the Government reply boldly that they have acted on the opinions of their most trusted agents on the spot. Sir E. Malet, the Consul-General, who must have known all the facts, was satisfied that the charge against the Khedive was unfounded, and that the trial and sentence were in accordance with the substantial rules of justice. Major Macdonald, specially ordered to watch the trial, concurs in that report; while two European Judges of character—Morris Bey (English) and Federigo Bey (Italian or Austrian)—acceded to the sentence. Lord Dufferin, moreover, who had the fullest opportunity of knowing the truth, and who is now in England, denounces Lord Randolph's statements as utterly without foundation, and concurs as to the fairness of the trial. Consequently, so far as the British Government are concerned, the trial was a fair one. They could by possibility do no more than see that their agents were awake, and were satisfied that no injustice was done. That is all they can do anywhere, even in British dependencies. Suppose Suleiman Sami had been tried in Calcutta, and Parliament had been asked to interfere with his sentence, Government could only have acted on the advice either of their legal representatives or of their political representatives, and in Egypt both authorities reported against Suleiman Sami. Sir E. Malet is just as competent and just as honest as the Chief Justice of Bengal or the Viceroy of India, on whose opinions in the case supposed the Cabinet must have depended. Does Sir Stafford Northcote, who was quite as bad as Lord Randolph Churchill, though not quite so violent, seriously expect a British Government, in the teeth of its own convictions, on the strength of the gossip of Alexandria, where a dozen grandees are perpetually circulating inventions about Tewfik because he finds them no money, to override a judicial proceeding ordered by a subordinate Sovereign, and declared to be just by their own agents? If he does, he does not know the first conditions of government. The Government were really asked not only to pronounce the Khedive a villain, for that could have been the only reason for forbidding execution, but to declare Lord Dufferin and Sir E. Malet untrustworthy representatives, and Major Macdonald and Morris Bey judicial murderers, to brand the Khedive and his Courts and our own representatives all at once with the deepest criminality. The demand of itself displays the utter recklessness and contempt for the ends for which Government exists by which even moderate Tories can be carried away, when there is a chance, however remote, of giving a stab to Mr. Gladstone.

The Government were perfectly right in allowing the sentence to be carried out, but we cannot admit their second argument,—that they had but a partial responsibility for the affair. Their responsibility was full, and can be demonstrated in a single line. Had they believed Suleiman Sami innocent, they would have stopped the execution. It is an insult to them even to imagine otherwise. A telegram would have gone to the Khedive couched in unmistakeable terms, and the respite would have been granted. They could not have interfered with the action of the Court, but they could have interfered with the action of the Sovereign, and no one is malignant enough to doubt they would have done so. Their responsibility for all that occurs in Egypt in consequence of the action of its Executive is complete, and must necessarily be so, for if it is not, in maintaining the Khedive in his present position we are committing a crime. We have no right whatever to arm Tewfik with our irresistible strength, with the whole force of a first-class civilised State, to garrison his fortresses, and to overawe his subjects, if we are not prepared in grave matters to insist on his acting rightfully. We do so insist when it is a matter of indemnities or honest finance, and we are bound to insist when it is a matter of human lives. Not only is it wrong to avoid the responsibility, but it is impossible, for the House of Commons will never act on any theory of non-interference when the power to interfere imposes on it, in its own judgment, also the obligation. Theoretically, we are only the Khedive's allies, but practically we are his protectors against insurrection, and in destroying that defence for the people we bind ourselves to give them another, which is, in fact, our own watchfulness. As a matter of fact, we did give them another in the most effective form,—the presence of Major Macdonald, who would have protested at once, had a judicial murder been going on, and would have appealed not only to the Consul-General, but, if needful, to the General in command of the British troops. The responsibility is full, and it is inconvenient only because it is not formulated, and is opposed to the impracticable official theory that Egyptian action is to be independent, yet in accordance with British ideas. If it is independent in any true sense, why does Sir E. Malet, or Major Macdonald, or any other British Agent interfere with the local tribunal? In an Indian Protected State, the Resident would make himself master of the facts, and if the matter were important enough, would "advise" the native sovereign with irresistible authority. The Resident's decision would be, in fact, final, and if there were any failure of justice, he would be held responsible by his employers. That is the proper system for Egypt, so long as we occupy the country, and till it is adopted there will be nothing but confusion. The Khedive will be told to act independently, and so long as he acts as Englishmen approve he will be independent, but the moment he acts on principles opposed to ours, the House of Commons will compel the Government to make his independence cease. The only possible method of making control regular is to inform the Khedive that till we retire he must, if Major Baring interferes, act on his advice, and then, if criticisms are volunteered in the House, either to support or recall Major Baring. The present system imposes on the Government the fact of responsibility, and all the trouble of it, without giving them any regular method of exerting their unquestionable power.

We must add, though on this point there will be many dissidents, that the discussion of Monday greatly discourages us as to the possibility of controlling a country like Egypt, which the House of Commons, as it were, can see, through a Native administration. The House does not trust it, its motives or its objects. There was no universal sense of indignation at the monstrous charges of Lord Randolph Churchill, monstrous because offered without evidence, even if they were true. A large section of the House evidently thought it quite possible that Tewfik Khedive was publicly assassinating an enemy, in order to save himself from inconvenience, and that his Ministers and higher servants were aiding in that crime. There was in the House no full confidence that even the rudimentary Asiatic morality existed in the Egyptian Administration. As that Administration must be trusted more or less, if business is to go on at all, this is a very dangerous symptom. Parliament can overthrow the Khedive to-morrow, and if the second strongest party in it is to accuse him of murder without evidence and with impunity, his authority cannot last. In his very sensible defence of himself to the Times' Correspondent, Tewfik says he does not care much about personal abuse, and that may be quite true. He is by nature as well as descent a Fellah, and given to submission. But it is quite impossible for Europeans to work frankly with a ruler accused in this style, not by enemies, but by his own protectors, or for any ordinary Sovereign to feel kindly to the Power which publicly allows such treatment. With any Prince but Tewfik, the arrangement would collapse in a week; and even with him, with distrust so manifest among a party which at any moment may be in power, very little good can be effected. Mr. Gladstone might rule if a third of England suspected him of murder, but his rule could be of little benefit, either to his country or himself. If the partisans cannot respect the Egyptian Government enough to confine their accusations to provable facts, working with that Government will be very like fighting with a sword which the soldier knows, or suspects to be, half-sawn through.

THE MARRIAGE LAW IN THE LORDS.

THE majority in the Lords for the Bill rendering it lawful to marry a deceased wife's sister, is at least as important in its bearing on the relation of Canonical to Statute Law, as in relation to the subject with which it deals. For our own parts, the debate of Monday night confirms us in the impression which we have always entertained, that the law which this Bill proposes to repeal is a mistaken interference with liberty, on a subject on which the State has no good ground to interfere. The mere fact that the Roman Church herself frequently grants dispensations to those who can show what is called sufficient reason for asking leave to break this law, shows that that great Church does not regard the Canonical prohibition as resting on divine law, which is absolute and final, but at most as an expedient prohibition which may be relaxed for any reasons which the Church deems adequate. And still more significant of weakness is the Archbishop of Canterbury's attempt to define the principle on which certain marriages of affinity are to be forbidden. These marriages, he says, are always unlawful if in describing them you are not obliged to mention more than three persons, namely, the man, his former wife, and the wife's relative. But they cease to be unlawful if in describing them you are obliged to count four, namely, the man, his former wife, the wife's relative, and another relative of the man himself,—so that father and son may marry sisters without canonical prohibition, in spite of the theory advocated by the opponents of the Bill, which insists that the stepmother should be accepted as canonically a true mother, and her sister, therefore, as a true aunt. No sound principle of objection can be at the bottom of a theory which requires so unnatural and untenable a qualification as this. Either affinity identifies a man's relations with his wife's, or it does not. If it does, the man's relations are his wife's, and his are her's, and exactly in the same degree. If it does not, the man himself is not related to his wife's relations, nor she to his, in the same degree as the other partner to the marriage. Now, nothing is more evident than that the Jewish Law could not possibly have regarded the man and his wife as each of them holding the same relation to each others' relations as he or she holds to their own, otherwise the Mosaic Law requiring a man under certain circumstances to marry his brother's widow, would have been simply impossible and iniquitous. We may assume, then, that the attempt to represent the statutory repeal of the prohibition of marriage with a deceased wife's sister as a trampling on divine law has utterly broken down. Whatever the legitimate ground of distaste against such marriages may be,—and we heartily admit a sufficient basis for such distaste in the general rule that relations which partake chiefly of the brotherly and sisterly, though never, we think, quite those of the true brother and sister, cannot very well be changed into relations of a very different kind, without passing through disturbing and unnatural transformations, against which the natural conservatism and the natural loyalty of the heart is very apt to rebel,—we do not believe that they are of a kind which the State ought to prohibit, since the prohibition, resting on such doubtful grounds as it does, does not, in fact, succeed in uniformly preventing the transformation of feeling which is the true misfortune; and, when that transformation of feeling has once taken place, the prohibition does nothing but mischief in preventing the sanction of marriage to the new state of feeling. If there were a real and substantial moral ground, or a real and substantial ground of physiological objection, to such marriages, the case would be different; but as neither can be made out, it is undoubtedly a very great mischief that changes of relation which, though they are comparatively rare, are quite common enough to claim the serious attention of the State, should not be allowed by our statutory Law to form the basis of a marriage contract. Lord Carrington sufficiently showed that, in the opinion of an immense number of working-men, the present marriage law is a serious evil, leading to consequences infinitely more objectionable than any offence against the higher moral taste; and that is the true argument for a removal of this dangerous prohibition.

However, it is not denied that Parliament, though it can make marriage with a deceased wife's sister legal by statute, cannot repeal a Canon of the Church, any more than it can repeal a rule laid down in the constitution of any of the Dissenting sects. Lord Dalhousie does not at present even propose to compel the Clergy to celebrate these marriages, but only to compel the Registrars to register them. But, while we heartily approve this moderation, so far as it exempts all the Clergy who may conscientiously object to having anything to say to such marriages from celebrating them, we do not think that it would be wise in Parliament to leave these marriages in the position of purely secular contracts, necessarily destitute of any religious sanction. If they are absolutely wrong, the law against them ought not to be repealed. If, as we believe, they are not necessarily wrong, but at worst only marriages involving a transformation of one class of feelings into another and very different class, which, though it offends some of the finer instincts, is not comparable in moral mischief to many of the violences done to feeling by marriages of pure convenience,—then they ought to have a religious sanction, and it will do nothing but harm to make those who contract them feel that they are in some sense outlaws from the religious world. Although, therefore, we should be very sorry to see the State insisting that all clergymen should be required to celebrate these marriages, whether there be a conscientious objection to do so or not, we do think that any clergyman of the Established Church who has no such conscientious objection should be protected by the State from all the ecclesiastical consequences of violating the Canon Law, if he celebrates such a marriage. Religious persons will see that nothing can be more mischievous than the existence of a class of marriages which are good enough for secular morality, but not good enough for religious sanction. Such a condition of things would be a great premium on pure secularism; and, in point of fact, everybody knows that these marriages, if they be morally admissible at all, as we sincerely believe they are, will very often be contracted by religious people who wish nothing less than to be regarded as violating all religious principles in contracting them. Not a few of the Bishops who have argued most strongly against these marriages have, as we all know, admitted that there is no divine law against them; and if this admission be made by a very considerable number of the best theologians of the Church, and if the State, on the ground of expediency, sanctions these marriages, it would be too monstrous to exclude them from the sanction of religion, so far as the State can secure any such sanction for them. Of course, the State cannot provide that any Dissenting sect—over whose rules it has no control—shall require its ministers to celebrate them; but then, as a rule, the difficulty will not often be serious, we take it, amongst the Dissenters. The State, however, can fairly require that clergymen of the Established Church shall not be molested by the ecclesiastics of the Established Church for celebrating such marriages, even though the canonical Law be against them,—in other words, it may fairly require that canonical penalties, even though they be incurred, shall not be enforced against any clergyman who has celebrated a marriage valid under the statute. We suggest that the House of Commons shall engraft this provision on the Bill, as being one that is really needful to bring these marriages within the range of the religious life. Nothing could be more unfortunate for the Church than to alienate needlessly a class of persons encouraged by the State to disregard a particular canonical law which is not a moral or religious law.

The arguments which go to prove that if this class of marriages are to be declared valid, there are many others resting on the same logical basis which ought to be declared valid also, are interesting, but for the present very unpractical. It may well be said that while the State is called upon to reconsider its rule in reference to a particular class of uncanonical marriages, for which there is a real popular need, and the prohibition of which leads to many infractions of the law and very great hardship to innocent children, there is no need for it to go further while the canonical Law remains what it is, unless a new case of real urgency springs up. Let us see whether the Church may not be persuaded to reconsider the Canon Law as regards marriages of this kind first. We are well aware of the difficulty that there is about any action at all on the part of our paralysed national Church. But to us, it seems clear that if one Church can grant dispensations, another Church may fairly abolish the rule which makes such dispensations needful, so soon as it is persuaded that the rule itself does more harm than good.

PRINCE BISMARCK'S VICTORY.

PRINCE BISMARCK has won, though at a great price. In spite of a determined resistance, and after a contest of nearly twelve months, he has carried his test-vote, the prophetic Budget for 1884-85, and has thus released himself for eighteen months from the necessity of attending to Parliamentary opinion. The machine would go on for that time, that is, till about February, 1885, even if the Reichsrath did not sit; and though it will sit, its votes will be unimportant, and a dissolution comparatively easy. The Executive may still want help from Parliament, but it is freed from Parliamentary control. This is precisely the situation that Prince Bismarck, who at heart passionately despises the Liberal leaders as mere ideologues, most desires, and it is difficult to doubt, from all the information that reaches England, that he has attained it by "breaking the heart" of his Parliamentary opponents. His recent successful attempt to conciliate the Ultramontanes, though it has greatly facilitated his final victory, has not been his sole means. He has worn down the Opposition. He has for years acted upon two fixed ideas: one, that the people, in their dread of foreign pressure—a real dread of a real pressure—would not allow him to be dismissed; and the other, that to pass his measures he might lawfully use any of the parties in the Reichsrath as instruments, irrespective of their convictions. He has not, in fact, regarded them as parties at all, but as factious groups, to be played off skilfully against each other. This policy has been pursued with the persistence and courage of his character. No group has been too hostile, or too anti-national, or too extreme, in the Continental sense, for Prince Bismarck to seek its temporary alliance. He has used the Conservatives, the National Liberals, the Radicals, the Socialists, in turn, as he is now using the Ultramontanes. The consequence has been an utter disorganisation of parties, Opposition after Opposition crumbling away, as some heavy group went over to the Chancellor's side. A leader might spend years and energy which would have built a kingdom upon the organisation of a party strong enough to be a restraining force upon the Prince—nothing more than a restraining force could be hoped for—and then, without notice, the Prince would execute a volte-face which nobody expected, and which was at variance with his whole policy, and so there was a majority for him again. No vote of refusal produced on him the slightest moral effect. He simply, if refused a great Bill, cast about for means to buy-off a great group, found them, produced his Bill again, and carried it. It is as if Mr. Gladstone, to carry his Church Bill, had offered the Tories Protection, and then to carry a reform of the Lords had offered the Radicals universal suffrage.

These tactics, pursued with the almost Italian patience and finesse which underlie the broad brusquerie of the Chancellor's utterances, have gradually worn out the courage of the Liberals. They see that, the condition of Prince Bismarck's irremovability being granted, they can secure nothing, not even the right of veto, to which they limit their aspirations, and they have lost heart and energy. At last, Prince Bismarck, who had attacked the Catholic Church to secure the Liberals, protected it to secure the Centre; and his opponents, in exasperation and hopelessness, have thrown up the struggle. Herr Laaker, leader of the Radicals, worn out in health and hope, has retired from politics; and Herr Bennigsen, leader of the Whigs, has given up his seat, alleging that he can do nothing with his party, and can neither resist nor support the Chancellor. The Opposition, already dispirited, feels itself disorganised, and the great vote has passed, leaving a sense in the minds of the great majority of Germans that Prince Bismarck, while he retains power, must be allowed to do as he pleases, and that a useless struggle with him only destroys the moral dignity of his opponents. If he is determined on his Socialist Bills, he must have them, or he will purchase support again. That seems very weak to Englishmen, who have so often contended against irresistible strength; but it must be remembered that the German Liberals have fought very steadily for seven years, that in fighting they have gained nothing—not even strong popular support—and that they are fettered from the first by what they all acknowledge, the absolute impossibility of removing Prince Bismarck. His protection is not the Crown only. Their constituencies would not bear it,—would rather, it is gravely asserted, see the Reichsrath

Prince Bismarck must be considered Germany, for the time, and the only useful speculation is what he will do with his power. We should be inclined to say, for ourselves, that he would do nothing, but quietly continue governing as he pleases, leaving the future to provide for itself; but that is not exactly the opinion of Germans, though; be it observed, they are very far from unanimous. As we understand the situation, there are in Germany two broad and different currents of opinion on the Chancellor's policy. One is that he is determined to maintain peace during the remainder of his life, and has arranged the Tripartite agreement or alliance with the view of concentrating a mass of force so great that attack from the outside shall be impossible. He is not seeking the opportunity of aggrandisement, but the means of security, and does not wish either to change the relative proportions of States or to exaggerate the strength of Germany. That looks true, because it is in accord with the accomplished facts. No statesman in Europe would think it safe for any two Powers, say Russia and France combined, to attack the combined armies of Germany, Austria, and Italy, with their splendid position in the centre, protected on the north by the Baltic, and on the south by the Mediterranean. They could not hope for success, and have little motive for trying so dangerous an experiment. They would fight outside of their own territories, and with forces inferior to those of their opponents, who would be upon their own soil. That is obviously the conviction of the financial world, and it is, in our judgment, the one most in accord with Prince Bismarck's professions, with the steady policy of the Hohenzollerns, who do not love war for itself, and with the known horror of purposeless war entertained by the German people.

Nevertheless, there are Germans who are not satisfied, who believe that Prince Bismarck still doubts whether Germany is secure from a coalition, and who think he may still be determined to place some final barrier, say a Kingdom of Poland, under a Hohenzollern Prince, between his people and the huge Slavic Power. They doubt, in short, if the Prince has yet given up the idea of a war with Russia, in which the combined armies would drive Russia back, and decide once for all that the Romanoffs should rule neither the Poles nor the South Slavs. That war, they say, if successful, would leave Germany finally a solid State, with good frontiers, and beyond danger even from a coalition. The Army, they say, would of course obey; and the people, though inclined for peace, have an irrational dread and dislike of the Slavs, which, if the Hohenzollerns gave the signal, would instantly become active. We confess we cannot credit this suggestion. That any ruler of Germany would like to weaken Russia, we can readily believe. It is not pleasant to see a million of soldiers constantly moving over plains not separated by defensible frontiers from your own dominions. It is too like watching the sea from a meadow which a storm-wave might flood. Nor have we the slightest confidence in Prince Bismarck's love of peace. If he thought that a rush upon Russia, and the loss, say, of 50,000 men would secure the eastern frontier for a century, he would rush, without needing any other reason. But we have much confidence in his intelligence, and much more in that instinct which teaches great dynasties like the Hohenzollerns not to play for unlimited stakes. Adventurers may think it worth while to offer double or quits, but not rich winners. In declaring war on Russia, with France behind him, Prince Bismarck would place everything at hazard, and compel the most numerous and stubborn of European races to fight to the death. The Romanoff dynasty could not survive such a defeat, it is doubtful if Russia could; and both would exhaust all their resources—and for defensive war those resources have scarcely a limit—before they would even consider the chances of negotiation. France could never be kept quiet, and if the war lasted at all—and there is no Paris in Russia to take, and no means of bringing an invasion to a sudden close—the enemies of Germany would find out every weak place. Such an adventure, to be ordered by prosperous men of large experience, is to us incredible, and we expect an armed and strained, but still solid peace; but it is vain to discourse of Germany, without considering possibilities which experienced Germans take into account. Prince Bismarck has now the control, with his master's consent, of all the regular resources of Germany for eighteen months; he has battled hard to get them, and he must have had before his mind some end worth all that personal trouble and political disrepute.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE BRIGHT CELEBRATION.

THE great ovation of the week to Mr. Bright has evidently been anything but a pure pleasure to himself, though it must have at least convinced him that the great mass of his fellow-countrymen regard his public career with even more unmixed pride and satisfaction than he himself has ever indulged in his review of it. But this is precisely one of its most significant features,—that the celebration cannot in any sense have been organised solely to give pleasure to Mr. Bright, though it has been organised to do honour to him, for the motive evidently has been, and has rightly been, to find a vivid expression for the public feeling with which Mr. Bright is regarded, even though it may be very true that Mr. Bright himself would have spent the week much more pleasantly, if he had passed it in some quiet retirement on the lonely banks of a Scotch river, or in some bright retreat on the Welsh coast. These popular celebrations are not devised for the sake of the hero of them, but for the sake of the people whose multitude gives them their meaning and effect. It is for their sakes that Mr. Bright consents to be the prominent figure of a mighty population during so long a festivity,—and he is quite right. Nothing really does more to foster and develop the growth of popular convictions than those well-earned popular triumphs. They succeed in imprinting indelibly on the minds of the Democracy of the future the type of statesman which it should set before it and try to raise into an ideal. Mr. Bright will be as weary before the end of the week as he was apprehensive of his inadequacy to come up to the demands upon his strength at the beginning of it; but he will not regret that he accepted the invitation of the town to make him the centre of its interests, if he is sure at its close, as he well may be, that for a generation to come the young people of the Midland Counties will be more disposed to hold fast by his counsels and to try their representatives by the standard of his principles than they would have been if he had followed the instinct of his own modesty, and the natural apprehensiveness of a septuagenarian, in begging to be excused so exciting and so tumultuous a tribute to his political achievements.

It is obvious from more than one of Mr. Bright's speeches that he felt keenly the insuperable difficulty of adequately interpreting the popular enthusiasm he beheld. He realised that language was absolutely and wholly unequal to the task of reflecting in any sense the magnitude of the demonstration. It is very hard to represent to ourselves by anything but abstract signs the difference between ten thousand grateful hearts and a hundred thousand grateful hearts; still more, the difference between a hundred thousand and a million; and it is quite impossible to represent the difference in any effectual speech. Yet even this absolute impossibility of conveying the impressions made upon him by the hundreds of thousands who thronged his path and cheered him as he passed, must have been in a sense satisfactory to Mr. Bright, as showing how little politics really depend on the abstract truth or falsehood of special political ideas, and how much they depend on the forces of popular sympathy which can be awakened by some natures, and which cannot be awakened, even under the influence of precisely the same thoughts, by others. It would be impossible to imagine a more potent illustration of the difference between political ideas and political force, than the Birmingham enthusiasm of this week. Not a thousandth part of the enthusiasm would have been awakened by the career of a man expressing the very same ideas, if uttered by less eloquent lips than Mr. Bright's. It was the peculiar effect with which he expressed the ideas, the power in him,—which multitudes who hold his ideas would not possess,—to thrill others with his own feelings, that has given him such a hold over the hearts of the people. He has wielded infinitely greater forces than almost any other man, though thinking exactly as he did, could have wielded; and no doubt he derives from his experience a perfectly sagacious though an unreasoned distrust of all thoughts which seem to him ill-adapted to stir these popular emotions, of all thoughts which appeal only to the understanding, and do not send any electric current through the hearts of the people. When we reproach, as we have often reproached, Mr. Bright for his impatience of anything like an exact representation of the popular view,—a representation of the minority, for instance, as well as of the majority,—doubtless he might reply, and reply with great force, 'I know better than you do the kind of thing which you can say to a multitude with full confidence that it will work; and also the kind of thing that you cannot say with the smallest hope of its working; and this flinikin desire of yours to get a representation of the views of the minority as well as of the majority is one of these last,—a desire that you cannot express with the least hope that the multitude will take it up, or in any way respond to it. The power of dealing with a democracy is, to some extent, an instinct. I have always had the instinct, as you see, and you may trust me that you will work no wonders by those mathematical notions of yours about exact representation.' That would seem to us a very unsatisfactory sort of reply, but we should frankly recognise that it was founded at least in truth,—that you cannot affect a great democracy except by a rough sort of justice, which may at times involve no insignificant amount of injustice,—and that only the men who can put in motion the larger forces will in the end come victoriously out of the fray. Politics, as the Birmingham demonstration most impressively teaches us, do not consist in the manipulation of true ideas, so much as in the manipulation of wide-spread and contagious feelings of right and justice. The man who can stir the last will always come out victorious over the man who can only verify the first.

At the banquet of Thursday, Mr. Bright, in reply to Lord Granville, took some credit to himself for his frequent political moderation in asking less than he might have obtained for the people, and, indeed, sooner or later did obtain. Thus, he said that he had advised the House of Commons in 1866 to accept a £7 borough franchise, though he had himself advocated household suffrage, and within another year carried household suffrage for the boroughs. And this is perfectly true. A part of Mr. Bright's popularity has, undoubtedly, been due to a kind of moderation. Mr. Bright has always been moderate, when his opponents were disposed to meet him half-way, just as he is moderate now, deprecating almost the proposal to insist at once on equal electoral districts, and arguing only for a very large and substantial redistribution of seats, which shall readjust political power mainly in proportion to population. But the moderation which has made Mr. Bright so popular has been moderation towards those who were coming half-way to meet him, not moderation towards those who met all his proposals with obstinate negatives. To these, he has never been specially moderate. He has gained a great deal of his popularity by pouring the vials of his indignation on the enemies of the popular cause, by denouncing them from time to time in no unmeasured language of scorn and invective. Moderation towards friends, inexorable wrath toward foes,—that has been one of the secrets of the immense popularity which Mr. Bright enjoys. The English people love moderation, when it hastens the moment of a desirable settlement; but they are hardly educated enough to like moderation when it consists, as it often must consist, in finding excuses for genuine enemies, and discussing the modicum of truth in the position which those enemies assume. Mr. Bright, with his deep instinct for the manipulation of popular force, has sympathised with both these attitudes of the popular mind. He has been ready to give something, that he might get much all the sooner,—or to go "step by step," as he says, when he thought the first step taken, a reasonably long one. But he has himself felt too angry against those who did nothing but oppose his demands, even to attempt to do them justice. He has been moderation itself, to those who came with honest gifts in their hands; but he has been proud of his own intolerance of those who wished to fight every inch of ground with him and with the people. He would hardly have been the orator he is, had he felt otherwise. The mood of candour to real antagonists is not usually the mood in which burning words can be poured forth, such as kindle popular enthusiasm, and carry away the nation's heart.

THE TORIES AND IRELAND.

IT is, in our judgment, evident that Liberals must very shortly make up their minds as to their attitude towards the question of Peasant Proprietary in Ireland. The Tories have obviously made up theirs, and we gather from Mr. Gladstone's cautious speech, and Mr. Trevelyan's rather incautious one, that the Government perceive this, and acknowledge that the matter is becoming of first-rate political importance. Indeed, although Lord George Hamilton was careful to say that he spoke for himself alone, it is incredible that his speech of Tuesday—by far the best speech he ever delivered in his life, and the one which had in it most of the ring of statesmanship—could have been uttered without the approval of the Tory leaders. It was not a burst of rhetoric or a flourish designed to catch passing votes. The speech contained an immense and a carefully thought-out plan, though, as we deem it, an unworkable one, for enabling all tenants in Ireland to buy out all landlords at twenty-three years' purchase, paying the money by instalments of two and a half per cent. annually back to the State. That is an offer which will move every tenant in Ireland, and the tenants with their families form three-fifths of her people, and, if accepted by the Irish and rejected by English Liberals, must for years to come throw the weight of the Irish vote upon the Tory side. Moreover, it will attract a great many English Radicals and some Liberals who are not Radicals at all, and it was not met by a simple rejection by the Government. Mr. Gladstone did not, indeed, as so many newspapers have said, give a half-assent to the plan. On the contrary, he obviously thought it involved some very dangerous consequences, and rejected it as too large. But he did admit, in plain terms, that "an early revision of the purchase clauses of the Irish Land Act, 1871, is necessary, in order to give effect to the intentions of Parliament contained therein," accepting, without a division, an amended resolution in those words. A large extension of peasant-proprietorship must, therefore, be regarded as conceded in principle by both parties, and the question to be settled is the terms to which the country will assent.

Those suggested by Lord G. Hamilton are dangerously easy, but in discussing them we have a difficulty to get over. We have as little wish as Mr. Gladstone to reject the principle of Lord George's motion. The Spectator has maintained for twenty years that Ireland is one of the countries in which, owing to social hatreds, the landlord's authority produces more evil than good; that the tenant must ultimately become a copyholder, exempt from eviction, except for non-payment of dues, and that property will never be safe until the physical strength of the country is enlisted, as in France, Belgium, and Prussia, on its side. But the acceptance of those views is no justification for carrying them out by the plunder of the British taxpayer, and it is to the danger of such plunder that Lord G. Hamilton exposes us. His plan is that a local Board, probably a Board of Guardians, shall borrow money enough to buy its own district, and hand it over to the farmers. As it must borrow cheaply, it would offer only three per cent., and would be allowed to pledge the faith of the United Kingdom, which would be as responsible for the money as it is for Exchequer Bills. To redeem its bonds, the Board would collect from the tenant every year for forty years a sum of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. upon the purchase-money, besides the interest, in all a little less than the rental, and so year by year pay off one-fortieth till the whole debt was extinguished, and the farmers free. That looks simple, and, if Ireland were Norfolk, or were governed like Prussia, it would be simple, but neither of those conditions exist. The farmers are Irishmen, full of an idea that rent is an oppression, harassed by occasional seasons of distress approaching famine, and living, as we believe, over large districts, upon a soil deteriorating from over-cropping. Suppose in a bad year they decline to pay. Are the members of the Local Board to evict a whole population? They could not do it if they would, and we all know they would not, for they live among the people, and they would be terrorised. A Guardian can be shot as easily as a magistrate, and if he voted for eviction in bad seasons he would be shot. The Board would refuse to act upon some pretext of distress, and the work would be left to the State, which, though not terrorised, would be almost equally powerless. It has not the agency to collect the rents of a kingdom. No Chancellor of the Exchequer will collect Treasury dues by means of civil war, and the collection would be delayed and delayed until at last the steady vote of one hundred Irish Members compelled a compromise. That might not matter much financially if the sum were moderate, but both Lord G. Hamilton and Mr. Parnell expect that the bulk of the peasantry would accept the offer, and then the total responsibility would, as Mr. Gladstone calculated, amount to between two and three hundred millions. In other words, the British taxpayers would, under the scheme, risk additional taxation of from six to nine millions a year—a doubled income-tax—in order that Irish tenants, who can pay rent like other people, though they cannot pay immoderate rent, should sit rent-free. Is it reasonable even to ask a kingdom, which the askers say is "foreign," to undertake the risk of such a burden as that? Obviously it is not, more especially when those Irishmen who advise it also plead for Home-rule, which, if granted, would deprive this country of the power even to attempt the collection of the instalments. Lord George Hamilton's plan is impracticable, and would secure to the State upon which he would lay such a heavy burden nothing but odium.

The first condition of any grand plan for creating peasant-proprietors in Ireland on a grand scale, is that reasonably safe security for repayment should be found; and this is what nobody attempts to offer. All Irishmen admit that a British guarantee is indispensable, but they offer only the land as security; and as land is worthless unless rent can be collected, that security is obviously imperfect. The State might be the only landlord which could collect rent without fail, because the State is beyond assassination; but it also might be the most powerless landlord of all, because it is governed by the tenants' representatives. That risk is too great to be faced for such vast sums, and they must be reduced if any scheme of the kind is to be seriously considered. Whether they can be reduced is the question on which experts disagree. The Statist some time ago, in a series of articles advocating a similar plan, said they could, but the calculator did not venture to bring the sum below £180,000,000. Mr. Parnell brings it down to £100,000,000, but he does not offer any proof of his figures, which are inconsistent with the known rental of the country. We ourselves think that the landlords would take less than twenty-three years' purchase, and that it would not be necessary to extinguish the whole rent. A third, or a fourth at least, might be left as a perpetual rent-charge, or "ground rent," as is done in London and in Scotland with so little difficulty that such ground-rents sell at a specially high price. But no contrivance can bring the amount below £120,000,000, and why should England and Scotland guarantee that great sum? They might, if the unity of the kingdom were past all question; but the Irish, who are seeking their aid—justifiably seeking it, if they form part of the same community—not only deny that the unity will be maintained, but denounce it as an evil thing. Ireland, therefore, must find at all events part of the money for herself if the plan is to be accepted, and this is precisely what she does not offer to do. Mr. Parnell resists strenuously Mr. Gladstone's condition that the farmer shall pay part down, and would probably regard a special tax in Ireland to be voted as a collateral security as an unspeakable tyranny. The guarantee is to be furnished by Britain, and a British guarantee for an Irish expenditure is equivalent, as a rule, to a British gift. That gift might be given if Ireland were heartily at one with the sister island; but Mr. Parnell would be the last man in Parliament to make a promise of the kind. He looks to his solution of the agrarian question to help him to Irish independence, and if he is right, it is a little hard to ask us all to contribute the fund upon which he is to base his success. With a burden of £200,000,000 to be shaken off, every Irishman's interests would be clear on the side of independence.

PROTECTION AND RETALIATION.

THE figures which the Duke of Rutland laid before the House of Lords yesterday week were gloomy enough to justify all that he said about the gravity of the Agricultural depression. One is tempted, sometimes, when the remedies suggested are very impracticable or very inappropriate, to put the question aside as one that it is useless to talk about. But the loss and the suffering are there, though they may not yet have brought with them the wisdom which can turn them to account. When the Duke of Rutland said that in the last ten years a million acres of land have gone out of cultivation, he possibly means, as regards some of it, that corn-growing has been abandoned, and some less profitable form of cultivation substituted. In that case, there must be something to be set against the eight millions at which the Duke estimates the dead-loss. There is no doubt, however, that on a large amount of land which was once under profitable cultivation, nothing, or nothing that pays the farmer, is any longer grown, and, of course, the consequent injury to the country is very great. In part, no doubt, this state of things is due to bad seasons. The wonder which has been excited in us by the fine weather that has now lasted a month is a significant testimony to our recollections of recent summers. But though the farmer would have been very much better off if he had been living in a different cycle, he would not have been prosperous. The principle of Free-trade is that each country shall grow the crops for which it is best suited, and on this principle England is not a wheat-growing country. We can bring grain from abroad more cheaply than we can grow it here, and when the movement of trade is unfettered, this fact becomes quickly known, and is not again lost sight of. As yet, however, English agriculturists have not thoroughly mastered this truth. They have proved, to their cost, that England is not fitted for wheat-growing, but they have not yet found out what it is fitted for. By-and-by, no doubt, this discovery will be made; crops which the English climate will allow to ripen in security, or which cannot be brought from a distance without injury, will take the place of those golden harvests which were once our pride, and in the dairy or the market garden the farmer will seek, if not find, compensation for his lost wheat-sheaves. It is because this revolution in the agricultural imagination is so indispensable, and yet so hard to bring about, that we regret that such advisers as the Duke of Rutland should still have the farmer's ear. So long as any dreams of protective duties still have possession of him, he will close his eyes against the cold daylight of actual fact. The margin between profit and loss seems so small, the discrepancy between them might so easily be bridged over by a moderate duty on foreign corn, that it is not surprising that he should find it hard to believe that the thing is impossible. When legislators and great landowners refuse to be convinced in their own persons, how can the farmer be expected to be in advance of them?

The Duke of Rutland appeals, for the confirmation of his theory that a return to Protection is the proper and only effectual remedy for the present distress, to certain facts which are really destructive of it. He says, very truly, that trade is bad, and he rightly attributes its badness to the protective policy of other countries, and notably of the United States. But then, by a curious perversion, he finds the seat of the mischief not in the adoption of this policy by foreign nations, but in its rejection by our own. If Englishmen were as wise as Americans or Frenchmen, or even as their own Colonists, duties on one side would be balanced by duties on the other; and though our goods might be kept at bay by our neighbours, we should still be happy in the consciousness that we were equally dour against their goods. The Duke of Rutland quoted a letter from a Sheffield manufacturer, in which there occurs this extraordinary passage:—"The want of reciprocity necessitates the manufacturers here reducing the wages of the workman to a shockingly low scale, to enable them to climb the barrier of Protection and in consequence of our suicidal policy, we shall find ourselves supporting a large portion of our able-bodied workmen out of the poor-rate." If the words "suicidal policy" were omitted from this statement, it would be true, though even then it would be exaggerated. Want of reciprocity, in the sense that France and the United States are not Free-traders, does keep down wages in England. It is plain, however, from the insertion of these words, that what the writer means by want of reciprocity is not that other countries are not Free-traders, but that England is not Protectionist. With the imposition of retaliatory duties, all would go well. But the only effect of this policy would be to lower wages still further. The sum actually paid would remain the same, but it would not go nearly so far. The sums actually paid would remain the same, because the imposition of duties would not enlarge the market for English-manufactured goods. English iron and English woollens do not stand on the same footing as English wheat. If there were a duty on similar goods imported from abroad, it would not increase the home demand. The foreign manufacturers do not, to any appreciable extent, undersell us in our own markets; they only succeed, by the help of protective duties, in keeping us out of their markets. No doubt, there are industries in which the foreigner can under-sell the Englishman, even in England; but this does not apply to the great trades which the Sheffield manufacturer has in his mind. In them, the market can only be appreciably enlarged by the removal of the barriers which keep English goods out of foreign countries. But though the wages stated in money would remain the same, the wages stated in value would be less. The workman has managed to live through this last bad time by the cheapness of food, and the cheapness of food would be at an end as soon as the principle of reciprocity had been admitted. If we once take to the levying of duties for purposes not purely fiscal, we cannot stop short of a duty on corn. Agriculture is the industry that most suffers from foreign competition; consequently, agriculture has the best claim to be protected against such competition. Corn is the one thing which the Americans must either send here, or keep it at home unsold. No fall in prices will induce people to eat more bread than they want, and it is from the surplus over and above what they want that the corn with which America supplies us is drawn. The United States would keenly feel a duty on corn imported into England; but in proportion as they suffered from the cessation of the demand, the English workman would suffer from the diminution of the supply.

Here comes in Lord Salisbury's way of looking at the question. 'You have admitted,' he might say, 'that the Americans would keenly feel the imposition of a duty on corn imported into England, and this is all I want to prove my point that retaliatory duties would very soon bring the Protectionist Powers to their senses.' But at whose cost? At the cost of the unhappy English industries, which had first been galvanised into unnatural life by the incidental protection of a retaliatory duty. The silk manufacture, for example, which is now almost killed by French competition, by the application of reciprocity would come to life again. French silks would naturally be chosen for the imposition of retaliatory duties, in order that the silk manufacturers of Lyons might put pressure on their Legislature not to shut them out from the English market for the benefit of the cotton manufacturers of Rouen or the wool manufacturers of Elbœuf. And so long as the French Legislature held out against this pressure, the English silk manufacture would flourish. Workmen would come back to it, capital would again flow into it, new machinery would be invented for it. But the moment that the French Chambers were really disposed to listen to the Lyons cry, negotiations would be opened with the English Government to ascertain whether, if France took off the duties on woollens and cottons, England would take off the duty on silk goods. On the principle of retaliation, we should have no choice but to do this. As the duty on silk goods would have done its work, we should be bound in prudence, as well as in honour, to remove it. But with what consequences to Spitalfields and Coventry? Simply that their last state would be worse than their first,—that we should have tempted back men and capital for a time, only to alienate them more hopelessly in the end. Substitute agriculture for the silk manufacture, and the fable is equally true of a retaliatory duty on corn. It is fortunate for his clients that though Lord Salisbury declares himself in favour of fiscal retaliation, it is with the safe proviso,—"If it were any longer in our power to resort to it."

THE PECUNIARY PROSPECTS OF YOUNG MEN.

THE prospect before young men who are earning their living, whether in the civil professions, or in business, or in that work of superintending which year by year demands better men, is not very bright, just now. An economic cause often described, but even yet scarcely realised by general society, is tending to produce what in the fighting Services is called a "block of promotion." The old stagers do not go, and the young, who see so much prosperity around them, are shut out of what they regard as legitimate, or, at all events, as expected chances. Men who announced long since an intention of retiring stay on indefinitely, men just below them murmur that, like the farmer who drank claret, they "get no forrarder," and with wealth everywhere there is a general sense of malaise. The young, in fact, are suffering from peace and prosperity. The regular course of English life among middle-class working bees has been for the professional man or the business man to save up a certain sum, fixed in his own mind, as an "independence"—very often, as compared with his previous income, a strangely moderate sum—and then, possibly with a further annuity from the "office," or "practice," or shop, to resign active work and the chance of fortune-making to younger men. A change has, however, occurred in this process. It is just as easy or as difficult to save up the money as it ever was, indeed, it is easier, for the increase of investing caution is, as the Stock Exchange well knows, quite amazing; but it is no longer possible to make the saved capital produce adequate income. A man now sixty, with saving ideas at forty, looked forward to living in old age, say, for the sake of round numbers, on £1,000 a year, and calculated that with a little care and trouble £20,000 would yield him that amount. He has accordingly saved £1,000 a year for twenty years very steadily, though perhaps with some groanings on the part of his children—the wives, as a rule, approve hoarding more than any other form of self-denial—and has now accumulated his "independence," and looks round to find it is not independence at all. It is not only that the price of meat, rent, washing, and wages have all risen, for he has watched and discounted those changes, and some other things have fallen, but that he can no longer get £1,000 as rent for his money. He cannot get £800, cannot, in his own fancy at least, get £700 safely. When he began to save, he believed, and was fairly right in believing, that with a good, solid mortgage at 5 per cent. for £10,000, and perhaps a mortgage on houses for £6,000 at 5½ per cent., and £4,000 placed in some fair home Stock, like the Railway Preferences, he should receive his interest with very little risk. Now, however, he distrusts mortgages, as "irregularly paid," or, trusting them, must put up with 4 per cent.; while, as to "sound Stocks," they yield comparatively nothing at all. What with the long comparative peace, and the increasing volume of general savings, and the steady sway of the vast mass of trust-money towards the high-priced Securities, and the financial thriftiness of the great borrowing bodies, the cities, the railways, and so on, the bulk of the good Stocks have been taken out of the market altogether, and there is such a fight for the remnant, that 3½ per cent. clear is good interest, and 4 per cent. is, in Home Securities, positively unattainable. Investors can nearly get it in a few Securities, liable to be paid off, but the following short list shows the state of the case:—

Three per Cent. Consols	100½
Two and a Half per Cent. Consols	88½
Bank of England Stock, dividend 10 per cent.	295
Bank of Ireland, dividend 12 per cent.	324
Great Eastern Four per Cent. Debenture	113
Great Northern Four per Cent. Debenture	116
Great Western Four per Cent. Debenture	117
Midland Four per Cent. Debenture	116
North-Eastern Four per Cent. Debenture	115½
South-Eastern Four per Cent. Debenture	112
India Three and a Half Stock	103

No one not engaged in buying and selling on 'Change knows how scarce the best Stocks have become. Even Consols respond to a large purchase in a most suspicious manner, as if the markets were in reality very bare; indeed, it is said that five-sevenths of the total Debt may be described as locked away, while many Stocks daily quoted cannot be bought in "lumps" at all. It is, for instance, we believe, literally true that nobody could get £10,000 of "Midland Five per Cent. Perpetual Preference," though there is eleven millions of it somewhere, and though it is always quoted; and that is only an extreme case. Stocks as good, which are still sold, fetch prices at which the dividend is only £3 12s. 6d.; and Bank of England Stock, East India Three-and-a-Half per Cents., Board of Works Bonds, and the like, have gone beyond that. The unlucky hoarder finds that £700 is all he will get for his £20,000, and if he is an unusually safe man, he will not get that. Consols do not yield three per cent. Moreover, the best men tell him that they see no prospect except of still further reductions, and there is a curious little barometer which indicates that they are right. There is a Stock which is entitled to rank as the very safest of all the Stocks which brokers jest about as "sleeping draughts," the English Two-and-a-Half per Cent. Consols. That may be fairly taken to be the safest investment in the world, safer even than American Threes, for it will not be paid off in our time, it will not be repudiated, and it will not be paid in anything but gold. It is, however, the dearest Stock in the world, and it goes creeping up in a way which shows that the far-sighted expect no fall in the price of Trustees' investments. The Economist pointed out last Saturday that the Stock had "recovered the dividend in a week," that is, had risen one and a quarter per cent.; and that means that the perfectly "safe" investors believe that it will go much higher. In other words, they look to see £2 10s. per cent. the normal minimum interest for sleeping money, instead of the five per cent. on which old ladies still reckon, and which old men who have held on, say to water shares, are still obtaining.

What is the saving middle-class man to do? The difference in his income means for him the difference between comfort and mere existence, the loss of all luxuries, the arrest of all liberties, an inability to help those whom he would like to help. Though he has succeeded, he is, to his own thinking, a poor man. He has hardly attained two-thirds of the irreducible minimum of his dreams. He is half-ruined by unearned decrement, which, again, as if to exasperate him purposely, is only decrement because everything is so prosperous, and the value of property is jumping upward in such leaps. He dreads with a positive cowardice the petty economies made necessary by such an income, and dreads almost more anything but regular investments. He will try, perhaps, a mad speculation; but he will not trust himself and his future to foreign Stocks, yielding, perhaps, a little above 4 per cent. He does not like even French Rentes, which he says jump about too much; and will not look at Bonds like the Russian, which still yield the "natural" interest of money. He is suspicious of Swedish Fours, which to all appearance are as safe as Consols, and will not purchase Victorian Fours, though the Colony is as rich as many sound States. There is nothing to do but accumulate a little more, which naturally, at his age, has become easier, and so he stays on at his work, grumblingly, blocking the way for his expectant successors, who find that their time for marrying and for saving and for retiring is thrown back out of sight. It is hard on him, perhaps, but it is harder on them, for they lose hope, and he has almost survived that most potent stimulus. They find, if professional men, that there is a long "check," and that the cream of the custom does not come to them; while, if they are men in business, the partnerships to which they look seem always further off. True, they benefit, perhaps, some day by the additional heapings; but they do not always know that, and in any case they are intent on things just a little nearer. They are kept waiting, and waiting is never a pleasing occupation. The stagnation and loss of heart are not quite so complete as they are in a blocked Service, because the cause of the evil is not so visible; but still they are perceptibly felt, and make early middle life far less cheerful than it used to be. We can hold out no hope of a change, for a rise in the rate of interest will only follow a great destruction of capital by war; emigration does not affect the class we speak of at all; and as for the appreciation of gold, though it goes on, it does not affect the imagination. If gold rose in value a hundred per cent., nobody would believe that £500 a year was as good as £1,000, or that 2½ per cent. was a reasonable interest for money. And necessities being once supplied, a man is poor or well-to-do very much according to his habitude of looking at things. A thousand a year seems wealth to the curate, even though he is one of the men who, having the thousand a year, must spend twice that amount. There are many men like that, and save drunkards who drink beer, we know of no class so hopeless, or so little happy.

THE BASIS OF DIGNITY.

DIGNITY is a quality which grows rarer as the world grows more populous, and for a very obvious reason, that there is a certain inwardness about all dignity which needs tranquillity for its condition, and which is not congenial to the bustle and competition of a crowd. It is a quality more of the East than of the West, more congenial to aristocracy than to democracy, more akin to the work of the imagination than to that of the understanding or the heart. It is fast deserting the House of Commons, for instance, where the younger blades like Lord Randolph Churchill and Mr. Gorst take pleasure in ignoring its existence, while only the Speaker, Mr. Gladstone, and Mr. Bright can be said to display it conspicuously, unless, perhaps, we may except the occasionally forlorn dignity with which Mr. Newdegate feeds himself on the exploded and barren traditions of earlier days. To some slight extent, certainly, dignity is aided by appropriate costume. The present writer heard two of the ablest of the younger Members of the House of Commons confessing the other day that the only presence in which they really trembled was the Speaker's, and that the stately way in which he grants their requests, reserving, nevertheless, something for which they had never asked, just to show that he granted their requests of his own grace, and not of their merit, habitually sends a shiver through their nerves. And there is no manner of doubt that dignity is much more easily supported on a tradition of some kind, whether official or hereditary, than on individual character alone. Yet there is, of course, such a thing as a genius for dignity, a dignity which comes neither of descent nor of official responsibility, but simply from a sort of inward stateliness; and this, where it exists, is even more impressive in the peasant,—in Wordsworth's Cumbrian "statesmen," for instance,—than in the stately office-bearer, or the peer of long descent. Dignity, indeed, though it is often stimulated by tradition, depends far more on patient confidence in the future, than on any pride in the past. It belongs to the mind that can wait, the mind that is not in a hurry, the mind that has a fund of strength and insight in itself:—

"True dignity abides with her alone
Who in the silent hour of inward thought
Can still respect, can still revere herself,
In lowliness of heart."

So says Wordsworth, and there is no poet in English literature who, where he does not fail altogether, depends more on his dignity for his greatness. In this he resembles Milton, the most dignified of all our poets, both of them having displayed a certain almost antique dignity such as recalls the time when there was ample space for man's individual genius, and but little hustling of mind on mind. Dignity cannot live without inexhaustible patience, and the age of competition is, unfortunately, the age of impatience. Dignity lives in soliloquy, but it must be true soliloquy, not that petty gossip with yourself which sometimes does duty for it. One hears all sorts of false criticism on dignity,—that it is pride in disguise, that it is wholly inconsistent with conceit, that it is a sort of self-love. Yet, the humblest men are often the most dignified; nor is dignity in the least inconsistent with conceit, if the conceit be not a loquacious and fidgetty, but a contemplative and reserved conceit. The present writer has known profoundly conceited men of very great dignity of manner, but they have certainly been men who, as Wordsworth says, can still respect, can still revere themselves, “in lowliness of heart.” Dignity and conceit are perfectly consistent, where the conceit is not the fussy, outward egotism it generally is, but a grave yet excessive satisfaction in personal qualities that really afford the owner a personal scenery such as feeds his imagination. It may be thought paradoxical to say, first, that humility is often one of the constituents of true dignity; and next, that such dignity is not by any means incompatible with personal conceit,—i.e., with an exaggerated estimate of one's own powers, and of the value their exertion may be to others. But the paradox is only apparent. Dignity depends ultimately on honest, inward self-reverence, and self-reverence is perfectly consistent with either humility or conceit, or indeed with various quaint mixtures of the two. Humility and pride are, no doubt, opposed to each other, but humility and conceit are not, for many a very humble-minded person is not a little prone to exaggerated estimates of the importance attaching to some one aspect of his life. Dr. Johnson, for instance, was substantially one of the most humble-minded men who ever lived, and yet no one with a keener sense of his own dignity or more complete consciousness of his own importance can be found in our history. Mr. Ruskin, again, writes as if his mind were the very centre of the universe for many purposes—with the air of almost Papal infallibility—and yet he produces on us the same sense of a profound element of personal humility as Dr. Johnson. In fact, the source of dignity, namely, the moral interest felt by a man in himself,—or, if you like to call it, “self-esteem,” though self-esteem does not describe it half as well,—is quite consistent both with elements of self-satisfaction and with elements of deep humiliation. All that is wanted for dignity is a reserve of interest which may be half-sad and half-glad, in your own character,—a reserve of interest which is not noisy and showy and petty in its manifestations, but which makes a man pause before he speaks, and think a little how far what he is going to see will fit in with the picture which he desires to have within him of his own character. Heedless men,—men heedless of the effect their own actions produce upon themselves,—cannot well be dignified. Impatient men,—men in a hurry to produce some particular external result,—cannot well be dignified. Men who are too sociable, who think only of producing a genial effect on others, cannot well be dignified. To be dignified, you must know what is in yourself, and for some reason or other,—be it noble, or be it commonplace,—attach a considerable importance to not saying anything that does not accurately represent that true self. But this state of mind is perfectly consistent both with very deep humility, and with a very considerable amount of self-conceit. It is consistent with great humility, because that deep self-distrust which many good men feel, produces this self-collectedness, this tendency to pause before saying what one might afterwards be dissatisfied with and regret; and this has all the effect of dignity. Again, it need not be deep self-distrust at all, but rather a strong imaginative command of a particular kind of impressive moral scenery, which makes a man reluctant to say anything jarring to such a self-consciousness. Mr. Bright's dignity as an orator, which has always been very great, appears to us to be of this kind. It originates probably in the strong sympathy which he has always felt with the griefs and hopes of great communities, and his keen appreciation of the note which will best elicit a clear echo in the popular mind. An orator who cannot speak without feeling himself the spokesman of a great community is, unless he quite mistakes his own powers, almost necessarily dignified in his speech. His speech is, to the speech of ordinary men, what the notes of a fine organ are to the notes of a drawing-room piano. They are attuned to reach a wider field, and to command the concordant sympathies of a multitude of hearts.

The common note of all men who are remarkable for true dignity is, however, a conscious self-respect; and this is getting less and less common, as the contemplative temper merges in the competitive temper of modern times. Mr. Arnold has, with more than his usual skill, described the dignity of the East, in its contrast with the restlessness of the West, in the lines in which he paints the scorn felt by the East for the Roman conquests:—

In patient, deep disdain;
She let the Legions thunder past,
And plunged in thought again.”

You have the whole secret of true dignity in that verse. It is patient; it is inward; and it really prefers the inward to the outward scenery. Dignity cannot be impatient; it cannot be external; yet even if a mind is both patient and inward, it will have no true dignity so long as its whole feeling for the inward scenery it contemplates is that of displeasure and disapprobation. A dignified man must feel a certain amount of interest and pleasure in expressing himself adequately in speech and conduct. He must keenly value the moral symmetry of his own thoughts and also the symmetry of his thoughts with his actions; and therefore it is that in the externality and hurry and irritability of our day, dignity is starved.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

[The author of Ecce Homo and of the recent book on Natural Religion permits us to publish the following interesting extract from a letter of his, written a few weeks after the appearance of Natural Religion, to a clergyman who had sent him some comments on it, accompanied with a pamphlet on the subject of a future Life.—Ed. Spectator.]

“Your comments on my book rather took me by surprise. You ask why I omitted to say this and that, and assume that I disbelieve, or at least regard as of slight importance, whatever is thus omitted. I see that you regard the book as a sort of confession of faith, or exhaustive statement of all that I believe on the subject of religion. Pray look again at the concluding pages, and at the preface and at the first chapter. You will see that my subject is most rigidly limited, and I say distinctly in the last paragraphs that what I omit seems to me all-important. I undertake to show that if all the negations of the fashionable scientific world were true, there still remains a religion of considerable and indispensable use. It would have been a mockery to undertake this, and forthwith to introduce notions and conceptions which the fashionable school treat with contempt. My only chance of obtaining a hearing from those for whom I wrote lay in keeping my engagement rigidly, in dismissing once for all whatever savoured in any way of the Supernatural. It was impossible to please the complete unbeliever and the Christian, even the liberal Christian, at once. I have laid myself out to win the attention of unbelievers. Now, I know how difficult it is to do this. I know by long experience (experience which it is very difficult for a clergyman to have, for I lived for many years in the intimate society of people to whom Christianity in all its forms seemed as ridiculous as any religion professed by barbarians), with what unbounded contempt they treat all the Vermittelung's Ansichten,—everything, for instance, written in the tone and style of Maurice. Everything of this kind, so I have found, they hate far more than old-fashioned theology. That, particularly in the form of Roman Catholicism, they can at least respect, but this they do not even respect. Of course, this state of mind is thoroughly unreasonable—to me especially it seems so, who feel every day how much I owe to Maurice,—but the men whose minds are in this state are now all-powerful over opinion, and they are forming a vast school of young crusaders, whose one ambition is to destroy religion.

“Only, I notice that just in the moment of victory they are seized with a misgiving. They begin to stammer out that it is not religion they hate, but only Christianity; that of course, when Christianity is destroyed, some other religion must be substituted for it. I try to catch them in this mood. I ask them to tell me what religion they will substitute. Now, if it appears that this religion is, after all, a good deal like Christianity, is not this result such as ought to be welcome to Christians? 'But,' you say, 'I make such terrible concessions.' I make no concessions; I only show that I am honestly prepared to put certain doctrines entirely on one side for the purposes of argument. 'But you will frighten pious Christians.' I do maintain that the time for such scruples is gone by. Few will be frightened, because the old have been thoroughly frightened already, and the rising generation have in general too little religion to be liable to such fright. No doubt, you would have thought it a more triumphant thing, if I had met the opponents of the faith with a direct, convincing demonstration of all its dogmas; such a book, if I were able to write it, would no doubt be read eagerly by Christians; but by the people whom I have in view it would not be read at all. I know that there are a vast number of young men who have quite broken with these dogmas, but yet feel themselves to be Christians, though they do not know how. I hope to get a response from some of them. You will see that, though I address unbelievers in the first instance, I also want to explain to Christians that I think them much in the wrong. To me it seems that the present reign of scepticism may be a wholesome discipline for them, by forcing them to bring out, as I say, the 'social, political, and historical' side of religion. My opinion in general about a future life is that we ought to believe in it, and then think as little about it as possible. This, just now, is, no doubt, very difficult. For this reason, such speculations as yours are necessary and interesting; but I am so full of the bearings of religion on life, society, and politics, that I find it hard to do justice to what treats of death, not life."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

VIVISECTION IN OXFORD.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I trust you will allow me, as a still older and equally loyal member of the University of Oxford, to add a word of practical warning and counsel in regard to the deplorable vote for £10,000 endowment of Dr. Burdon Sanderson's new torture-chamber—for every laboratory where vivisection is practised is a torture-chamber—snatched last Tuesday by a majority of three in Convocation. I do not write to supplant, still less to controvert, the letter of my relative, Mr. Frank Oxenham, in your impression of to-day, with every word of which I heartily concur; but in order to point out, to those whom it may concern, the plain and obvious explanation of the bare victory then scored by the Vivisectionists, which is a very simple one. In political contests at Oxford—which are always, however, matters of public notoriety beforehand—every single voter on the Roll of Convocation, on either side, is sure to be actively canvassed, and may think himself lucky if he does not get a dozen letters, instead of one. In this case, where there was, of course, no such previous notoriety, there must have been either no canvassing, or, at best, a very inadequate one. I myself, for instance, who for some ten years past have taken an active part in the anti-vivisection movement, and was, till my retirement, two years ago, on the Executive Committee of the International Association, was left to learn for the first time that such a contest was imminent by learning that it was over, when on Wednesday morning I read, with mingled feelings of indignation and disgust, the report of the proceedings in Convocation in my Times. Had I known of it, I should have felt it my duty to travel, if necessary, all across England to vote, if not also to speak, against a measure which I cannot but regard as a deep dishonour to the University, as well as a very grave practical evil. And if I received no previous notice, who am personally known to several members of the Victoria-Street Committee, it is not an extreme assumption that at least three more M.A.'s, like-minded with myself, whose votes with mine would have turned the scales, were left in the same ignorance.

Most sincerely indeed do I trust that some opportunity may yet be given of rescinding the unhappy vote of Tuesday last. But in my case, it is surely not too much to ask that, whenever any similar occasion occurs, those engaged in organising the opposition shall make a rather better use of their Oxford Calendar, and take care that every single member of Convocation not known to be hostile (whose address is accessible) shall be written to beforehand. It is abundantly clear that, had this simple rule been followed in this case, the defeat would have been turned into a victory.—I am, Sir, &c.,

H. N. OXENHAM.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The very week of my arrival in this beautiful city was signalised by a most unfortunate triumph on the part of the friends of pseudo-science. By a majority of 3—88 to 85—the University sanctioned the practice of Vivisection in Oxford, in the supposed interest of humanity; and for two days we have lost a household pet, a very amusing and affectionate dog, who has probably proved one of the first victims of these new grand inquisitors. As one who has valued and loved many medical men,— allow me to entreat them not to ostracise themselves, not to raise a strong barrier of feeling between them and all other classes in the community, not to persist in a practice which must encarnalise and brutalise the minds of medical students. Let me grant, what is doubtful, that they can thus obtain some knowledge, some useful knowledge even, possibly valuable in the application of the healing art, and freely grant that their motive is a noble one, to lengthen human life, remove some pressing ills, and increase our command of the domain of knowledge; still, all this does not pay for the moral injury wrought to the hearts of the young by deadening them to the sufferings of God's creatures. Doth God take care for oxen? Ay, most assuredly; as the Mosaic Law, trumpet-tongued, proclaims, which forbade even to seethe a kid in its mother's milk. Was not Nineveh spared for its children and "much cattle"? Did not our Lord tell us that God takes heed of sparrows even? Does not St. Paul himself give us to understand that the creature, the brute creation, is in some sense predestined to immortality,—"shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, and have a share in the liberty of the children of God"?

"Life-grapplers with the primal curse, Utility their meed,"

Sport is a separate question. Foxes would be exterminated, were they not preserved for sport, and have always a fair chance of getting off. Battues are almost given up by civilised human beings. Skill is needful to the sportsman to shoot and kill. The bungler is unintentionally cruel, and should be punished by ridicule.

But, to return to the matter in hand, what can be more unfortunate for a University, than that learned cruelty should be established in its midst? Is there not enough to tempt our human weakness to social excess, without legalising the tortures of dumb creatures? Does not all experience prove that dissection and medical operations, which are needful, drive young men to the wine-cup and punch-bowl by way of reaction? Must we add the far more defiling horrors of vivisection? I will not do more than glance at the fearful sufferings of God's trustful creatures, for, as Lear says,—

"That way, madness lies."

But, I repeat, I, who have loved medical men, entreat them not to persevere in a course which would end by making them the pariahs of the community. Public opinion will not tolerate those horrors that hold their revels in France and Germany. Surely, the University can reconsider its vote, and cancel a resolution which will be fatal to the moral healthfulness of Oxford.—I am, Sir, &c.,

ARCHER GURNEY.

ORGANISED BENEVOLENCE IN SWITZERLAND.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. Edward Liddell, appears to be one of those persons who estimate the value of a charity by its expenditure. It has not occurred to him that in many cases the exact converse holds good,—e.g., the ideal district visitor is one who should spend no money on those under his charge, by enabling them all to help themselves; the ideal Missionary Society would make all its missions self-supporting, &c. He does not think much can be done by a society which has forty-five objects and an income of £3,000 a year, and has, consequently, only £66 to spend on each.

Now, in the first place, out of the forty-five objects, forming each the subject of a separate report, only thirty-three figure in the accounts of the Association, its connection with others (e.g., the sick and death funds) being only of a moral nature. Out of the thirty-three which do appear in the accounts, twenty-four represent institutions reckoned as belonging to the Association, the remaining nine being only helped ("befriended" is the term used) by it, e.g., the Mediæval and Natural History Museums. Out of the institutions in the first class, again, four did not in the year 1881 cost the Association a single penny, e.g., the Women's Baths on the Rhine were absolutely self-supporting, although an enlargement of them was intended, involving, of course, a further outlay of capital. In the other cases, the contribution of the Society is supplemented from other sources, and may even form only a fraction of the total amount raised. For example, its contribution (the largest of any) of £220 towards the drawing and modelling schools is met by one of £240 by the State, over £120 from other contributions, chiefly those of trade guilds, over £800 in fees, &c., forming a total of over £1,400. I find that a total expenditure by the Society of about £1,100 on the 24 institutions of its own was met by nearly £960 of donations, and over £4,300 from other sources. The Society thus administers through its various Committees about five times as much as it expends from its own resources.

When Mr. Liddell asks to hear "a little as to the successful results achieved in each of the 45 branches of work which occupy the attention of the Society," the answer is that this would virtually amount to the translation of nearly 300 pages of reports. But I will take as a sample the report of the Committee for the care of deserted children, consisting of seven members, (I may here observe that but few members of the Society appear to belong to more than one Committee, so that they are not in the least called upon to take "an equal interest in 45 different charities"). This report, which in England would form a volume of itself, consists of exactly six pages. It gives details as to 56 children whom the Committee looked after during the year, stating the number retained under its charge from the previous year, the number taken in charge and given out of charge during the year, their sex, and the institutions or families (spread over six Cantons) where they were placed, what became of those who were given up, where all the fifty-six were born, the occupations of their parents, their family circumstances—with special details as to two—the help received from parents, communes, and private persons; and concludes with a cash account, showing a total expenditure of something under £200, of which rather over 21 per cent. was contributed by parents, and 79 per cent. nearly from other sources, the grant from the Society being £60.

The economy with which the Society is managed is simply marvellous. The total cost of the general management appears to be under £120, and that of the individual Committees is equally moderate. For instance, that of the one just mentioned, for the care of deserted children, was under £4 10s., although it is obvious from the fact that the objects of its care are widely scattered, that its operations must be unusually costly. Be it observed, moreover, that among the sources of income figures no single dinner, ball, concert, bazaar, fancy fair, or any other of those tricks by which money is sought to be wheedled out of the otherwise unwilling. Every contribution goes straight to its object. The Society has its occasional commemoration festivals, and that of its centenary in 1877 appears to have been a very grand affair, but a special fund is always raised for the purpose.

I trust, indeed, that before long a more extensive study of the working of this remarkable Society than can be given in a newspaper may appear in some monthly periodical. Mr. Liddell will then be able to judge whether these Swiss burghers have not acted successfully on a somewhat higher conception of human nature than appears to be his own.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE AUTHOR OF THE ARTICLE.

THE FAILURE OF RECRUITS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—After reading your article on "The Failure of Recruits," I think it may, perhaps, be worth while to tell you my experience on the subject. I live near a small town, about ten miles south-east of London, where of late years, owing to vicissitudes in the building trade, there has been a good deal of pressure—not severe distress—but "slack work." I am sure that at least one-third of the lads of the place would gladly go into the Army, as far as their own choice is concerned. But the respectable parents are almost, without exception, against it. They have still the idea, belonging, I suppose, to a past state of things (for we are a slowly-moving set, in spite of our nearness to London), that enlisting is the resource of a ne'er-do-weel; and they also shrink from the separation, partly, perhaps, for the sake of the lad's wages, but mostly as a matter of feeling. They are not used to look forward to parting with their sons, nor broken-in to it by sending them away to school, as we are; and, for the most part, the habit of reasoning is not strong enough to enable them to put this on one side, for the sake of a remote benefit. Now and then, a boy does carry his point and enlist, and then almost invariably he does well, and the parents become very proud of him; but this has not hitherto happened often enough to remove the prejudice. Of course, the consequence is that the more steady and dutiful lads give up the idea.

From the more needy families, a larger number do try to enlist, but most of them fall short of the standard either of height or of health. You will object that I have used the words "respectable" and "needy" as necessarily opposed to each other; but in practice, though not in reason, this is very generally the case among cottagers, at any rate here. Of course, I can suggest no remedy for the difficulty, and in other places the case may be different; but if several ignorant persons will give their experiences, perhaps some wiser head may discover an expedient.—I am, Sir, &c.,

ST. PETERSBURG, OR PETERSBURG?

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Mr. Herman Merivale asks the interesting question, "What is the name of the chief city of Russia?" He says in his letter:—"All the Britons (telegrams included) call the place St. Petersburg; all the French, I believe, Petersburg." Since reading Mr. Merivale's remarks, I have consulted the "Nouvelle Géographie Universelle," by Élisée Reclus, Paris, 1880, and I find in its pages both forms, "Petersbourg" and "Saint Pétersbourg," used, with complete impartiality. On page 589, M. Reclus has the following remarks on the name of the city:—"Par un singulier caprice, en donnant son nom même à la capitale de son Empire, il employait ce nom sous la forme hollandaise de Piterburg. En Russie et à l'étranger, l'usage a fait prédominer la designation allemande de Petersburg (Peterbourg); mais dans le langage ordinaire, la ville est encore appelée simplement, Piter." In literary Russian, I believe, the usual form is "Petersburg." It seems, then, that Mr. Merivale was wise in consulting the young lady of the modern-educational school.—I am, &c., 18 Bradmore Road, Oxford, June 11th. A. L. MAYHEW.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I beg leave to inform Mr. Herman Merivale that the proper title of the Russian capital is, in English, "St. Petersburg," and in French "St. Pétersbourg," its original Russian name being "Sanktpeterburg," in one word. Russian and French people often say "Petersbourg," to save trouble, but this is only colloquial.—I am, Sir, &c.,

A RUSSIAN.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Allow me to add another query to Mr. Herman Merivale's. Why are we so particular in prefixing "Saint" to the Russian Peter, whereas at home, where the "burg" is undoubtedly named from the Saint, we always speak of "Peterborough"?—I am, Sir, &c.,

R. E. BARTLETT.

GARIBALDI & THE POLICY OF ASSASSINATION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In the Spectator of yesterday you say, "One of the Irish Members was not ashamed to identify Garibaldi's name with the cause of assassination, one of those monstrous accusations which only bring disgrace on those who make them." I now beg your permission to repeat, on my own account, most positively and distinctly, this accusation of the Irish Member against Garibaldi; and I shall be much obliged if, in order to show how he and I have disgraced ourselves by this accusation, you will do me the favour of answering the following questions:—

1. Did Garibaldi, as Dictator at Naples, or did he not, decree the erection of a statue to Milano, the Neapolitan soldier who was executed for an attempt to assassinate his Sovereign, the late King Ferdinand II.?

2. Did Garibaldi, or did he not, publicly express his approval and admiration of the blowing-up of the Serristori Barracks in Rome by Monti and Tognetti, an act by which a large number of Pontifical Zouaves were wilfully murdered, and which was designed to destroy the whole regiment?

3. Did Garibaldi, or did he not, publicly express his admiration and approval of Hartmann's attempt to assassinate the late Emperor of Russia?—I am, Sir, &c.,

Travellers' Club, Pall Mall, S.W., June 10th. ASHBURNHAM.

[Lord Ashburnham asks us a number of questions without giving us the dates of the alleged events mentioned, and the words attributed to Garibaldi. Without these data it is impossible to test the accuracy of the imputations made. That Garibaldi committed himself to the policy of assassination was what we understood the allegation of the Irish Member to be.—Ed. Spectator.]

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

[THIRD NOTICE.]

IN this notice we propose to speak chiefly of those works which are otherwise likely to escape observation, either from their lack of size, their inconspicuous position, or the comparative unattractiveness of their subjects. In an exhibition like the present, which is notable chiefly for the absence of remarkable works, the inconspicuous pictures are frequently the best; and we have been surprised, on going carefully round the rooms, to find how much good work in the department of landscape is to be found in the higher places of each gallery, where it can scarcely be seen, and is almost certain to pass unnoticed. The attempt to mention all the works which deserve attention being perfectly hopeless, we shall ease our own minds, and gratify the patience of our readers, by giving up the endeavour to do more than say a few words almost at random on the painting and the subject of those pictures which arrest our attention.

There is a work in the first gallery called "The Last Look," by Mr. Maynard Brown, which has excited a good deal of comment since May 1st. It represents a scene in a manufacturing town, in which a mother and her children are taking a last look at some unknown object, probably intended to be the dead body of their father, since there is a large coffin on a chair by the side of the bed. The picture is dully painted in the manner of the Munich school, very carefully and well composed, and very restrained in its general effect; there is almost absolutely no colour in the work, and the chiaroscuro is of the simplest kind; such attraction as the composition possesses is entirely due to the truth of expression of the faces of the mother and her children; and it is remarkable that so artificial and so sickly a sentimentality prevails in English painting, that the mere fact that this picture depicts sorrow amongst the poor plainly and unaffectedly, has been sufficient to place it in a class by itself at the Royal Academy. It is, in truth, rendered impressive less by its own power and sincerity, than by the absolute triviality and sham prettiness of the works around it. From the technical point of view, it should be noticed that the manner in which the interior is intended to be lighted by no means explains itself; it is certainly not from the dying candle, near which one of the children stands; it does not seem to be light of dawn, noonday, or evening,—in fact, the whole of the scene, except the figures, is sunk in an obscurity which is relatively impossible. The light and shade are entirely arbitrary, and such as we believe could not exist under any natural conditions.

Mr. Barnard's picture of "The Jury, in 'The Pilgrim's Progress,'" is one of those clever but somewhat vulgar pieces of character-painting which this artist so frequently affords us; it is, in fact, a study of twelve unpleasant types, conceived with more skill than subtlety, and executed with more force than beauty. It devotes great ability to the delineation of noxious and unpleasant things, without any adequate reason for so doing; it seems to take an actual delight, like Mr. Gedge, the landlord of the Royal Oak, in telling us what a "poor lot these people are," big and little; it lacks that "sacra indignatio" against the base, and that aspiration after the worthy, which alone could render such a painted satire tolerable. "The Enchanted Lake," by Mr. A. Goodwin, we have before mentioned, but call attention to it again, as we find that its merits increase on further acquaintance. It is really a delightful piece of quaint fancy, and were it not that it seems to have been somewhat hurriedly executed, it would be entitled to rank with Mr. Goodwin's finest work. It is worthy of mention that during the many years this artist has contributed to the Academy, he has, if we remember right, never once been hung upon the line. All these pictures are in the first room. In the second, Mr. Boughton's "Dutch Ferry" has all his usual charm of tone and delicate colouring, but is sadly uninteresting in all other respects. It is now some years since this able artist painted a real picture, such as his admirers have a right to expect from him; he has lived on the reputation of "The Bearers of the Burden," and, having proved by that picture that he was capable of both power and insight, he has given us some reason to be dissatisfied with the lukewarm compositions of Dutch peasants and the large-eyed theatrical maidens which have formed his staple artistic commodities for the last four or five years.

Mr. Frith's picture of "The Private View of 1881" is one of those remarkable works which are fortunately less common in the Academy of the present day, than they were a few years since. Without descending to the level of abuse, or at least what would seem such to those who have not seen the picture, it is quite impossible to state our opinion as to its merits; but it is little less than heart-breaking to any one who cares for Art, to see such a picture as this in the place of honour at the great picture-show of the year.

A passing word of mention must be given to Mr. Rooke's delicate little composition of "Autumn," in which every detail, from the grapes in the foreground to the green lizard which is running behind the principal figure, is elaborated with an almost over-loving minuteness. The face of the girl who is carrying the grapes is a little lacking in expression, and not too well drawn; but the picture is a beautiful study of colour, of the full, rich kind that one seldom sees in the Academy. The hues employed have somewhat of the same deep, satisfying lustre peculiar to ancient mosaics, and have a little, too, of the mosaic lack of variety,—the colours are placed against each other, that is, piece by piece, and, though unity of tone is procured to a considerable extent, it is at a little loss of freshness and ease; like an essay by a young beginner, the picture is divided off into so many coloured paragraphs; and details seem to be introduced more for the sake of details than any other purpose. Mr. Henry Wood's "Preparation for the First Communion" is another of his scenes of Venetian life, on a rather larger scale than that which he generally attempts. The result has not justified the artist. The picture is, it is true, full of vivid expression and character, and is cleverly arranged, but the defects of Mr. Wood's paintings show more prominently the more he increases the size of his pictures. The colour is at once coarse and uninteresting; sentiment and meaning are almost absolutely absent, and the lack of chiaroscuro, which is always a peculiarity in Mr. Wood's work, is very evident here. For the rest, the picture will please those who regard painting from the point of view of an illustrated newspaper, and will annoy all those who think that a picture is scarcely worthy of the name, unless it tells us something important, shows us something beautiful, or hints to us something grand. Mr. Adrian Stokes's landscape of a "Spanish Mill" should be noted for its brilliancy and its truth of tone. And we must say one more word for Mr. John Reid's "Darby and Joan." It is the most quiet, unaffected, charming little picture of home-life to be found in the whole exhibition. All these pictures are in the second room.

In the third, the largest, gallery, look first at Mr. Watts's study of "Katie," a little girl with a pink dress and a pink face, a reddish background and scarlet stockings, a nice, demure, innocent, good little child, utterly spoilt as a picture, in our opinion, by the garishness of her stockings and her very prosaic button-boots. Mr. Watts, of all men in the world, should not succumb to this shabby pre-Raphaelitism of leather and cotton. It does not consist with the style of his painting, nor with the poetry of feeling with which all his work is marked; on the contrary, it strikes an absolutely incongruous note. Nearly above this there is a rather powerful, rough landscape, by Mr. Thomas Hope M'Lachlan, of "Moonrise on a Teesdale Moor." It is a dark, almost colourless picture, roughly executed, but fresh, true, and instinct with a certain inarticulate poetry of its own. Compare with this, Mr. Goodall's tiny, highly-finished picture of "Returning from the Pasture at Ghizeh." We confess that this small landscape seems to us to be of far more value than the majority of Mr. Goodall's more ambitious works; it is delicate, beautifully drawn, and very good in colour, a delightful remembrance of the place under its most beautiful aspect, that is, of course, at sunset. Another good landscape, this time by an amateur, is "In the Highlands of Surrey," by Sir Arthur Clay, Bart.

In the fourth gallery, Mr. Dendy Sadler's "Recreation" is one of the chief pictures, and though it touches only the humorous side of Art, one of the best. Mr. Sadler never paints anything but monks, and monks grinning,—but these monks are grinning very well, and each of them has a separate grin of his own; the picture, moreover, is original in its treatment, and is painted with a certain brisk incisiveness, as of a man who understands his work and means to do it thoroughly; to get it over as soon as possible, and then do another. Contrast with this Mr. Weatherbie's "To Everything there is a Season, and a Time to Every Purpose under the Heavens;" this last is a picture of a young man standing in a field by the side of a plough, putting on his coat after his day's work. In the distance, one sees a farm lad taking the cart-horses home. A picture somewhat in the manner of Walker, but with a more foreign style of colour, and perhaps a little more foreign motive; it deserves mention, if only for the fact that the chief figure has considerable power and truth, and is not, or at least does not appear to be, a studio model who has never worn a pair of gaiters or done a day's field-work in his life. Above this may be seen a good example of what careful painting and careful training can do to produce a picture. This is "At Last," by Mr. Fred. Cotman, thus succinctly and correctly described by that accomplished critic, Mr. Henry Blackburn,—“A soldier returning home; a woman on the bank; dog swimming to meet him.”

"Nerina," by Mr. C. E. Perugini, is the frankest and the best imitation of one of Sir Frederick Leighton's brown-skinned damsels which we have ever seen. It is so manifestly and so utterly an imitation that it seems scarcely necessary to say any more about it, but it is perhaps worth while to point out, as throwing some light upon the possible shortcomings of Sir Frederick's work, that this imitation of his manner gives exactly the same kind of pleasure, though not in so great a degree, as does the original. It is in its way quite exquisitely skilful, and though the face and the hands are not drawn with that precision and grace of which the President is capable, the draperies, the stonework, and all the surroundings of the figure could scarcely be told from those of the last-mentioned painter. Is the secret of the lack of power which art of this kind has to affect the majority of thoughtful people hinted at in the following sentence by Emerson?—"Art makes the same effort which a sensual prosperity makes, namely, to detach the beautiful from the useful, to do up the work as unavoidable, and hating it, pass on to enjoyment. These solaces and compensations, this division of beauty from use, the laws of Nature do not permit. As soon as beauty is sought not from religion and love, but for pleasure, it degrades the seeker."

If we mention Mr. Walter C. Horsley's "Fighting his Battles o'er Again," it is only to mark our opinion that so crude, violent, and insolent a picture, so coarsely painted and so vulgarly conceived, has no business upon the line at the Academy. It represents a half-naked, Eastern potentate swinging a gigantic sabre across the nose of a chuckling negro, whilst the Eastern potentate's favourite wife, with commendable indifference to the result of this perfectly uncalled-for proceeding, is gazing abstractedly into an Eastern landscape, composed of three anomalous trees; the remainder of the work is filled up with yellow-satin cushions, very uninteresting furniture, and a female attendant playing the banjo, apparently for the purpose of exciting the ancient warrior's warlike reminiscences. It may be that Mr. Horsley intends this work to be taken seriously, but we prefer to consider it as one of those pictorial eccentricities which occasionally, by some strange mischance, get shifted from the office in Bouverie Street to the walls of Burlington House.

In the fifth gallery, Mr. McWhirter has his best picture in the exhibition, which represents, as usual, a silver birch, and is similar in shape and size to the other work of the same character which this artist has exhibited in previous years. But the chief picture in this gallery is, without doubt, Mr. Logsdail's composition of "The Piazza San Marco;" it represents the evening gathering in the great Venetian square, in front of Mr. Ruskin's favourite cathedral. For the accuracy of one at least of the portraits the present writer can vouch confidently, since it represents a gondolier who punted him about Venice for more than a fortnight; but, indeed, most of the characters are evidently portraits of the habitués of the place. It is difficult to describe the hard, unnatural naturalness of this painting; it is like life, but like life with a twist in it,—very literally, "the trail of the serpent is over it all." We mean that Mr. Logsdail has, as is generally the case with painters of his school, seen his subject in all its details, both personal and architectural, with eyes which have only understood, or at all events have only been able to reproduce, the elements of bizarrerie, coarseness, and eccentricity which are to be found therein. The loveliness of the Cathedral, the finer details of character, the minute delicacies of colour and light and shade, the dignity of form and gesture, and all the hints of poetry and meaning which might and should have been in such a picture, are absent here. It is not a composition which reproduces worthily one of the most beautiful squares and the most motley assemblage of nationalities that can be found in the world; it is simply a large, double-page illustration to a Venetian journal.

METHODS OF SOCIAL REFORM.*

THE republication of these valuable papers will recall and increase the profound sense of loss with which the news of Professor Jevons's untimely death was received a year ago by the English public. Lucid, calm, and usually as cautious as he was sagacious,—though when he discovered, or thought he discovered traces, of a popular feeling unjust to men of science, no one could be more impetuous, and, as we think, more rash, than Professor Jevons in running a tilt at that popular feeling,—Professor Jevons was the man of all others to whom we might have looked for guidance in the many difficult social and economical questions of the day; nor, since Mr. Bagehot's death, do we know in whose hands we could have placed with so much confidence the review of the dangerous and difficult questions so crudely raised by Mr. Henry George, in his Progress and Poverty, as in those of Professor Jevons. Of the papers here republished, we may say that all are able, and most are wise, though we cannot say that we think wisdom by any means the characteristic of the vehement attack on those who regard the rapid extension of that professional physiology which makes Vivisection one of its chief instruments of investigation a very serious moral danger, against which it is absolutely necessary to warn the public, and to take the strictest guarantees. We should say much more of the paper called "Cruelty to Animals, a Study in Sociology," if its author were still living. As he is gone, we will only comment on one aspect of his paper so important that we should not feel it right to pass it by. Nothing can be more misleading than to use the cruelties of sport as a sort of buttress for the cruelties of science. If Professor Jevons was right in assuming that something like three million living creatures are wounded every year without being killed by the sportsmen who find their pleasure in shooting at them, and that other and much less painful means,—such as netting,—might be found for procuring the same amount of food, and keeping down the numbers of the animals which are now destroyed almost wholly by the gun, he would have been well justified in saying,—if he did mean to say, but of this we are not sure,—that this is monstrous and wholesale cruelty on the part of society, which deserves to be denounced. But Professor Jevons seems to us to have attacked society for the cruelty of its sport, less because he condemned its proceedings than because he wished to meet an attack on physiologists by a counter-manceuvre. And to suppose, as he did, that we ought to have refrained from even condemning the deliberate infliction of torture for scientific purposes, although that is the business of a new and rapidly-growing profession which invokes the authority of scientific right, until we had succeeded in putting down the unintended cruelties of the sportsman, seems to us to be most misleading. Is it conceivable that a public sanction given to the principle that any amount of torture may be deliberately inflicted by a great profession on any creature less than human, for any useful human purpose, would result in a more humane public feeling as regards sport? Would it not at once be said that if we may be as cruel as we please in order to improve our knowledge of the laws of health, we may clearly be equally cruel to increase our actual stock of health,—the former producing only a promise of contingent good to human health, while the latter produces a certain and measurable addition to it? It should, we think, have been perfectly clear to so lucid a mind as that of Professor Jevons, that if you want to impress on human beings their grave responsibility for the humane treatment of their poor relations, you must begin by challenging a grave profession of the highest scientific claims, when it demands the right to torture at will any number of animals that it may be needful to torture,—so long only as pain unnecessary for the object in question is avoided,—for the clear prospect or even a reasonable chance of adding to the stock of useful scientific knowledge. “The vivisector,” says Professor Jevons, “like most discoverers in pure science, must look for his reward in the pleasure of pursuing knowledge for its own sake, or for the sake of the millions of men who will in the future be benefited by his discoveries. Of course, I do not mean to say that the vivisector has clearly before his mind in each experiment the good of mankind generally. Men are usually driven to work for a great end by some instinctive tendency, some pleasure in the action itself, or some minor motive, just as the bee gathers a store of honey, not because he is conscious of its future utility, but because it is agreeable to gather it. We approve the industrious actions of the bee, because they lead to a useful end; and it is quite sufficient defence of the vivisector’s character that his labours are likely to result in the diminution of disease and suffering.” We reply that it is precisely the growth of this formidable “instinctive tendency” to amass knowledge by inflicting pangs on our fellow-creatures, as the bee amasses honey by sucking it out of the flowers, which we dread, and desire to extinguish. If it be allowed to grow, it will not stop at creatures beneath the rank of man; nor is there any good reason why it should stop exactly at the point where an immense advance of knowledge might easily be gained by going further. But even if it did stop at beings lower than man, this “instinctive tendency” would harden the heart, render human life altogether more cruel in its selfishness, and extinguish absolutely the last chance of putting a stop to the inhumanities of sport. Professor Jevons was amongst the gentlest and tenderest-hearted of his generation. We do not believe that he himself could have borne to torment even a frog, in order to have solved the most important physiological problem conceivable in “reflex action,” or in any other department of the science. We believe that he threw himself into the cause of the physiologists suffering under the attacks levelled against them, very much as he would have thrown himself into the cause of the frogs, if he had ever realised the frogs’ sufferings. All the more do we regret that this essay proceeded from his pen, and gave the great authority of his distinguished name to what we hold to be a bad cause.

The striking paper on “Cram” is the one which we should select as the best, and, in many respects, the most brilliant, in the book before us. Professor Jevons loved to expose the fallacy of a popular cry, and, in this case at least, he has performed the task most powerfully. He maintains that there is “good cram,” and “bad cram.” “Bad cram,” he says, “consists in temporarily impressing on the candidate’s mind a collection of facts, dates, or formulae, held in a wholly undigested state, and ready to be disgorged in the examination-room by an act of mere memory.” “Good cram,” on the contrary, he defines as training which is of a thorough and arduous character, directing the candidates’ studies into the most important lines of a given subject of examination, “so that the faculties of the pupil are stimulated and encouraged to the utmost in those lines.” Professor Jevons maintains, and maintains, we think, with the utmost truth, that for nine men out of ten, this is precisely the most useful and telling education in the world. In reply to a very effective speech of Sir Richard, then Mr. Cross,—at that time Home Secretary,—against cram, Professor Jevons says:—

“Both in this and his other remarks, Mr. Cross commits himself to the popular but wholly erroneous notion that what boys learn at school and college should be useful knowledge indelibly impressed upon the mind, so as to stay there all their lives, and be ready at their fingers’ ends. The real point of the objections to examination commonly is, that the candidate learns things for the examination only, which, when it is safely passed, he forgets again as speedily as possible. Mr. Cross would teach so deliberately and thoroughly that the very facts taught could not be forgotten, but must ever after crop up in the mind, whatever we are doing. I hold that remarks such as these proceed from a wholly false view of the nature and purposes of education. It is implied that the mind in early life is to be stored with the identical facts and bits of knowledge which are to be used in after-life. It is, in fact, Mr. Cross and those who think with him who advocate a kind of ‘cram,’ enduring, it is true, but still ‘bad cram.’ The true view of education, on the contrary, is to regard it as a course of training. The youth in a gymnasium practises upon a horizontal bar, in order to develop his muscular powers generally; he does not intend to go upon posturing upon horizontal bars all through life. School is a place where the mental fibres are to be exercised, trained, expanded, developed, and strengthened, not ‘crammed’ or loaded with ‘useful knowledge.’ The whole of a youth’s subsequent career is one long course of technical ‘cramming,’ in which any quantity of useful facts are supplied to him volens volens. The merchant gets his technical knowledge at the clerk’s desk, the barrister in the conveyancer’s offices or the law courts, the engineer in the workshop and the field. It is the very purpose of a liberal education, as it is correctly called, to develop and train the plastic fibres of the youthful brain, so as to prevent them taking too early a definite ‘set,’ which will afterwards narrow and restrict the range of acquisition and judgment. I will even go so far as to say that it is hardly desirable for the actual things taught at school to stay in the mind for life. The source of error is the failure to distinguish between the form and the matter of knowledge, between the facts themselves and the manner in which the mental powers deal with facts. It is wonderful that Mr. Cross and those who moralise in his strain do not perceive that the actual facts which a man deals with in life are infinite in number, and cannot be remembered in a finite brain. The psychologists, too, seem to me to be at fault in this matter, for they have not sufficiently drawn attention to the varying degrees of duration required in a well-organised memory. We commonly use the word ‘memory’ so as to cover the faculties of Retention, Reproduction, and Representation, as described by Hamilton, and very little consideration will show that in different cases we need the powers of retention, of suggestion, and of imagination in very different degrees. In some cases, we require to remember a thing only a few moments, or a few minutes; in other cases, a few hours or days; in yet other cases, a few weeks or months: it is an infinitesimally small part of all our mental impressions which can be profitably remembered for years. Memory may be too retentive, and facility for forgetting and of driving out one train of ideas by a new train is almost as essential to a well-trained intellect as facility of retention. Take the case of a barrister in full practice, who deals with several cases in a day. His business is to acquire as rapidly as possible the facts of the case immediately before him. With the powers of representation of a well-trained mind, he holds these facts steadily before him, comparing them with each other, discovering their relations, applying to them the principles and rules of law more deeply graven on his memory, or bringing them into connection with a few of the more prominent facts of previous cases which he happens to remember. For the details of laws and precedents he trusts to his text-writers, the statute-book, and his law library. Even before the case is finished, his mind has probably sifted out the facts and rejected the unimportant ones by the law of obliviscence. One case done with, he takes up a wholly new series of facts, and so from day to day, and from month to month, the matter before him is constantly changing. The same remarks are even more true of a busy and able administrator like Mr. Cross. The points which come before him are infinite in variety. The facts of each case are rapidly brought to his notice by subordinates, by correspondence, by debates in the House, by deputations and interviews, or by newspaper reports. Applying well-trained powers of judgment to the matter in hand, he makes a rapid decision and passes to the next piece of business. It would be fatal to Mr. Cross if he were to allow things to sink deep into his mind and stay there. There would be no difficulty in showing that in like manner, but in varying degrees, the engineer, the physician, the merchant, even the tradesman or the intelligent artisan, deal every day with various combinations of facts which cannot all be stored up in the cerebral framework, and certainly need not be so. The bearing of these considerations upon the subject of examinations ought to be very evident. For what is ‘cram’ but the rapid acquisition of a series of facts, the vigorous getting-up of a case, in order to exhibit well-trained powers of comprehension, of judgment, and of retention before an examiner? The practised barrister ‘crams’ up his ‘brief’ (so called because, as some suppose, made brief for the purpose), and stands an examination in it before a judge and jury. The candidate is not so hurried; he spends months, or it may be two or three years, in getting up his differential calculus or his inorganic chemistry. It is quite likely that when the ordeal is passed, and the favourable verdict delivered, he will dismiss the equations and the salts and compounds from his mind as rapidly as possible; but it does not follow that the useful effect of his training vanishes at the same time. If so, it follows that almost all the most able and successful men of the present day threw away their pains at school and college. I suppose that no one ever heard of a differential equation solving a nice point of law, nor is it common to hear Sophocles and Tacitus quoted by a leading counsel. Yet it can hardly be denied that our greatest barristers and judges were trained in the mathematical sciences, or if not, that their teachers thought the classics a better training-ground. If things taught at school and college are to stay in the mind to serve us in the business of life, then almost all the higher education yet given in this kingdom has missed its mark.”

It would be hardly possible, we submit, to put the case more powerfully, or on a surer basis of principle, than Professor Jevons puts it here. We have always maintained that the better class of “crammers” give better instruction in the modes of acquiring the principles of knowledge, and in the aptest use of them when acquired, than any other class of teachers. They are not the men who inspire the highest of all intellectual passions, the love of knowledge and truth for its own sake; but they are the men who best understand the gymnastic of the mind, and best train young men in the exercise and use of their own powers.

The inaugural address to the Manchester Statistical Society in 1869, and the opening address to the Economic Section of the British Association in 1870, are both of them full of valuable matter, and from the last we cannot help extracting, for the benefit of the member for Burnley, the passage in which Professor Jevons compares the policy of further reducing taxation with the policy of paying-off Debt. This is what Professor Jevons says,—and it is, we venture to think, almost as applicable to the year 1883 as it was to the year 1870:—

"But I venture to raise another question. I doubt whether the remission of taxation does as much good at the present day as it would at a future time. There are comparatively few signs that the wages of the working-classes, even when sufficient, are saved and applied really to advance the condition of the recipients. All is expended in a higher scale of living, so that little permanent benefit results; and when bad trade comes again, there is as much distress as ever. It is only with the increase of education and temperance that the increase of wages will prove a solid advantage. Thus, when the really hurtful taxes are removed, it by no means follows that the further remission of taxes leads to the profitable expenditure of income. The money may be spent in a way far more profitable to the whole nation than it will be spent by those whose taxes are remitted. I am glad, on this and many other accounts, that the propriety of reducing the National Debt is beginning to be very generally recognised. The question was ably raised by Mr. Lambert during the recent Session, and both in the House of Commons and in the newspaper press many strong opinions were expressed in favour of reduction. In fact, there was almost a general feeling that Mr. Lowe's small measure of reduction was altogether inconsiderable, compared with our opportunities and the greatness of the task before us. During every interval of peace we ought to clear off the charges incurred during the previous war, otherwise we commit the serious error of charging to capital that which should be borne by income. If a railway company needs periodically to renew its works, and charges all the cost to capital, it must eventually become insolvent; so if at intervals we require to maintain the safety and independence of this country or its possessions by war, and do it all by borrowed money, we throw the whole cost of our advantage upon posterity. If, indeed, one great war could free us from all future danger, we might capitalise the cost and leave it as a perpetual mortgage upon the property of the country; but if the effect of any war wears out, and we are liable to be involved in new wars at intervals, then we cannot fairly or safely go on adding perpetually to the mortgage upon the national property. The wars at the commencement of this century have secured for us fifty years or more of nearly unbroken peace, and yet at the end of this period of ever-advancing wealth, the great Debt stands almost at the same figure as at the commencement. We enjoy the peace, and leave our descendants to pay its cost."

No doubt, the working-classes have learned something since 1870, and do save a larger proportion of any addition to their wages than they did then. On the other hand, it is still true that the greater portion of any relief that might be granted to them in the shape of diminished taxation would be expended in a higher scale of living, and our subsequent experience has rendered it more certain than ever that "we are liable to be involved in new wars at intervals," so that "we cannot fairly or safely go on adding perpetually to the mortgage on the national property," and therefore that it is simply wrong for us "to enjoy the peace and leave our descendants to pay its cost."

Another impressive paper is that on "Married Women in Factories," in which the evils arising from the fact that the mothers of children leave them in the care of others, while they themselves attend the factory, are very powerfully stated. We feel, however, the greatest doubt whether the remedy which Professor Jevons proposes might not result in evils greater than those which now exist. We fear that so long as there continue to be so many mothers wholly unscrupulous as to the duties of mothers, no law which disqualified them for working in factories while their children are infants would answer the purpose required. It is but too certain that even as it is, criminal means are not unfrequently found of evading the burden and expense of children, and we fear that the remedy suggested by Professor Jevons would result in multiplying the use of these criminal means. The truth is that moral and spiritual influences alone can remove moral and spiritual evils, and we should feel the greatest uneasiness lest any serious attempt to bring home the responsibilities of parental life to unworthy parents might only end in the way one would expect, when one adds greatly to the temptations to evil, without adding to the amount of moral force by which evil is resisted.

There is not a paper in this volume from which even those who differ most from its conclusions will not derive great instruction; and we may add that, serious as most of the subjects are, they are treated with a lucidity and force which make these papers anything but dry reading to those who have really studied the subjects treated. In Professor Jevons's early death, the world has suffered a very grievous loss.

THE LIFE OF EDWARD HENRY PALMER.*

WE cannot bestow on this Life all the praise lavished on it by some of our contemporaries. It is an interesting book all through, in parts even a brilliant book, but it is not a good biography. Of all that Professor Edward Henry Palmer, Orientalist, author, and explorer, did, of all that he learned, of all that he wrote, and of most things that he appeared to his contemporaries to be, we have the fullest account in the pleasantest words; but of what he was, absolutely nothing at all. There are no letters in the book, except some half-official from Suez, very few memoranda of conversations, and no indications whatever of the inner life. The Professor lived half his life at Cambridge and half among Orientals, and know about the latter, their minds, their ways, and their interests more perhaps than any European; but of what he thought of them, whether he approved or disapproved, loved or hated them, we never obtain one glimpse. For those who trust this biography, Mr. Palmer's endless knowledge of languages, his sympathetic study of men, his patient and laborious investigation into facts, produce absolutely nothing except a certain childlike wonder that one man could know all that he evidently knew. Of the knowledge there is no doubt. Mr. Besant is faithful to his friend, and piles up evidence on evidence proving that his reputation was not artificial, that he was an exceptional Orientalist, that learned Asiatics held him their equal or superior, that Arabs of the Desert and Arabs of the city, Arabs of Sinai and Arabs of Algeria alike took him to be in some sort a compatriot. A "Turco," or Arab soldier, in Paris, abused him for wearing the European dress, when he was a Moslem; the gipsies thought him a gipsy masquerading as a gentleman; Indians wondered how a mere Western could have acquired all their learning. But of the thoughts this knowledge, so wide and deep, had brought him, of the convictions it had induced, of the mental nature it had modified, we hear nothing whatever. We see him only as in a looking-glass. It would be impossible to gather from this book an idea of Professor Palmer's creed, of his politics, of his view of society or morals, of human duties and obligations, of any mental acquisition, in fact, by which other men might be benefited and improved. Even of himself we learn comparatively little. We know that he was small, but hardy, very brave, and with the power of making himself felt, with a gift for the rapid acquisition of tongues, with unusual power of rapid literary work, with a turn for dexterous manipulation such as conjurors possess, and with great attractiveness for all whom he liked or came into intimate converse with; but his mind, the ultimate drift of his ideas, is never revealed to us. Was he even a thoughtful man? We know that he had a childlike faculty of enjoyment, that he was humorous as well as learned, with a humour which had in it a trace of farce, and that he could neither keep money nor arrange his pecuniary affairs; but still, of him as a whole man we know little. To the question, What did he do? the reply is complete and satisfactory; but to the question, What did he think about any of his multifarious subjects? there is no answer. He translated the Koran and other Oriental classics, he studied secret sects, he knew much of many creeds, but of his religious faith we could not give a notion beyond a guess, which is only based on an impression, that he was a convinced Theist, who thought most beliefs, possibly all beliefs, mental phenomena. He passed his life in the effort to comprehend Orientals, and succeeded in that task beyond all men,—succeeded till he could make of himself a Oriental; but of what he thought about Orientals, and the distinction between them and Westerns, we know, and from this book can know, nothing. Of his relation to his fellow-creatures, we hear little. Mr. Besant observes en passant that his hero did not love them very much, but was interested in them with a kind of watchful wonder; but what was the cause of this wondering?

The Professor was mesmerist and conjuror, and at one time a spiritualist, and one of those men who are quick to examine any pretension to occult knowledge; but whether he thought this branch of inquiry worth pursuing, we have no means of telling. Mr. Besant thinks he despised the whole subject, but he gives no evidence of this, he only guesses the reasons for his hero's careful silence; he acknowledges that he was a mesmerist of the higher kind—he once, for example, sent a girl in a trance to a hospital a mile away, to submit to a painful operation, a story opening up illimitable possibilities as to mental influence—and he quotes no final or intelligible opinion.

Even of his character we are left in some doubt. Mr. Besant praises his friend on every page, quite justly by the consent of all who knew him, but he rarely proves his good qualities, except his entire disinterestedness about money, and it is not our fault if we gather that he was at bottom somewhat unscrupulous, especially as to accuracy of statement. He would invent a firman, if necessary, he would tell stories that create at least doubt, and he would carry mystification beyond the permissible. Does not Mr. Besant himself mean that he was a little unscrupulous when he repeats, à propos of some wonderful stories, that it is necessary to remember that Professor Palmer was a very clever man? The view may be most unfair, and may even seem brutal, when we recollect that Professor Palmer died for his country, and is still unrewarded; but we rise from the account of him with a feeling that he was more like Donatello, like Margrave, like any hero of fiction, with wonderful gifts, but with the soul left out, than any real person of whom we ever read.

The son of a small tradesman of Cambridge, Mr. Palmer showed from the first the tastes which distinguished him in after-life. As a mere boy he acquired Romany, the gipsy tongue, so perfectly, that throughout life the Gipsies believed him to be a man of their tribe; and as a clerk in Eastcheap, doing the dock business of his firm, he spent his whole leisure and spare silver in cafés, picking up French and Italian in all its dialects. He had for all words a cloudless memory, he possessed that mimetic faculty essential to easy speech in a foreign tongue, and he had profound confidence in his own power:—

“‘Either you want to learn a language,’ he would say, ‘or you do not. If you do not, follow the way of the English schools, and you will succeed. If, however, you do—’—and here he would go on to explain how it should first be studied without the grammar, and with the intention of acquiring, to begin with, the most important part of the actual vocabulary; how languages, being in groups, present vocabularies which, with certain variations, are common property; how inflections, suffixes, and so forth, also resemble each other, and therefore come quite easily to the man who has begun with the words, so that in learning simply how to read a tongue, without opening anything more than a dictionary, you acquire insensibly a vast amount of grammar and a great quantity of syntax. The true reason, he always insisted, of the really brilliant failure to teach modern languages which distinguishes our schools is that we only approach them by the aid of grammars modelled after the Latin and Greek manner, and that we mistake the teaching of inflection and syntax for that of language. Any intelligent person, Palmer maintained, can learn to read a language in a few weeks, and to speak it in a few months, unless it be his first attempt at an Oriental language.”

When forced in 1859 by ill-health to return to Cambridge, where, though an orphan, he had an aunt with money, he made the acquaintance of Syud Abdullah, then teaching Indian languages, and thenceforward devoted himself to Oriental study. He learned Urdu till his letters were the delight of native editors and scholars in India; Persian, till Professor Cowell, a master of that tongue, declared his vocabulary “exhaustless;” Arabic, till he could render old Arabic with the original swinging rhythm, and could talk modern Arabic till the Bedaween half believed him a kinsman, and men like Garcin de Tassy and Stanley Lane Poole expressed utter “wonder” at his acquirements. The Engineers who surveyed Palestine trusted him in the incredibly difficult task of ascertaining and verifying the Arab names for places, and their relation to the Hebrew names, and he explored the “Desert of the Wanderings” as it has never been explored yet. He hoped, after his labours, to be made Professor of Arabic in Cambridge, but the Heads of Houses found he had only taken a third-class in Classics, they thought him a bit of a Bohemian, and they passed him over, in favour of a man quite worthy, but an outsider—an affront he never forgave. Fortunately, the Dean of Windsor, Dean Wellesley, who then, as Queen’s Almoner, held the patronage, gave him the Lord Almoner’s Professorship of Arabic, and this, though it yielded only £40 a year, enabled him to keep his Fellowship after marriage. He married at once, and a year after the University increased his income by £250. He did much work besides, some of it splendid work, though he was too rapid, and might have been prosperous, but he could not keep money; he was unlucky in his wife’s health, which drove her to gentler climates, and he had, from the moment he was passed over, a distaste for Cambridge. After his wife’s death, he assigned his income to creditors, came up to London, and was gradually acquiring a place in journalism when he was asked by Lord Northbrook, on the part of the Government, to perform a dangerous service, for which there was no other fit man. He was to go to the Desert of Sinai, and persuade the Sheikhs, who might have brought 50,000 men to the aid of Arabi, to sit quiet, and if necessary, to engage them to protect the Canal. He had no written instructions, but he knew precisely what to do, and he rode into the Desert as the wealthy Sheikh Abdullah, the friend of the Beni Ismail, and, at the price of much suffering, contrived to see and convince the leading Sheikhs. During a ride of days through the Desert, he so conciliated the leading Sheikhs that they agreed to desert Arabi, to remain quiet, to protect the Canal, and if it were threatened by the Nile tribes, to attack them with fifty thousand men. Palmer returned to Suez on August 1st, 1882, supremely successful in his mission, to find himself appointed interpreter-in-chief to her Majesty’s Forces in Egypt, and authorised to draw on the Government for any expenses, and furnished with £20,000. It was characteristic that he was ordered to fix his salary, but could not attend to such a detail. After a short rest, he set out again with Captain Gill to buy camels, taking with him £3,000. He was misled by a treacherous guide, and attacked and murdered by a party of Arabs, either anxious for the money, or, as Mr. Besant believes, acting under superior orders, transmitted through the Governor of Nakhl from Constantinople. The whole party were taken to the edge of a deep ravine, and shot down. So perished a man of high attainments, who fascinated his friends, and who was enabled in the last year of his life to perform a grand service for his country, which, as yet, has not been adequately acknowledged. We trust for the sake of justice that the omission will be recognised, and that, moreover, the best of the Professor’s work, including his very striking and original poetical efforts, will yet be given to the world in a collected form. He was a man of rare gifts.

THERE are occasions when a critic’s duty becomes as simple as it is pleasant, and the present is a case in point. This book is indeed a delightful one, and this assertion can be made without hesitancy or limitation; nor does this refer alone to the illustrations with which Mr. Caldecott has enriched the volume. The paper, the printing, the binding, the reproduction of the drawings are all alike simple and efficient, pretty and appropriate. In fact, the whole get-up of the book is exactly what it should be for its subject, and a special word of praise is due to Mr. J. D. Cooper, who has engraved the artist’s drawings with wonderful spirit, and apparently perfect fidelity. Says the translator, who is a brother of the artist, “The translations aim at replacing the florid style of our older English versions, and the stilted harshness of more modern ones, by a plainness and terseness more nearly like the character of the original,” and in this we think he has certainly succeeded. Compare, for instance, the two versions of the fable, “The Fox and the Crow,” the first from Bewick’s Æsop, the second from Mr. Caldecott’s:—

“A Crow, having taken a piece of cheese out of a cottage window, flew up into a high tree with it, in order to eat it; which a Fox observing, came and sat underneath, and began to compliment the Crow upon the subject of her beauty. ‘I protest,’ says he, ‘I never observed it before, but your feathers are of a more delicate white than any that I ever saw in my life! Ah, what a fine shape and graceful turn of body is there; and I make no question but you have a tolerable voice! If it is but as fine as your complexion, I do not know a bird that can pretend to stand in competition with you.’ The Crow, tickled with this very civil language, nestled and wriggled about, and hardly knew where she was; but thinking the Fox a little dubious as to the particular of her voice, and having a mind to set him right in that matter, began to sing, and in the same instant let the cheese drop out of her mouth. This being what the Fox wanted, he chopped it up in a moment and trotted away, laughing to himself at the easy credulity of the Crow.”

And this:—

“A Crow stole a piece of cheese, and alighted with it on a tree. A Fox watched her, and wishing to get hold of the cheese, stood underneath and began to make compliments upon her size and beauty; he went so far as to say that she had the best of claims to be made Queen of the Birds, and doubtless it would have been done, if she had only a voice. The Crow, anxious to prove to him that she did possess a voice, began to caw vigorously, of course dropping the cheese. The fox pounced upon it and carried it off, remarking, as he went away, ‘My good friend Crow, you have every good quality; now try to get some common-sense.’”

* Some of Æsop’s Fables. By Randolph Caldecott. London: Macmillan and Co.

We have selected this instance, simply as the first that came to hand; but it we think justifies Mr. Caldecott's claim to superior terseness and vigour.

The chief point, however, of this new version of the Fables, consists of the modern instances which the artist has appended to the text. These are given without a word of explanation, and translated into terms of human life, the story which has been told by beast or bird. Thus in regard to the fable of "The Fox and Crow," we have after the first design representing the actual fable, two illustrations showing us its modern application. The first of these depicts a drawing-room, in which a stout, good-natured mother is keeping watch over a pretty daughter, who sits by her side on the sofa. Eagerly bending forward to speak to these, is a young man, dressed in the height of fashion, who is evidently persuading the mother to exercise what musical talent she possesses. In the next drawing, we see the elderly lady screaming her hardest at the piano, whilst the young man is kissing the daughter as hard as he can. This modern instance is simple and banal enough in the description, but the little brown-ink outlines in which it is shown, are full of real wit and originality; and those who care to notice what a really fine, expressional artist Mr. Caldecott is, should look carefully at the drawing of the young man's hand in the first of these two sketches. The left hand helps to explain the complimentary speech with regard to the mother's music, and the right says as plainly as can be, "Well, there is the piano quite ready, won't you give us one song?"

All, of course, are not equally good, but all are excessively funny, and it is no mere figure of speech to say, that as much genuine drollery has hardly ever been compressed into so few lines of illustration. Mr. Caldecott's essential strength is the evidence of his sympathy, which not only embraces and understands the brute creation, but also has a strong hold on the characteristics of mankind. It is very rare in any form of literature or art, to find a man who is capable of seeing the funny side, at the same time that he perceives the qualities of beauty; and it is the possession of this faculty which makes our artist's work so especially delightful. The drawings in this book are as graceful as those of Mr. Walter Crane, and infinitely better drawn; whilst the fun, though it borders upon the satirical, rather than the purely humorous, is as true as one of Hood's poems. Take as a last illustration, the fable of "The Man and his Two Wives," which we shall be, perhaps, excused for quoting in its entirety:—

"A man whose hair was turning gray had two wives, one young and the other old. The elderly woman felt ashamed at being married to a man younger than herself, and made it a practice whenever he was with her to pick out all his black hairs; while the younger, anxious to conceal the fact that she had an elderly husband, used similarly to pull out the gray ones. So, between them, it ended in the man being completely plucked, and becoming bald."

The first illustration to this fable shows us the unfortunate husband sadly contemplating the bald pate to which his wives have reduced him; and the modern instance depicts an unfortunate artist, who has fallen flat on the floor of his studio between a classic statue, labelled "The Ideal," and one of a modern young lady in tennis costume, labelled "The Real;" whilst in front of him is a smudged canvas, described as "The Namby-pamby."

It is useless to multiply descriptions of these drawings, and we can only conclude by reiterating our statement, that this is emphatically a good book.

EARLY LONDON.*

A WORK which purports to contain the history of the "greatest city the world has ever seen," in two volumes of some 850 octavo pages in all, of which 100 are taken up with lists of names, is not one which could easily be (to borrow an adverb from Mr. Ruskin, and an epithet from Mr. Matthew Arnold), "entirely adequate." But of all recent books on the subject—on the early part, at least—Mr. Loftie's, perhaps, most nearly approaches to adequateness. The second volume, which deals with "Greater London," is, partly from the nature of the topics, rather scrappy. But the first volume, which deals with the City itself, is an excellent summary of the early history of the City, and forms a valuable contribution to the literature of historical London. The author has evidently availed himself of all the latest researches which bear upon his subject, and has himself resorted to the fountain-head of original documents, instead of merely following the streams of second-hand authorities. He consequently writes with freshness, vigour, and clearness. His chapters on what one may call the making of London are perhaps equal, in point of style and interest, to Mr. Green's Making of England, to which writer he gratefully acknowledges his indebtedness. But the upshot of the latest researches in the early history of London before the times of Edward the Confessor, is that very little is really known about it. The old stock beginning of histories would adequately describe that of London,—"Its origin is shrouded in the mists of antiquity." The topographer, the etymologist, and the archaeologist can reconstruct London for us, as Professor Owen from a few fragments of bones reconstructs an extinct animal; but of story proper, Mr. Loftie has to confess that he is very much in the position of the needy knife-grinder, and has none to tell. But, happily, he is strong as a topographer and an antiquarian, and has apparently resorted to good sources for his etymology. The map called "London before the Houses," which prefaces the first volume, is fully justified in the text, and brings before the reader a striking picture of the original "Lake-fort," which the geologist and the etymologist combine with the topographer and the antiquarian to assure us was the origin of London. Its early history was like that of Rome,—the growth of a "fortified cattle pen," and pirate den, happily situate on hills close to a navigable stream and natural harbour, guarded by morass and forest on the land side, into a busy mart of foreign merchants.

Mr. Loftie withholds his belief from the old legends about Roman London. He refuses to recognise the bronze statue said to represent Diana as an argument for the existence of a Roman temple on the site of St. Paul's, and equally denies that any vestiges have been found of Romano-British churches. "In the arts of house decoration, the Londoners" of that time, not unlike those of the present, "were fairly advanced, but the rooms they occupied were miserably small," and this though they were in scattered villas, surrounded at a late period of Roman occupation by a wall, the date of which is not known. "All we know is that in 350 London had no wall, and in 369 the wall existed." From that year to the year 609, a blank of two centuries and a half exists in the annals of London, broken only by the statement that in 457 the British fugitives from the terrible battle of Crayford took refuge within the walls. Then London, as a town, ceased to exist. The Britons were unable to defend its walls, the English despised them. When London appears again on the scene, it is as the seat of a Bishop and a King, who was appointed by the Kings of Kent to preside over the East Saxons, who occupied London. From that time its name reappears at intervals, not as the capital of an independent kingdom, but as a port subject to the predominant power, Kentish, Mercian, Northumbrian, West Saxon, or Dane, as the case may be.

Not until the days of Alfred, in 884, did it really become of importance in English history, but from that time the "area" enclosed in the circuit of the old Roman walls, "loosely" as the population "fitted into it," became practically (pace the author who objects to the title) the "capital" of England, and its citizens for many a long year the arbiters of her destinies. Indeed, until the last half-century, the cause which had the City of London on its side was pretty certain to be the cause which conquered.

Not that the City was never a house divided against itself; on the contrary, the internal history of the City is a story of continual strife, the leading features of which are well and fairly drawn by Mr. Loftie. The City magnates, like their compeers beyond the walls, though they took the side of liberty against the Crown, were no less anxious to keep up their own petty tyrannies. There was probably some sort of struggle, before the government of the City was transferred from hereditary and territorial aldermen, with their probably independent "Sokes," to the centralised Merchants' Guild. The tale of the later struggle between the Merchants' Guild and the Crafts' Guilds can be told with more or less detail. It was part of a general movement, which took place at one time or another in all the cities of England and Europe, and is amply illustrated in the pages of Professor Stubbs and in Brentano's celebrated essay. It was the mediæval form of the perennial struggle between oligarchy and democracy, between privileged classes and the multitude, between the rich and the poor. It ended, as such struggles always end, in the victory of the many against the few, and the triumph of the workers with their hands, the craftsmen of the City Companies, over the old oligarchic families of merchants and shipowners and landowners. The revolution did not take place without bloodshed, whether on the field of battle of Cheapside, or on the gibbet. Happily, though, for the city, the struggle within was contemporaneous with that without, and the life of Simon de Montfort runs parallel with that of Thomas FitzThomas. The final and definitive establishment of the powers of Parliament coincides with the final victory of the City Companies, when Edward III. enrolled himself amongst the Livery Armourers.

But no sooner had the revolution been consummated than the old quarrels broke out anew. The old oligarchy became members of the new Companies. The Companies themselves became exclusive bodies, and tried to control those outside and to monopolise civic power as their predecessors had done. The Court of Aldermen became practically co-optative, and the elections to the Common Council and to the great City offices became matters of dispute between the liverymen of the Companies and the commonalty of the City, and were banded about between them, until the constitution was settled on its present basis, in 1475,—an important event, of which, by the way, Mr. Loftie takes hardly any notice. How it is that since that time the constitution of the Corporation has remained almost unchanged, he attempts no explanation. Probably it is because, with the end of the Wars of the Roses, England became a civilised country. The wealthier citizens began, with the accession of Henry VII., to spread into the country, and having attained wealth, retired from business and merged themselves in the country nobility and gentry, instead of forming an aristocratic class in the City itself. There was, therefore, a constant influx of new blood into the ranks of the Corporation office-bearers, and the elections being placed on a democratic basis, there was no sharp line of demarcation between one class of citizens and another. Indeed, of late years the complaint has been that the City magnates have been too little, and not too much, drawn from the "upper" classes. An oligarchy has, indeed, been formed, but it is one of locality and business, instead of blood and wealth. It is, in fact, an oligarchy, but not an aristocracy. Why this oligarchy of place exists Mr. Loftie does attempt to explain. According to him, the City was anxious to extend itself, but could not, because of the opposition of the lords of the surrounding manors, who were jealous of their power and privileges. But this explanation is hardly borne out by the facts. For he himself shows that when the City did try to extend its boundary to include part of what is now "Farringdon Ward Without," at the expense of the Abbot of Westminster, it was able to do so; and by a decree of the Archbishop of Canterbury in 1222, it was also enabled to extend itself towards Temple Bar. Moreover, as late as 1550 Southwark was granted to the City, and was at first, according to the finding of the Municipal Corporations Commission in 1837, an integral part of the City, being a separate ward, electing its own alderman, in the same manner as the other wards of the City. But in 1557 this right was abolished, and Southwark has since been ruled by the Corporation as a Crown colony is governed by the Colonial Office. The true explanation would seem to be that the City was willing to extend its jurisdiction, but not its privileges. It was agreeable to taxing the suburbs as it taxes them now by the coal and wine duties, but it was not willing to share with them its electoral rights, its self-government, nor, above all, its trading immunities.

On this last point, and on trade generally, Mr. Loftie hardly dwells enough. We hear too little of the Steel-yard, of the Jewries, Old and New, of the Lombards, of the Wool Staple, of the Merchant Adventurers, of the growth of Lloyd's, of the City markets, and of the gradual dying-out of the exclusive privileges of trading which formed so prominent a feature of old London life. His answer would, no doubt, be that we cannot have everything. But then he might well have spared us the concluding chapters of both volumes, which deal respectively with the City Corporation and the "Metropolitan Area," as they now are, and with many incidental passages which not only show a want of appreciation of the true lessons to be drawn from history, but also a want of knowledge of fact. When he tells us, for instance, that the new Law Courts are partly within the City boundary, and that, therefore, it is possible to transfer business to them from the Guildhall, he is at issue with the City itself and the Lord Chancellor, who had to invoke the aid of an Act of Parliament, an Order in Council, and a Note of the Common Council to effect the change. So, too, he is making a blunder when he says that the "day census" refused by Parliament was carried into effect under a measure of the Common Council, as though under compulsory power. The day census, such as it was, was taken under exactly the same powers as Mr. Loftie might himself have employed, if he had chosen to take at his own expense a census of the precinct of the Savoy; that is to say, that the returns were purely voluntary, and therefore not improbably inaccurate. The study of the history of London and its suburbs, as told by Mr. Loftie, shows us, if it shows anything, the superior efficacy and stability of democratic government and institutions, and is the strongest possible argument for the extension to the inhabitants of London in general (he will not allow us to say "metropolis") of the advantages now enjoyed by a constantly diminishing population in its central area. "The most extraordinary thing about this vast area," he says, "is the looseness of its governing system. . . . As a matter of fact, nine-tenths of the dwellers cannot distinguish between the Metropolitan Board of Works and the Board of Works, which is a department of the Government of the country, and used to be known as the 'Woods and Forests,' a title too picturesque for the present age." The wonderful inaccuracy of this last statement of a matter of fact on which any almanack would put him right, rather throws doubts on the general accuracy of Mr. Loftie as a historian. The Board of Works is not called the "Board of Works," but the "Office of Works." The "Woods and Forests" has not been found too picturesque a title for the Office of "Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues," which Mr. Loftie would quickly make acquaintance with, if he were to set to work to cut turf in the New Forest. It is clear that Mr. Loftie is not "up" in the current history of his own times, and it is a pity, therefore, that he should have disfigured his book by misleading statements and shallow essays on current politics, which, to say the least, are out of place.

SOME one has recently stated it to be his opinion that the fund of possible novel-incidents is now exhausted, and that the world must henceforth be contented with an altered and less eventful style of fiction than that which it has hitherto enjoyed. Against this doctrine we protest energetically, believing incidents to be so essential to the success of the average novel as to make it better to introduce the stalest and most hackneyed, than to have none at all. We do not deny that there is often a good deal of sameness about them; yet they are almost always saved from being altogether monotonous by the endlessly varying individualities of the narrators,—for how seldom do two people give an exactly similar account of any occurrence that they may both have witnessed! But though diversity of treatment may make the same incident readable over and over again, and even impart freshness to it, yet a story where there is no incident at all runs an alarming chance of being dull. Of course, this does not apply to the works of first-rate authors; for instance, George Sand's idyllic tale, La Petite Fadette, is, perhaps, one of the most charming ever written. If a writer is very humorous, or can draw a character remarkable enough to be worth reading about, or has some unusual story-telling spell which arrests the attention, then he may safely dispense with the time-honoured methods for exciting and keeping up the interest of readers; but otherwise, it is imprudent of him to do so. Just as a great genius might manage to make a beautiful picture out of a stagnant duck-pond, which would never look anything but ugly and common-place if painted by an inferior artist, so an exceptionally gifted writer may render highly interesting a story that would be intolerably dreary if related by a more ordinary mortal. Geniuses, however, are the exception, and not the rule; and when the average author rashly attempts to imitate them in producing a book without anything eventful in it, the result is very apt to be that he is prosy—one of the most fatal errors that a novelist can commit, since the majority of us are of the same mind as Lord Macaulay, when he said, "To me, a book that is not amusing wants one of the highest recommendations."

The views just expressed, however, are not those of Miss Robinson, judging by the book now before us. It contains hardly anything that can be called an incident, in the sense in which the term is generally employed, and seems to us to suffer considerably from that deficiency. The heroine has a toothache, goes to a strange chemist to pull the tooth out, faints in his shop after the operation, and then the hero arrives, just in time to relieve the chemist's alarm, sit by her till she recovers, and drive her home. Again, she gets into difficulties when picking flowers in a muddy place, and he extricates her, by means of an old hurdle. These are about the most exciting scenes described, and however cleverly and prettily told, are evidently not of a very thrilling nature. The reader's pulses beat no quicker than before, even when he finds that sal-volatile failed to recover the lady from her swoon; and we defy the most nervous of mortals to get up any anxiety on the score of her rescue from the mud, nasty and black as it is,—aye, and with even a hint thrown in of possible leeches lurking amongst the reed and lily-roots at the bottom! The heroine who undergoes these fearful perils, Arden, is a motherless girl, who passes the first seventeen years of her life in Rome with her father, amongst artists and travellers; and then, at his death, is suddenly uprooted and transplanted to an English farm, where existence is a most bucolic and humdrum affair. She is "a person tenacious in affection, dense of perception, subject to an unimaginative, practical, but all-pervading dreaminess." Unimaginative, practical dreaminess being a state of mind extremely difficult to realise, and therefore liable to remove its owner out of range of the sympathies of ordinary people, the heroine appears, perhaps, less delightful than she might do if she were more easily comprehensible; and however practical her dreaminess may have been, her behaviour in real life is not particularly distinguished by that quality, as a rule. For all that, she is a good, well-meaning girl, and very fairly interesting. Directly after her arrival at the farm, the hero sees and is smitten by her. He does not seem at first sight a very suitable mate for a well-educated, lady-like, refined young woman, because he is an unpolished farmer, with somewhat of the loutish country bumpkin about him. But on farther acquaintance he proves to be such a thoroughly good fellow, that one has to gulp down one's sense of what is naturally fitting, and feel that it is all right when he marries her. Her real love for her husband does not prevent her from moping after marriage and pining for the old Italian life, till she is suddenly brightened up by a visit from a young man with whom she had been intimate since childhood. He had not heard she was married, was come with a view of proposing to her himself, and is consequently much taken aback at the existing state of affairs. The sight of him recalls former happy days in Italy, and makes her brisk-up immediately and become her old self again. This sudden alteration, and her innocent pleasure in the society of a man who is her equal in position, and in love with her (though she is ignorant of the latter fact), naturally troubles the poor rustic husband's mind. Finally, there comes a catastrophe of a rather peculiar kind, wherein a man struck by sunstroke or apoplexy, either of which illnesses is generally supposed to take almost instantaneous effect on the brain, manages after the stroke to walk sensibly up to his house, assemble the household around him, deliberately harangue them, and read them his will, before he falls dead.

It appears to us that the book is an attempt at an idyl by an author whose powers are inadequate to the task. Yet, notwithstanding the foregoing criticisms upon it, we think that it shows considerable merit and promise, more especially in the part which gives a picture of the rustic lover wooing and winning a girl who is superior to him in birth, breeding, and education, and twenty-three years his junior. Whether he would have succeeded in overcoming these obstacles in real life may be doubted, but, at all events, he does it gracefully and well in the story. The best of the other characters are three Americans named Rose, who have a distinctly marked national flavour; they are clever and agreeable in a way, though restless, superficial, and too practical, and are sufficiently amusing to make them welcome whenever they appear on the scene. Indeed, they have latent potentialities which Miss Robinson might well have developed more than she has done. Ellie Rose, in particular, hard, selfish, worldly, quick of perception, and shallow of feeling, agreeable, and ready to make mischief whenever it is to her interest to do so, is a young woman who might probably have done great things in the Becky-Sharp line; it seems quite a pity to see so little made of such talents as she possessed. Several of the other people represented are of no importance to the story, and would therefore have been better omitted,—for a superfluous person in a novel is like a needless piece in a chess problem, serving merely to confuse and distract the attention from more important considerations.

THE FAMILY OF GEORGE III.*

THE title of this book would lead an ordinary reader to expect an account of the sons and daughters of George III., but any one who has enjoyed the privilege of making acquaintance with Mr. Fitzgerald's previous works will be prepared for something more extensive. Accordingly, after hearing something about George II. and his sons, we have considerably more than a hundred pages of description and anecdote relating to George III. and his wife. All this is sufficiently amusing, but Mr. Fitzgerald has nothing new to tell us. He goes to familiar authorities for his facts, and contributes little of his own but an arrangement which is not always felicitous, and a criticism which is not always just. We have, for instance, eight pages of continuous quotation from Miss Burney. Now, Miss Burney's account of her life at Court is not difficult of access, and most people would prefer to read it for themselves, notwithstanding what Mr. Fitzgerald calls her "foolish affectations about the way she was treated, and her coquetries to the equeries and every one she met."

It is not till we reach page 155 that, the King being disposed of, we find the author promising that he will now "pass on to a more particular account of the Royal Dukes and Princesses." But this promise is not immediately fulfilled. The first chapter of Book ii. is devoted to the melancholy story of Caroline Matilda of Denmark; the second to the marriage of the Duke of Cumberland (the King's brother), and the claims of the so-called "Princess Olive" and her daughter, Mrs. Ryves; and the third to the marriage of the Duke of Gloucester with Lady Waldegrave, and to an account of the life and death of Edward, Duke of York (the King's brother), a personage of whom a contemporary says that "his private conversation was as weak and low as his person was contemptible." He died in 1767, being "not thirty years of age," as Mr. Fitzgerald vaguely puts it (his eldest brother the King was but just thirty in that year). Vagueness and confusion, indeed, we encounter continually in these pages. A ludicrous instance occurs in the account of this Prince. We read on p. 213:—

"The Prince of Monaco showed the greatest feeling, putting all his Court, officers, servants, even the bells, in mourning, and having cannon fired every half-hour till the Duke's remains were put on board. A magnificent present of horses was sent to him from the Court of England in gratitude. It was curious that, like Goldsmith and many more, he carried his devotion to 'James's Powders' to the extent of imperilling his life."

This ought to mean that the Prince of Monaco was one of the devotees to the famous powders. But even Mr. Fitzgerald could not be so irrelevant as to tell us this à propos of his "Royal Dukes and Princesses," and we are obliged to do violence to the text by referring the statement to Prince Edward.

At last, on p. 217, we get to Book iii., and "The Princesses." The author, aware, perhaps, of his characteristic failing, plunges at once in medias res. He does not even give us a list of these august ladies in the order of their age, but begins with the illness and death of the Princess Amelia. Her alleged marriage with General Fitzroy is dismissed in three or four lines. Then we are introduced to the Princess Royal, afterwards Queen of Württemberg. Of course, the opportunity of telling the story of the mysterious disappearance of her husband's first wife is not to be neglected, and we have several pages devoted to it. Of the Princesses themselves, we really hear very little. We do not even get an idea of their personal appearance. Mr. Fitzgerald's utterances on this subject are, to say the least, obscure. On p. 303, we read "that six such young and unattractive women (with the exception of the Princess Royal) had been studiously kept till they had grown elderly without any attempt at arranging marriages for them, was extraordinary;" and on p. 312, "the last survivor of these Princesses, who impressed their contemporaries as 'fine, handsome young women,' was this Princess [Augusta], who died unmarried, September 22nd, 1840." That they were young, at one time at least, Mr. Fitzgerald seems tolerably certain, but about the beauty he is evidently much in doubt.

Book iv. brings another digression. The "English reader" would find, we are told, some account of the House of Brunswick "specially interesting," and he must not be disappointed. Accordingly, we get, among other things, the unedifying story of Duke Charles, the eccentric benefactor of Geneva; and a quantity of details, which might very well have been spared, about the peculiarities of Caroline, Princess of Wales. Book v., "The Princess Charlotte," may be allowed to be relevant, though it contains little with which most readers will not be perfectly familiar. Still, Mr. Fitzgerald has taken pains to collect some interesting details about the Princess's life, especially about her early days. We are particularly obliged to him for a curious document which he has quoted on pp. 31-5 of Vol. II. The death of the Princess left the succession to the English Crown in a very strange situation. The Royal Marriage Act had effectually hindered the birth of legitimate heirs to the Throne. The Prince Regent and the Duke of York, the first and second in succession, were childless. Then came five unmarried brothers, the youngest of whom was forty-three; then, again, five Princesses, the eldest of whom was widowed and childless, the rest unmarried, the youngest being forty years of age. The Duke of Gloucester, great-grandson of George II., was childless; and his sister, the Princess Sophia, unmarried. After these came Prince Charles of Brunswick, who might have reigned over the country in which he afterwards contrived to acquire a peculiarly sinister reputation. It is interesting to find in the succession another distinguished personage who has since achieved notoriety, if not fame. "Jerome Napoleon, aged three," son of Frederica Catherine of Württemberg and Jerome Buonaparte," is no other than the "Pretender" who has lately been fluttering the Republican doves across the Channel. Englishmen, with the memories of the Napoleonic wars fresh upon them, could not have been pleased to think that the crown might possibly come to so near a relative of the "Corsican monster," the "indigenous devil," as one of the Princesses calls him, by way of ingenious contrast with the "fallen archangel" Satan. This "stemma Georgiorum," far more intricate than the "stemma Cæsarum" which encounters the students of the history of the Roman Empire, is the most interesting thing in the book. There is a quite surprising list of persons, some of them anything but desirable, who stood in the line of succession.

In Books vi.-x., we have Mr. Fitzgerald's account of the "Royal Dukes," among whom he includes their cousin, the second Duke of Gloucester. This account is fairly just, and, being just, is naturally not a narrative which can be read with pleasure. That the Duke of York did something for the comfort of the private soldier may be allowed, though his re-appointment as Commander-in-Chief after the frightful Clarke scandal, and the erection of a column in his honour, show a state of public feeling which it is now difficult to understand. We can only conclude that our grandfathers had a way of looking at these things which was very different from ours. The Duke of York, after all, was better than his elder brother, to whom, as many a visitor to the sea-side has read with astonishment, the town of Ramsgate erected a costly obelisk, in recognition of his "gracious condescension" in selecting that port as his point of departure for Hanover, and of whom some local scholar wrote, in elegant Latinity, "Sui unice colunt, venerantur externi."

The most interesting of these memoirs is naturally that of the Queen's father, the Duke of Kent, an unlucky prince, who was always in difficulties, not always of his own making. He was as extravagant as the rest of his family, but it must be put down to sheer bad-luck that he lost three or four outfits in succession by shipwreck or capture. The last of his misfortunes was the choice of the doctors who attended him in his last illness. "Though his Royal Highness lost one hundred and twenty ounces of blood from the arms and by cupping, he died on the morning of the 23rd." He had been taken ill but two days before.

If Mr. Fitzgerald had contented himself with about a fourth of the space which he has occupied (and we make as large an allowance as possible in consideration of habits which it would be difficult to overcome), we could have bestowed on him more praise than we have found it possible to give to these two bulky volumes.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The History of England. By Dr. Lingard. (Nimmo and Bain.)—We are glad to see that the demand for Dr. Lingard's England still continues. The work of the learned Catholic requires on points to be supplemented by the results of recent research, but in the main its accuracy and impartiality are incontestable, while it is, among such histories, perhaps the most equally pleasing to read. Few histories give the reader the same impression of exhaustive study, while the separateness of the stand-point, that of a temperate Roman Catholic who desires to see the truth, secures a certain flavour of originality. There are points, perhaps, on which the Doctor was prejudiced; but even on these, his narrative is of great value to those who can recognise that history is rarely simple, and always admits of a reading other than the popular and accepted one. This new edition is in ten volumes, is excellently printed, and illustrated with ten portraits of the greatest personages in our history, including Cardinal Pole. The single defect of the edition is that of all modern books of weight—a want of half an inch more margin on the inner side, so that the volumes should lie a little more open. Publishers, however, are upon this point all alike,—immovable.

Lusus Intercisi. By Henry John Hodgson, M.A. (Bell and Son.)—A volume of Greek and Latin verse from the pen of so accomplished a scholar as Mr. Hodgson is sure to find, at least, some appreciative readers. One distinctive feature of this collection is the original verse, a kind of composition too much neglected by scholars of the present day. Translations can never reach the first rank in style, and, useful as they are, should not be suffered to have the monopoly which, in direct contrast to the practice of the last century, they now enjoy, in many, at least, of our homes of classical scholarship. Here is a happy epigram on the mitrailleur (1871):—

"Tormentone novo patriam tatabere, Cæsar,
Fulmineo centum quod vomit ore globos?
At virtute opus est, opus est et milite fido;
Non hæc clausisset machina Thermopylas."

As a specimen of translation, we give the epitaph on Sir John Franklin:—

"Non hic, Nauta, jaces, præclare; tua ossa nivalis
Æreos habet rigido contumelata gelu;
Tuque magis faustis, anima a fortissima, vellis
Non iam terrestrem pergis adire polum."

Our readers may compare this with the versions collected by Mr. Wright, and will probably think it better than most, but surpassed by some, as, for instance, by the following (one of the five versions contributed by Dr. Butler, of Harrow):—

"Non hic, magne, iaces: Boreas habet ossa nivalis, Ause polum titulis addere, nauta, tuis.
Carpe sereniter iter; nunc te polus attrahit alter;
Et freta terrenæ non adeunda rati."

Old Court Customs and Modern Court Rule. By the Hon. Mrs. Armytage. (Bentley and Son.)—A readable magazine article might have been made out of the materials which Mrs. Armytage has been at the pains to collect for this volume, if only she had arranged them a little better. As it is, there is not a little confusion. Under the head of "Royal Balls and other Entertainments," for instance, we learn that in the last century, "Duchesses, Marchionesses, Countesses were entitled to a message from the Queen on the birth of an infant, or upon the death of their husbands, or any relative for whom they put on black gloves." Generally, we find much that everybody knows, or, at least, might know, and much that nobody need care to know. On the whole, the impression is left that Royalty is much less in sympathy socially with its subjects than it was. But this refers to the upper class only. With the people generally it is more in sympathy, being brought into it by the share taken in various movements, philanthropic or other. Two hundred years ago the King dined and played cards in public, but then there were no openings of museums and exhibitions, no hospital festivals, and the like. These bring, if not the Queen herself, yet the Royal Family into constant communication with the people.

Guide to the Lake District. By Herman Prior. (Gansett, Windermere; Simpkin and Marshall.)—This is a very handy little volume, containing all that is to be found in the large editions of Mr. Prior's book, but of such a size as to be most conveniently carried in the pocket. The type is clear, and the binding has a durable look. Two maps accompany it, one giving the usual information, the other geological. Both will be useful, though, of course, not sufficient for the pedestrian. The general merits of Mr. Prior's Guide are well known; it only remains to notice the great convenience of its present form. These three hundred and fifty pages, in leather binding, with two maps in pockets, weigh exactly five ounces.

Moloch. By Mrs. Campbell Praed. 3 vols. (Chapman and Hall.)—Most readers will be a little surprised by the scenes in which they first make acquaintance with Mrs. Campbell Praed's heroine. If this young lady had dropped from the moon, she could not have been more careless of the manners and customs of society. But this surprise will change to a very different feeling, when they come to realise the plot of the story. Briefly put, it is this. A man falls in love with and engages himself to the daughter of a woman whom he has taken away from her husband, with whom he has lived for several years, and who has borne him children. Now, this is a very frightful story. We can imagine it told, with the utmost gravity and dignity, without a single superfluous word, as an impressive warning against profligacy. But it becomes a grave offence against taste, and we may say against morality, though nothing could be further, we are sure, from the author's thoughts, when it is mixed up, as it is here, with the ordinary frivolities of fiction. And for whom, let us ask Mrs. Campbell Praed, as we have asked others on like occasions, for whom does she write? Does she know who they are that actually read novels? Does she suppose that they are men of pleasure, or rather young women whom it can serve no purpose to shock, and, we do not hesitate to say, to harm, with such stories as these? This is really, for a book that we quite believe to have been well meant, the very worst offender that has come under our notice during an experience of many years. Is there no way to teach authors and publishers their plain duty to society in this matter? Surely, the great libraries, which minister to, if they do not create this enormous demand for fiction, might exercise a censorship which would put a stop to the production of such books as Moloch.

Asahar. By E. C. Hope-Edwards. (Bentley and Son.)—Miss Hope-Edwards gives us here extracts from a journal which she kept in Spain, during the winter of 1881-82. She entered Spain by way of Barcelona, and spent the greater part of her time at Valencia. Valencia is a place where Spain can be seen with even less veneer of foreign manners than is to be found elsewhere. The place, therefore, was rightly chosen, and sufficient time was given to it for some real acquaintance with its people to be made. We do not remember to have seen anything about Spain more vivid, and without any effort at fine-writing, than the eight chapters (iv.-xi.) which make up the account of places, men, and manners in Valencia. Among other notable possessions, Valencia has a University, which is so far abreast of the times as to admit women students (who do not, however, to any great extent, avail themselves of the privilege), and a library of fifty thousand volumes. A propos of books, Miss Hope-Edwards gives us some interesting details about Spanish literature, its present condition and its prospects. These seem feeble enough, and the Spaniards themselves are anything but sanguine. It is certainly a fact that Fernan Caballero, the best known of Spanish littérateurs—and she is not more than second-rate—is half German by extraction. One of the Valencian chapters gives an account of a visit to the monastery of Montserrat, which is interesting not so much from what the writer saw of the monastery, as from her record of the very characteristic experiences of travel. From Valencia, Miss Edwards went to Cordova, thence to Malaga, where she heard a preacher improve upon St. James by saying, "It is not enough to believe,—the devils believe, Protestants believe;" and from Malaga, again, to Seville, to which she devotes four chapters, and Granada. Her stay at Seville included Holy Week, still observed in that city with a fuller ceremonial than is preserved elsewhere. Her description of this is very full and interesting, and written, too, in excellent taste. It is a constant source of pleasure to the reader throughout the volume to find the author so truly sympathetic. At Granada, the most interesting object, after the Alhambra, was the gypsy Mariano. Spanish gypsies, however, seem to be less characteristic than their English brethren. Madrid and Toledo were visited after Seville. The book is eminently readable, and not a little instructive.

Her Sailor Love. By Katharine S. Macquoid. 3 vols. (Hurst and Blackett.)—We must own that these three volumes of lovers' affairs, even treated with the skill which Mrs. Macquoid's pen can command, seemed to us a little wearying. It can hardly be said that there is any plot. No one supposes for a moment that the young sailor whom Elsie loves has really been drowned, or that Mrs. Limber, the evil genius of the story, will be allowed to do any real mischief, in the end. The most inexperienced of novel-readers sees almost from the beginning how things are going to turn out, and will not allow himself to be misled by the very simple devices which Mrs. Macquoid employs. But though he is not thrilled, or startled, or excited, he will, granted a fairly good appetite for this particular kind of literary food, be satisfied. The dialogue is easy and sometimes brisk, there are touches of nature in the characters, and pleasing bits of description of scenery. Still, this is not the kind of work by which the author of Patty made her reputation.

Our Eastern Sisters and their Missionary Helpers. By Harriett Warner Ellis. (Religious Tract Society.)—There is much that will interest the reader in this volume. It is a record of work that has been done among women in India and the Further East, in Persia, Egypt, and Syria, during the last fifty years. There is in the world much silly and some spiteful talk against Missionaries; no better refutation could be found than is offered in this unpretending little book. Let any one read, for instance, if he wants to know more, what has been done by them among the Khonds, where hundreds of girls doomed to death by a hideous practice of infanticide have been rescued. The question of belief may be set aside; about the gain to humanity there is no question. Nothing in the volume is more interesting than the account of the "Female Medical Missions," which are doing a daily increasing work in India.

The Conservation of Solar Energy. By C. William Siemens,

F.R.S. (Macmillan and Co.)—Mr. Siemens publishes here, together with the original paper, read to the Royal Society last year, the correspondence which that paper, with the remarkable theory which it stated, called forth, in Nature and the Comptes Rendus. The subject was well threshed-out, and no one will doubt the benefit of having all the argument preserved in this convenient form.

Contradictions. By Frances M. Peard. 2 vols. (Bentley and Son.)—Miss Peard does not trouble herself to provide much incident for the entertainment of her readers. Of course, there are misunderstandings, and there is a rescue, an heroic affair upon a railway bridge. It must be owned that, with this element wanting, six hundred and fifty pages of talking and love-making grow a little wearisome. Yet there is merit in the story, if story it is to be called. The two sisters, Dorothy and Gina, are an attractive pair of fresh, right-thinking, vigorous English girls; and Olivia, with her more conventional and worldly aims, which do not, however, wholly occupy her heart, forms an effective contrast. Life in Venice, too, is described with some skill, and there are descriptions of scenery and of the effects of light and colour in the canals and lagoons which are well and forcibly written. Miss Peard once ventures into a domain which is evidently strange to her. Before she mentions cricket again, she should get coached by some schoolboy of her acquaintance (it is the only thing a schoolboy is pretty sure to know). He would not allow her to talk of a man being "caught at slip from a skyer." A skyer at slip is not, perhaps, an absolute impossibility, but it is not far off.

Letters from a Young Emigrant in Manitoba. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—The gist of this book is to be found in the few words which are appended by the editor to the last of the letters. The writer of them went out at eighteen, and "he has been able, within two years, to establish himself in a farm of about seven hundred acres, his own property, and a fair proportion of it already under cultivation; he has his house, two teams of horses, cows, pigs, &c., eight stacks of corn, and fifty tons of hay, besides his ploughs, reaping and binding machine." What these two years were, what difficulties intervened and were overcome, and how, generally, the result was obtained, may be learnt from the letters themselves. But one thing may be mentioned, by way of encouragement, for, of course, all is not plain-sailing, that the writer's friends at home, as they read his letters, were most struck with the kindness which he received from all whom he met.

The Land of the Five Rivers and Sindh. By David Ross. (Chapman and Hall.)—This volume may be briefly described as a gazetteer of the Punjab and Sindh. Information, both historical and geographical, is abundantly supplied; and with regard to the Punjab, at least, connected as it has been with European history for more than two thousand years, the historical associations are considerable and important. A glossary and an index complete a volume which should be in the hands of all who have connections or interest in these provinces of British India.

Sophocles: the Seven Plays, in English Verse. By Lewis Campbell, M.A. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—Professor Campbell has done so much good work for Sophocles, that any contribution of his to the understanding and appreciation of the poet must be received with respect. We have now from his pen a complete translation of the seven plays. (A part, our readers will remember, was published some time since.) The impression left by the whole is rather of the carefulness and industry and sound scholarship which Professor Campbell's labours on the text have led us to expect from him, than of any great aptitude for the special work of a translator,—a translator in the sense of one who gives the force and beauty of his original in a way at least approximately adequate. The blank verse is correct and smooth, the lyric parts sometimes happy, and mostly possessing a fairly good rhythm; but we miss strength in the first, and beauty in the second. Here is a specimen, from the curse which Edipus pronounces on his son Polynices, at Colonus:—

"Begone, rejected and renounced by me,
And take with thee, thou vilest of the vile,
Thy's imprecation:—Vain be thine attempt,
In levying war against thy father's race;
Frustrate be thy return to Argos' vale:
Die foully by a fratricidal hand,
And foully slay him who hath banished thee!
I call, moreover, from his dread abyss,
The power that waits upon a father's curse
To bear thee off to his confine: I invoke
The spirits who haunt this ground, and the fierce god
Who hath filled you both with this unnatural hate."

"Rejected and renounced" is but an indifferent equivalent for ἀπένυστός τε κἀπάτωρ. "My father's race" does not give the idea contained in γῆς ἐμφυλίου. And we should certainly prefer to take, with Linwood, πατῶν Ἐρεβος, "of the Tartarean darkness, where dwelt the father of Edipus," than to follow Professor Campbell's interpretation. The allusion to the murdered Laius introduces a new element of horror. The pronunciation of "confine" cannot be altered by printing an accent over the second syllable. Indeed, the word, however it may be pronounced, does not make the line a good one. Philoctetes' farewell to his island is more happily executed:—

"Come, let me bless the region, ere I go.
Poor home, sad comrade of my watch, farewell!
Ye nymphs of meadows where soft waters flow;
Thou ocean headland, pealing thy deep knell,
Where oft within my cavern, as I lay,
My hair was moist with dashing south-wind's spray,
And oft-times came from Hermes' foreland high
Sad replication of my storm-vent cry:
Ye fountains, and thou, Lycian water sweet,
I never thought to leave you, yet my feet
Are turning from your paths,—we part for aye.
Farewell! and send me kindly on my way,
O Lemnian earth! enclosed by circling seas,
To sail where mighty Fate my course decrees,
And friendly voices point me, and the will
Of that heroic power who doth this act fulfil."

We can speak with unmixed praise of the prefatory note which introduces the translation. Besides much that is truly and forcibly said about the special characteristics of the Sophoclean drama, it administers a strong rebuke to the quasi-Hellenism which some admirers of the Classics would seek to impose upon us. "On turning," says Professor Campbell, "from the forms of Greek art to the substance of Greek literature, we find that Beauty, although everywhere an important element, is by no means the sole or even the chief attribute of the greatest writings, nor is the Hellenic consciousness confined within the life of Nature, unless this term is allowed to comprehend man without his thoughts and aspirations."

Retrospections, Social and Archæological. By Charles Roach Smith. (Bell and Son.)—We are not inclined, nor, indeed, do we feel competent to criticise, this book. Mr. Roach Smith gives us pleasant recollections of persons—pleasant, that is, for the most part, for sometimes people have made light of or hindered his archæological researches, and he cannot forgive them—and recollections, even more pleasant, of places. "Ingoldsby" Barham, Thomas Wright, Thomas Waghorn, and J. R. Planché are among the friends whom he commemorates. The proceedings of Congresses are described, not without an occasional touch of humour. But the chief attraction of the volume will certainly be found in the accounts of Mr. Smith's explorations. The "Visits to the Roman Wall," begun nearly forty years ago, may be quoted especially as interesting. We were more ashamed than surprised to read, in the account of Binschester (the Roman Vinovia),—"Dr. Hooppell finds that the Church of Escombe was built out of the ruins of Vinovia; and Dr. Bince tells us that when the estate passed into the hands of the Bishop of Durham (Van Mildert), the mansion was pulled down, and the altars and other antiquities which had been collected were utilised in forming the 'stoppings' of a coalpit. An altar to Fortune, by a prefect of cavalry, was rescued at the pit's mouth by Dr. Raine." The Christians of earlier days destroyed images and altars from genuine feelings of fear and hatred; the Vandals whom Mr. Roach Smith describes had no more exalted motive than the greed of gain.

Sam's Sweetheart. By Helen Mathers (Mrs. Henry Reeve). 3 vols. (Hurst and Blackett.)—Miss Mathers' story opens in a gold-diggers' camp, called by the probable name of "Misogamy," and situated in Australia, though possessing a certain resemblance to such places as we are accustomed to find described in American fiction. The dialect is curiously like the talk of American camps. The situation, a little child humanising a very rough company, is one that has been employed before, and Miss Mathers does not make it her own by any peculiar force in putting it. Her picture wants clearness, and is not always in good taste. When she is most serious, she is capable of writing such slang as "these men were likely to come a cropper over their best instincts." In Book ii., the scene is changed and the time advanced by some fifteen years. We find the heroine grown to a maiden of surpassing beauty, with a very decided inclination to flirt, and are introduced to a young savage, who may be described as the Uncas of Australasia,—we say Australasia, because the savage in question seems to be a Maori, while the action takes place in Australia. It is to Bathurst, certainly, that the heroine and her English lover take their romantic journey, and by Bathurst we suppose to be meant the place of that name in New South Wales. We have called the journey romantic; it is something more. It is, in fact, a very strained situation. The pair take their "solitary way," like another Adam and Eve, only unmarried; and we are perpetually reminded what a perilous way it is, what a struggle there is between passion and duty. However, Bathurst is safely reached. The Englishman goes home, and Wantha (that is the Maori maiden's name) turns back to the bush, where she finds her father, John Trefusis, alias "Cucumber Bill," and now Earl of Thor. By his dying command, she comes to England, where she is received by a cousin, the Rev. Amos Trefusis. Mr. Trefusis' resources are scanty, and Wantha makes herself useful by killing game for the family larder, not taking any heed of close-time, of which, however, the clergyman, if he was at all like other country parsons, must surely have heard. (Yet he thanks a neighbouring proprietor, under the impression that the game had been sent as a present.) But it is needless to pursue the story any further. It is brimful of improbabilities, nor is there any trace of the art which sometimes can make the reader accept even improbabilities without question. The book has merits, as all that so clever a writer as Miss Mathers writes must needs have. There is some brisk action, and graphic description; but, as a whole, it seems to us anything but a success.

Adoniram Judson: his Life and Labours. By his Son, Edward Judson. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—The filial piety of Mr. Edward Judson has given us here a more complete account than we have hitherto possessed of a laborious and noble life. Dr. Judson has been placed by common consent—for we have heard High Churchmen loud in his praises, Baptist though he was—in the front rank of great Missionaries. Tried by the test of visible success, his work was great. Nowhere in India, except, perhaps, in some districts of Southern India where Christian influence has been long at work, have Missions done more than they have in Burmah. Something of this Dr. Judson saw in his lifetime—sixty-three churches had been established, at the time of his departure from Burmah—but more has been developed since his death. He left behind him also work of another kind, closely related to his missionary labours. He had finished a translation of the Bible into Burmese, and had put together the larger part of a Burmese dictionary.

POETRY.—Love in Idleness. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—It is plain enough to any one who reads a page or so of this volume that its author possesses no small poetical gifts. His work wants substance. We read his poems through, and find that, beyond a vague sense of melody and sweetness, they leave little impression on the mind. The writer feels; he has a keen sense of the beauty of things, the gladness and the pathos of love find an harmonious expression in his verse; at the same time he is wholly free from the faults of the "fleshy" school; but we see little that can be called thought in his work. This art of thinking he must learn, if he would win a place among poets. When he grows to this—as, being, we suppose, yet young, he may well grow—his command of language, fine sense of rhythm, his vivid fancy, and the scholarly feeling which enables him to enjoy the classical models, will stand him in good stead. The first and most important of the poems, is a legend quaintly compounded out of the "Odyssey" and Lucian's Vera Historia. Nausicaa, after long centuries of sleep, is made happy with Ulysses. Only Homer's Nausicaa would have disdained the love-sick maiden who is here depicted; and Lucian's Ulysses forgets his Penelope, not for the Phæacian maiden, but for Calypso. Among the other notable pieces may be mentioned "Afternoon," a pastoral of some beauty, but a beauty too artificial, and the two "Nocturnes," in which Chopin's music is translated into verse. "The History of Philip the Deacon: a Pageant," is a clever imitation. The translations from the Greek are as good as anything in the volume. Here is the version of "Meleager to Heliadora":—

"Tears, bitter tears, all I can give,
Tears to the depth, to thee I pour,
To thee in Hades, Heliadora,
All of my love that there may live.
Tears, bitter tears, I pour to thee,
Tears of libation, wept above
Thy tomb, in memory of thy love,
In memory of thy love to me.
Ah! with what sighs, with what tears shed,
I, Meleager, mourn thy face,
To Acheron a bootless grace.
To me still dear among the dead.
Alas! my blossom, whither must
I seek thee now? Hades it is,
Hades hath snatched away my bliss,
And trod my perfect flower to dust.
Yet shall not tears disturb thy rest,
Rather, I pray thee, mother earth,
Our mother, thou, who gav'st us birth,
To fold her gently to thy breast."

—Poems and Sonnets. By Eugène Lee-Hamilton (Eliot Stock.)—In an introduction which contains some pathetic expression of personal feeling, the writer makes this apology to his reader:—

"But if some shape of horror makes you shrink,
It is, perchance, some outline he has got
From nightmare's magic-lantern. Do you think
He knows it not?"

And, indeed, there is overmuch of the nightmare in this volume. The "New Medusa" is a story, told with much power, but too horrible for art, of madness and murder. The subject of "A Ballad of the Sack of Prato" is possibly admissible. The heroine is an Italian Judith, with a difference, avenging her wrongs on a Spanish Holofernes, but it is disfigured with horrors that seem to indicate a morbid imagination. The "Idyl of the Anchorite" offends still more grossly against the canons of true art. In his insatiable love of the ghastly, Mr. Hamilton permits himself to step over the line of the ludicrous. "A colour more sallow than baker's paste" moves mirth rather than terror. We regret this mistake all the more, because there is real force in much of the verse. Here is a specimen, from "An Elegy on the Death of a Lady":—

"And now beneath these Tuscan hills she lies
Where friendly sunbeams kiss away the tears
Which every passing April cloud lets fall
Upon her grave. All through the day

Such tears and kisses and the songs of birds
Have been the gift of spring—the spring she missed.
But now the sun is low: before it leaves
It sends a slanting ray to kiss the stone.
Then pearly twilight settles over all;
The cypresses grow black, the air grows chill,
The mighty dome of Florence stands distinct,
With Giotto's belfry near it, on the sky.
Then by degrees they mingle with the night,
Like fading ghosts. The city's hum is hushed,
And through the dusk there comes the mellow boom
Of a great bell, tolled slowly, which brings home
A sense of peace in mutability."

Unfortunately this poem, a passionate declaration of atheism and pessimism, is the most repulsive in the whole book.—Poems by Two (D. R. Clark, Dundee), is a volume of ordinary verse, sometimes, indeed, sinking below this level but once or twice, as in the ballad of "The Skipper of Dundee," rising above it.—Wayside Songs: with other Verse. (Wilson and McCormick, Glasgow).—This volume shows some real lyrical power. Now and again there is a "lilt" in the verse which makes us feel that the author has at least approached to the secret of song-writing. We read the verse, for the first time at least, with pleasure. Whether we should care to read it again, we doubt, yet feel, while we doubt, that it is not impossible. The writer is one of those perplexing people whose writing is good in form, but somewhat wanting in substance, and who are consequently peculiarly difficult to class. Here, for instance, are some pretty verses, which yet have no glow about them:—

"BY THE SEA.

We gazed into the world that lay
Beyond the golden verge of day,
A world of dreams from whose bright shore,
The winds a whispered message bore.

The flowers around were wet with dew,
One star had kindled in the blue,
While at our feet the stream sang still
The music of the purple hill.

With rhythmic beat, and rippled flow,
The bright waves smote the rocks below.
While circling 'mid the hazy blue,
With many a cry the sea-birds flew.

The sense of perfect calm and rest
Fell with the glory of the West,
And Nature and our hearts in tune,
Waited the rising of the moon.

For, oh! how sweet it was to stand
One moment on enchanted land,
To feel that life had perfect grown,
And all the present was our own."

—So Tired! and other Verses, by M. E. Townsend (Rivingtons) are sweet and musical, beyond the average of verse of the day, and full of devotional feeling.—We have also received The Vision of the Eucharist, by Alfred Gurney, M.A. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.); Mirabeau: a Historical Drama, by George H. Calvert (Lee and Shepherd, Boston, U.S.); and the fourth edition of Cosmo de Medici: a Historical Tragedy, and other Poems, by Richard Hengist Horne (Redway); Sketches in Verse, and the War on the Nile, by John McCosh (James Blackwood and Co.); The Book of Songs, by Heinrich Heine, translated from the German by Stratneir (W. H. Allen and Co.); Lays of the Sainily, by Walter Park (Vizetelly and Co.); Scenes from the Pilgrim's Progress, by Richard Ball Rutter, (Trübner and Co.)

We have received:—The Leofric Missal, as used in the Cathedral of Exeter during the episcopate of its first Bishop, A.D. 1050-1072, edited, with introduction and notes, by F. E. Warren, B.D., F.S.A. (Clarendon Press, Oxford).—About England with Dickens, by A. Rimmer, illustrated by the author, C. A. Vanderhoof, and others (Chatto and Windus), the contents of which are pleasant and enjoyable reading. It is a welcome addition to the series of books on chatty and out-of-the-way subjects issued by the same publishers.—A second edition of Cæsar in Egypt, and other Poems, by J. Ellis. (Stewart and Co.).—Bentley on the Epistles of Phalaris, &c., edited by the late W. Wagner, Ph.D. (Bell and Sons), an addition to the excellent "Classical Series" published by that firm.—The British Letter-writers, a collection of English letters from the fifteenth century to the present time. (Nimmo and Co.).—Third Historical Reader, by Rev. D. Morris, B.A., illustrated. (Isbister and Co.)

The popularity Pepsine has acquired as almost a specific for chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, &c., is due to the fact that it is the nearest possible production of the active principle of the gastric juice of the stomach. Unfortunately, like all other inventions of a like nature, Pepsine has been not slightly discredited by the spurious
manufactures that have been issued from time to time; it is therefore necessary as a guarantee of its efficacy to see that each bottle bears the maker's name,

SPECTACLES v. BLINDNESS.

"Spectacles can only be perfectly adjusted by those having a thorough knowledge of the anatomy of the eye, combined with optical experience."

WE have the highest Medical Authorities, confirmed by daily experience, that imperfect glasses, together with the haphazard plan of selection generally employed by the mere vendor, is the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Sir JULIUS BENEDICT writes:—"I have tried the principal Opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have adapted suit admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." The Rev. Professor W. A. Hale, M.A. Oxf., 3 Minford Gardens, West Kensington Park, writes:—"The Spectacles are perfect, and a most decided boon. I had occasion on Monday to write to Lord —, and took the opportunity to mention your name, and the wonderful power of your Spectacles." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age
right eye." Testimonials from Earl and Countess Lindsay; F. D. Dixon Hartland,

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

ANOTHER night (Monday) has been nearly wasted. Mr. Bright, in the speech at Birmingham which we noticed last week, accused the Conservatives of having formed an alliance with a "rebel party" among the Irish Members, for the delay of public business. Sir Stafford Northcote, to repudiate the charge, and also, perhaps, to consume further time, brought the statement forward as a breach of Privilege. His speech was temperate, and consisted principally of an utter repudiation both of Obstruction and of alliance with rebels. It was endorsed in warmer terms by Sir B. Cross, and in a really good, though forensic, speech by Mr. Gibson. Mr. Bright's rejoinder was mild, but firm. He showed how time was wasted by Members who acted in combination, though not in alliance; quoted the exultation of the Tories and Irish at the defeat of the Affirmation Bill, as proof of their common sympathies; denounced the personal attacks on the head of the Government, and then proceeded to justify the word "rebels," for which, however, he would heartily apologise, if Mr. Parnell would repudiate disloyal designs and his American associates. It was expected that the Irish Extremists would be furious, but they did not really care; Mr. Parnell stayed away, and those who spoke only insulted Mr. Bright. A division was taken, and the House refused by 151 to 117 to treat the speech as breach of Privilege.

The Government has decided that all affairs in dispute between ourselves and the Governments of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State shall be settled by a Special Commissioner, and Lord Reay has been asked to accept the office. We trust he will accept. He is a trained diplomatist, a Dutch noble and an English Peer, and a man of resolute moderation. He will understand almost by instinct what the Dutch Colonists really want, and will be able to report how far their demands can be conceded without destroying the future of South Africa, and without surrendering the natives too completely to a people without pity. Lord Reay will, moreover, be able to report on the whole situation of South Africa with a fresh mind, and especially to decide whether the time has arrived for the creation of any central authority, whether nominee or elective. We have had many able men at the Cape, but never one who could be trusted, yet could talk to the old Dutch settlers as one of themselves, and perceive clearly how deep the fissure between the white races goes. The experiment, as we have maintained for years, is one full of hope.

Sir Henry James admits that the Criminal Code Bill cannot get through the Grand Committee on Law during the Session, and that it must be abandoned. He stated in the House on Thursday night that he had given up hope, "in consequence of a circumstance which had occurred in the morning, when they had been prevented from forming a quorum by the active exertions of one member of the Committee;" and it is said that Sir Henry James will make mention of the active obstruction which the Bill has encountered in the Grand Committee, in his report to the House. After this statement, Sir H. Drummond Wolff asked the Prime Minister whether, "having regard to the signal success of the principle of delegation and devolution,"—and here he was interrupted by the loud laughter of Lord Randolph Churchill,—he intends to refer to this Committee any other Bill during the present Session. Mr. Gladstone replied that, owing to the loud laughter of Lord Randolph, he had not distinctly caught the question, but that if it referred to the reference of other Bills to this Committee, it was a matter needing an early consideration and decision. We hope the constituencies will note this incident. It, and the indecent laughter which accompanied it, have a distinct bearing on the question of the "alliance" for obstructive purposes between the Conservatives and the Irish Members, which Sir Stafford Northcote so eagerly repudiated on Monday night.

Against the evil omens of the day, we must never forget to balance the good. Mr. Gladstone has written to the Midlothian Liberal Association, expressing a hope that he may yet fulfil the engagement to speak there which he had to break in January in consequence of his attack of sleeplessness, and he adds:—"I also hope that when the time comes I may still be able to say, as I can now say, that I do not perceive the action of the disintegrating forces which were visibly at work during the latter years of the Administration of 1868-74, nor find any reason to believe that the country has altered its mind on the important issues which were decided in 1880." This is weighty enough in itself. It is still more important when accompanied by Mr. Gladstone's expression of his belief that he may still be able to address his constituents on the work of the Administration, since that gives ground for a reasonable expectation that Mr. Gladstone is not thinking of a retirement which could hardly fail to be a heavy blow to the Liberal party, and also to the Liberal policy of the hour.

The Bishop of Natal died on Tuesday last, in the seventieth year of his age. Dr. Colenso was Second Wrangler at Cambridge in 1836, and also Smith's prizeman; and his name was long known chiefly as the author of very clear and useful mathematical works, which are still widely used. He was, however, always deeply interested in religious work, and took in 1846 the rectory of Forncett St. Mary, in Norfolk, where he did work and preached "village" sermons that made a very great impression on his parish, and are still remembered there. In 1853 he was made Bishop of Natal, being at that time regarded as a follower of Frederick Denison Maurice. In 1862 appeared the first part of the criticism of the Pentateuch which made so great a stir, and in 1864 he was formally deposed by his metropolitan, Bishop Gray, of Capetown, from his see. Dr. Colenso appealed, and in March, 1865, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council declared that in making Bishop Gray Dr. Colenso's metropolitan, and in giving Dr. Colenso himself a Natal diocese, the Crown had done what it had no legal power to do, and that, therefore, Bishop Gray's sentence of deposition was legally null and void. None the less, Bishop Gray appointed a rival Bishop, whom he consecrated Bishop of Pietermaritzburg. This did not, however, disturb Bishop Colenso's equanimity. Of late years, the Bishop of Natal has been widely known and deeply respected as a steady friend to the natives of Zululand, and the ablest English counsellor of the native chiefs of those parts, of Langalibalele and Cetawayo. He has throughout his episcopate shown courage, dignity, and complete independence in African politics, and his memory will long be cherished in South Africa, where he has played the part of a wise, influential, and faithful adviser of the native tribes. Justice is a rarer characteristic among ecclesiastics than self-sacrifice itself; but justice was the most distinguishing characteristic of Dr. Colenso.

A terrible catastrophe occurred on Saturday at Sunderland. A conjuror named Fay, who had taken the Victoria Hall, offered to admit school-children to his afternoon entertainment for a penny. An enormous number, probably 3,000, of all ages from four to twelve, therefore attended, and were distributed between the floor of the hall and the gallery, the dress-circle being left empty, because the custodians of the building thought the prices too low. Fifteen hundred children, therefore, stood in the gallery, which is reached by a staircase seven feet wide, with many landings to break the descent. At the conclusion of the performance, Mr. Fay, who had promised to distribute toys as prizes, sent a caretaker to the gallery with a basket full, but the man finding the rush of children oppressive, descended, and stood by the door into the body of the hall. The children pursued him, and a few, taking their toys, entered the hall, when a valve of the swing-door was suddenly bolted. The caretaker says the children swung it and it bolted itself, while the children say he bolted it. At all events, the entrance became too small, many children fell, and the weight of the descending stream of babies drove the foremost files on to one another, till a heap had been formed eight feet high, seven feet broad, and, as we calculate, about seven feet thick from the door. All in that heap died, many instantaneously from asphyxia, the bodies being, so to speak, welded together by the weight, till strong men could scarcely disentangle them. One hundred and eighty-two children perished in six minutes, and double that number would have died, but that a door above, opening into the dress-circle, was at last unlocked.

We have said enough of this ghastly tragedy elsewhere, but may repeat here that givers of entertainments must avoid these vast collections, unless they can find officers to govern the children's movements. There was no special fault, except in collecting such numbers without discipline or division. The notion that a crowd of children cannot suffer, because of their lightness and mobility, is entirely illusory. Collectively, they weigh tons, and in descending a staircase in a stream it is their collective weight which crushes. Their want of strength forbids them to keep back the crowd, and they are specially liable, from want of height, to the sudden fainting which in such scenes precedes death. "We fell asleep on the staircase," said one little girl, who fainted, but being near the top, was recovered; and that sudden fainting was probably the fate of most. A few, however, had fought desperately for life, but not one got out of the heap, which grew momentarily higher and higher. Every possible consideration has been shown to the survivors and their relatives; the town made arrangements for the burials, and a large subscription was raised at once to defray expenses. The grief of the parents was, of course, frightful, and it was at last necessary to summon soldiers to prevent the crowds of excited men and women from causing a second catastrophe.

The French have gained what they think a further success in Madagascar. Admiral Pierre, after bombarding Majunga, presented to the Queen, or to her Ministers—for it is said the Queen is dead—an ultimatum demanding the protectorate of the north-western coast, or Sakalava country, the grant to Frenchmen of a right to purchase land, and a payment of £60,000 as an indemnity. These terms being refused, the Admiral destroyed two small ports, Foulepointe and Tenerive, and then shelled Tamatave, the chief port of the island, until it submitted. He proposes to levy all import duties and stop all munitions of war until the Court of Antananarivo submits to his terms, but not to endeavour to force his way to the capital. He will not succeed. The Hovas are very resolute, they want nothing but powder and rifles, and they will obtain both from traders, who will swarm into the smaller harbours, both from Zanzibar and the South-African ports. Madagascar is too big to blockade, and the French Government will soon be compelled either to advance or to patch up an agreement.

A very curious letter, bearing a London post-mark, was received on Wednesday by the Mayor of Sunderland, which professed to be written by E. Mindful, the private secretary to the "President, pro tem., of the Irish Republic," expressing sympathy in the fearful catastrophe of Saturday last, and taking credit for not regarding that catastrophe as a judgment on the children for the sins of their fathers towards Ireland. As the fathers of the children who perished in Sunderland have had no appreciable share of responsibility for the Irish policy of this or any other Government, we do not think that the "President, pro tem., of the Irish Republic" need take credit for any great enlightenment in declining to regard the Messrs. Fay as the instruments of a vindictive providence charging itself with special retribu-tive functions on behalf of Ireland. But the letter is a very significant one, if only as showing what strange and harum-scarum devices the disaffected Irish love to adopt, in order to impress their wrongs upon the imagination of the public. The next thing will be that the imaginary private secretary of the imaginary President will write to the Queen, congratulating her in the President's name on her recovery from the accident to her knee, and disavowing any wish to regard that as a judgment on her for assuming the title of Sovereign of the United Kingdom. The disaffected Irish play at tragedy.

Mr. Bright concluded his speeches at Birmingham on Friday week by an unexpected and almost furious outburst in favour of the Channel Tunnel. He declared that those who believed that Englishmen could not defend the Tunnel, a mere hole under the earth twenty feet wide and twenty miles long, were only worthy of Bedlam. He did not believe that the French were a nation of brigands, or the English a people of imbeciles, and held the idea of the transmission of an army through the Tunnel without warning to be absolutely preposterous, past discussion. He considered the notion of the seizure of the end of the Tunnel to be equally absurd, because if men could come in boats to seize the Tunnel, they could come in boats to seize Dover, and they do not do it. He believed that the Tunnel would be of enormous commercial advantage to the country, and that by rendering communication easier it would increase the probabilities of peace, which had now lasted fifty years, and ought to last five centuries. It seems to us that Mr. Bright's argument does not go far enough. If we can trust the French so far, and if, as he intimated in another sentence, our numbers are a sufficient protection, and if communication so finally prevents war, why do we keep up a Fleet? The truth is, that freedom of communication is constantly a cause of war, and that the gain from the Tunnel, if there was any, would be nothing to the loss from incessant panics. France cannot seize Dover now by boats because her men would be isolated, but they would not be isolated if she had control of both ends of a submarine road only twenty miles long.

The Bill for legalising marriage with a deceased wife's sister passed through Committee in the House of Lords on Tuesday, after a discussion on the retrospective clause legalising marriages of this kind, the result of which appears to have been that if the amendment accepted by Lord Dalhousie becomes law, it will legitimate children of parents who have gone through such invalid marriages in the past, but will not make those marriages valid. Lord Dalhousie also introduced an amendment, of which we do not as yet really understand the scope, but which he explained as intended to make it possible for clergymen who do not feel any conscientious objection to celebrating these marriages, to celebrate them, without depriving clergymen who do conscientiously object to them of their canonical ground of objection. If this is the real drift of the amendments proposed, Lord Dalhousie has been very wise in adopting them. On Lord Salisbury's advice, Lord Beauchamp withdrew his amendment to the retrospective clause of the Bill, Lord Dalhousie, on his part, having promised not to make the Legislature eat its own words by now declaring marriages to be valid which were by statute previously invalid.

A long discussion took place in the House of Commons on Friday week, which was continued through the sitting of Monday, on the proper definition of spiritual intimidation for the purposes of the Corrupt Practices Bill. It was at first maintained that a spiritual teacher might not declare it to be a sin which God would punish in the next world, to vote for any given candidate, and that such a declaration ought always to constitute an offence punishable under the Bill; but, after much discussion, this statement was withdrawn, Mr. Gladstone himself admitting that it might conceivably be far from wrong for a spiritual teacher to speak of such an action as a sin, and that in that case, if he believed that such a sin would involve punishment in the next world, he ought not to conceal that belief. The Attorney-General, however, refused to limit spiritual intimidation to threats of ex-communication or of the refusal of the Sacraments, but did not explain what, short of this, he would regard as a punishable act of spiritual intimidation. In our opinion, Mr. Arthur Arnold, Mr. H. Fowler, and those who maintained that spiritual intimidation should be altogether excluded from the purview of this Bill, obtained a complete intellectual victory over their opponents. Mr. Arnold's amendment was, however, defeated by 254 votes against 43,—majority, 211.

On Monday night Lord Salisbury asked Lord Granville in the Lords, and Mr. Warton and Mr. Lowther asked the Prime Minister in the Commons, if their attention had been called to the speech of Mr. Chamberlain at Birmingham, advocating universal suffrage, equal electoral districts, and the payment of Members; and whether that avowal of Mr. Chamberlain's represents the mind of the Cabinet in relation to the coming Reform Bill. Of course, both Lord Granville and Mr. Gladstone intimated, what Mr. Chamberlain himself had indeed at Birmingham expressly stated, that he expressed nothing but his own individual view; and Mr. Gladstone added that he believed that Mr. Chamberlain had even reserved to himself to consider "within what limits he would apply his own personal view, if he had the opportunity." Further, Mr. Lowther having asked whether the fundamental basis of the Constitution were to be treated by the Cabinet as an open question, Mr. Gladstone replied that the party opposite had declared the fundamental basis of the Constitution to have been destroyed ten or twelve times at least, but that, unless Mr. Lowther would tell him what the fundamental basis of the Constitution was, he could not undertake to answer the question. The Tories took very little by their attack. Nevertheless, we wish Mr. Chamberlain had been more prudent than to intimate that whatever the Cabinet might propose, the country should not look upon it as a discharge of the public obligations incurred unless it came up to the standard of the measure sketched by himself. That is an intimation which will needlessly weaken the Government, whenever the Reform Bill is produced. The younger Ministers should remember the fable of the bundle of sticks, and not needlessly untie the bundle in which they are themselves bound up.

The polling for Peterborough, for a successor to Mr. Whalley, was going on yesterday, and the result will be known before this journal is issued. The only candidates in the field were Mr. Sydney Buxton,—who has recently exerted himself to so much purpose on behalf of Mr. Tuke's Irish emigration scheme,—and Major Fergusson, of the Rifle Brigade, who came forward in the Conservative interest. Mr. Sydney Buxton, in his address, promised that he would heartily co-operate with the Government, if they asked for further powers for regulating debate in order to give legislation a fair chance, and engaged, "as a matter of principle, and not of person," to give the most cordial support to any measure having for its object the abolition of any religious test which bars the entrance into the House of Commons of a duly elected Member. Mr. Buxton's address is, indeed, that of a thorough-going Liberal. Major Fergusson, of course, declared his intention to resist any measure intended to facilitate Mr. Bradlaugh's entrance to the House of Commons, asserted that "Great Britain has lost all the allies left her by Lord Beaconsfield," and "holds a position of isolation,"—a romance of which he offers not a tittle of proof,—and ascribes all the Irish difficulties of the moment to Mr. Gladstone, while heartily approving the administration of Lord Spencer and Mr. Trevelyan, who are Mr. Gladstone's appointees.

The ancient and extraordinary charge against the Jews of sacrificing human beings in their Passover rites has been revived in Hungary. A girl named Esther Solymosi was recently murdered, or supposed to be murdered, at Tisza Esslar, and certain Jews were accused of cutting her throat in the synagogue, to mix the blood with unleavened bread. The principal man accused was the Jewish butcher, Scharf, who is half a rabbi, and the witness against him is his own son, Moritz, a boy of fifteen. This lad says he saw the murder, and his testimony, if believed, would be final; but the defendants allege that he is abnormally wicked, and has invented the whole story. It is certain that he endeavoured to stab his mother, and that his evidence against his father is marked by virulent hatred, both of him and of all Jews. The charge looks prima facie ridiculous, and derives its whole importance from its recurrence from time to time in widely separated countries and in nearly every century. We have read much apologetic Jewish literature, but have never seen a reasonable explanation either of the charge, or of what is much more wonderful, the persistent popular belief in it. If that has any foundation, which is most improbable, there must exist embedded in Judaism a cabalistic sect which has preserved through ages some dark tradition of the efficacy in extreme cases of human sacrifice. Such a sect, it is almost certain, is embedded in Hindooism, though the teachers of that faith repudiate it with unaffected horror.

The Irish Members are always most successful when they ask for money. On Wednesday, Mr. Blake moved the second reading of a Bill ordering that a quarter of a million should be granted from the remaining funds of the Irish Church to improve the harbour accommodation of Irish fisheries. Mr. Forster supported the application, as without harbours the big boats, made necessary by the Atlantic storms, could not be employed. Mr. Courtney, however, objected, on behalf of the Treasury, alleging that the Church Fund was nearly exhausted, that the scheme had not been thought-out, and that the money would be scattered uselessly among seventy harbours. It was, therefore, believed that the Government would resist the grant, but the "whipping," as usual, was bad, it was whispered that the Government would be defeated by a majority of twenty-seven, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, rising, said he would assent to the proposal, if the Church Fund could supply the money. The second reading, therefore, passed without a division. If Irish fisheries are benefited, the money is well bestowed; but will they be? Experience does not make us hopeful.

Lord Carnarvon made a very sensible speech on agricultural depression on Tuesday at Newbury, in which he deprecated the disposition to rely on Government for help in relation to such matters as agricultural depression, and quite admitted that so far as it was not due to the increase of competition from the United States, it was due chiefly to bad seasons, though he thought something might be done by a fairer system of rating and more care in preventing the importation of disease, to diminish the farmer's difficulties. We are glad to see Lord Carnarvon sticking steadily to his Free-trade doctrine, at a time when Lord Salisbury flirts with the friends of retaliatory tariffs, and Sir Stafford Northcote pleads for a fair hearing for Mr. Ritchie, and is quite benignant even to Mr. Lowther.

Mr. Peter Taylor has done a great service to sanitation. On Tuesday he moved a resolution declaring the compulsory laws for vaccination "unadvisable and dangerous," and made a speech repeating all the old arguments, the best of which are that other diseases have died away as well as small-pox, that the vaccine virus is sometimes impure, and that some vaccinated persons die of small-pox. Sir L. Playfair answered him by showing that out of 17,000,000 cases of vaccination, it was doubtful if disease had been produced in four cases; that small-pox was one of the most fatal as well as hideous of diseases; that the rate of mortality before vaccination was introduced was 3,000 per million, and is now 156 per million; and that if sanitation had anything to do with the matter, it would have affected other diseases equally, which it has not done. He quoted also the awful mortality caused by small pox in 1870 in the French Army among the Breton soldiers, whom there was no time to revaccinate. The House divided, and 16 Members were actually found to vote for Mr. Taylor's motion, against 286.

Two important Irish returns have been issued this week whose figures are too eloquent to need comment. One is the return of agrarian offences during the month of May. The number of offences against the person amounted to 5,—2 of firing (without result), and 3 of assault. Of offences against property there were 24, and of offences against the public peace 66, of which 44 were threatening letters,—making a total of 93 offences in all, not one of which involved loss of life. Kerry seems to be now the most disordered of the Irish shires. It has 19 cases of crime, in which are counted the 2 cases of firing, 4 incendiary fires, and 3 cases of cattle-maiming. The return is a pleasing contrast with the grim bills of mortality of last year and the year before. The second paper is that giving the return of proceedings under the Land Law, also to the end of May. To that date, there had been 97,207 applications to fix fair rents received. Fair rents had been fixed in 35,628 cases. There were 7,738 applications dismissed, and 5,862 withdrawn,—some indication that the Court does not invariably mulct the landlord. What is more satisfactory still, there were 41,644 agreements to fix fair rent out of Court. Of the 1,500 leases cases, 1,224 had been disposed of; and of the 8,417 appeals, 3,009 had been heard or withdrawn. At this pace, another year ought to see the new settlement of Ireland completed, and, so far as agrarian crime is concerned, its pacification also accomplished.

MR. BRIGHT'S BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

WE do not suppose that Sir Stafford Northcote expected the House of Commons to declare that Mr. Bright's charge against the Conservatives of allying themselves with the "Rebel party" among Irish Members was a breach of Privilege. It is not his business to defend the Parnellites, who were most gravely attacked, and as regards his own party, he must have known that such a vote would be too unjust even for a partisan majority, had he controlled one. Mr. Bright intimated that an alliance existed between the Conservatives and the Irish Extremists; but for months past every Tory speaker in the House and out of it has railed at the Liberal leaders for arranging a "treaty," the "Treaty of Kilmainham," with Mr. Parnell,—that is, from their point of view, for making a regular compact with a party whose object is the dismemberment of the kingdom. They have repeated this charge in every possible form and with every vituperative addition which anger could suggest, have wasted hours in a futile effort to prove it, and have specially endeavoured to fix it on Mr. Gladstone, but no one has ventured to accuse them of breach of Privilege. How often have we not heard that Mr. Gladstone was the confederate of infidels and treason-mongers, because he let out Mr. Parnell and voted for the Affirmation Bill? The accusation levelled at Mr. Bright, as formulated by Sir Stafford, is in truth nonsensical. He may not have the right to accuse a party in the House of being rebels, for rebellion is a criminal offence, but he has a right, if he believes the charge, to accuse the Conservatives, or any other section of the House, of combining with a faction to delay business. If he has not, freedom of speech upon politics is gone. The very first question upon which the constituencies need instruction is the cause which delays public business, and one of the suspected causes is an agreement, open or tacit, between certain Conservatives and certain Members from Ireland to exhaust the time of Parliament. If a Member speaking to his constituents may not state that suspicion, and say that for himself he believes it, he may not instruct them as to political transactions which they are bound to study, and one of the first objects of a representative system is given up at once. He should give evidence, of course; but Mr. Bright did give evidence, namely, the state of public business, and his own experience as to its cause. If our institutions are to work, the Member and his constituents must take counsel together, and take it publicly; and they cannot take it without an amount of freedom of speech which, in the instance before us, was certainly not excessive. There is not a party in the country which has not accused its rivals of combinations quite legal and quite Parliamentary, but fatal to self-respect. Sometimes the accusations have been true and sometimes false, but in neither case have they ever been treated as breaches of Parliamentary Privilege. To set such a precedent merely because Mr. Bright's voice, when he speaks, reverberates through the country, would not only be absurd, but fatally injurious to political discussion.

Sir Stafford Northcote's object, visible in every line of his temperate speech, was to raise a debate, and repudiate publicly a charge which he knows perfectly well undoes with the constituencies all the good his party might receive from the failure of the Government to carry its promised measures. He succeeded in raising the debate, but we question if it will benefit him much, unless, as is possible, he thinks any consumption of time a benefit to his party. Speaker after speaker from the Tory side repudiated Obstruction, but no one met the obvious facts that Bills do not get through as they were wont to get through, that they do not get through because time is wasted, and that time is wasted by the combined action, it may be accidentally combined action, of the Parnellites and a section of the Tories. They all fastened on an illustration used by Mr. Bright, which undoubtedly was not a happy one. The Affirmation Bill was not defeated by an alliance between the "Rebel party" and the Conservatives, but by an alliance between the Conservatives and the Members for Ireland at large. Mr. Bright's own figures prove this, for if, as he says, England and Scotland accepted the Bill by a majority of sixty-three, thirty-one Members, the highest Parnellite figure, could not have defeated it. Notoriously the Bill was defeated not by a combination of Conservatives and "Rebels," but of Conservatives and Catholics, who either acted from religious feeling, or under pressure from their electors. The Tories escaped under cover of that error of Mr. Bright's, but they never faced the remaining facts, or disproved the evidence known to all men, that night after night business is arrested by trivial discussions, by useless amendments, and by shoals of questions; and that discussions, amendments, and questions are in the main brought forward by Tories or by Parnellites. Suppose the Fourth Party, three or four Parnellites, and Mr. O'Donnell out of the House! There may be no alliance whatever, as Mr. Bright admitted there was none, still less any treaty; but the two parties perceive the situation, think that legislation can be stopped, desire, though from very different motives, to stop it, and do stop it, till the will of the constituencies, as expressed in the elections, cannot be carried out. Why, Mr. Parnell himself said on one occasion that "he left the Tories to do his dirty work." That is the charge, and the debate only gave Mr. Bright an opportunity of bringing it more closely before the people, who, being rough in thought, will ask why, if Sir Stafford Northcote, and Sir R. Cross, and Mr. Gibson are so anxious that business shall advance and Bills be accepted or rejected, they do not help it on, and compel the more violent Members of their party to fall into line behind them? They may allege that they are not followed, but do they really try to be followed, as they would try if they were in power? Obviously they do not, and the reason is that they think the waste of time makes in their favour, and exhausts the Gladstone period.

The speech was not one of Mr. Bright's best, for he was full of the Irish, who had not seriously raised their case against him. Mr. Parnell did not appear, no one rose from the Irish side till Mr. Bright sat down, and though many Extremists spoke, and insulted Mr. Bright as much as they could, it may be doubted if any one of them cared a straw for his words. Men never really care much for denunciations which help them with their constituents, and in Ireland, unhappily, the words "rebel" and "patriot" have become historically synonymous. Even the accusation of taking pecuniary help from American-Irish falls very dead. Half the poorer Irish in Ireland look for help to Irish-Americans, and see no more reason why their Members should not cultivate such support than why they themselves should not be helped by their kinsfolk to emigrate. What was wanted was a still more crushing exposure of the waste of time and its causes, the kind of exposure which a master of statistics who was also a master of eloquence could give. That kind of exposure is not Mr. Bright's forte, and though he did all he could, and did it with singular command alike of words and temper, he did not do all he might have done. Still, he emphasised his charge, and Sir Stafford Northcote has only to glance over the country papers to see how completely his attack failed, how strong is opinion that the Tories are either obstructing or consciously allowing obstruction to go on. That is, we repeat, the gravamen of the charge against them, which can be disproved only by their lending effective aid to the conduct of public business. Nobody disputes their right to oppose Bills which they disapprove, by every argument in their power. What is denied is their right so to occupy time that votes upon Bills—votes which actually advance the machine—cannot be taken. The fact that Government passes few Bills is, of course, no evidence against the Tories; but the fact that Government takes few decisive votes for or against, is. The Tories deny that their conduct on the Affirmation Bill is evidence to Mr. Bright's charge; but it is evidence, though not in his way. They hated that Bill. They declared it irreligious, atheistic, and we know not what, and were ready to take any course by which it might be defeated. Nevertheless, as they saw a chance of victory, they allowed a decisive vote to be taken, and consequently it was taken without any unusual delay. All the country asks of them is to treat the Government measures as they treated that Bill, to fight as hard as they can, or as they like, but to let the final vote be taken, and then respect it. It is because they do not do this, or at all events are suspected of not doing it, that the electors are growing savage, and that, as the Tories will find, day by day men's minds are widening about the Redistribution Bill, which would at least put a final stop to English Obstruction. In failing to remove the public impression by means much simpler and more direct than attacks on Mr. Bright, they are making Great Britain Radical with a speed of which they have no conception. Men are often greatly moved by slight arguments, and the fact that no large constituency would bear to see its Members stopping work, may yet be a fatal one for those petty boroughs in which Conservatives put their trust.

SPIRITUAL INTIMIDATION.

WE will not go so far as to say that there is no species of intimidation applied exclusively by ecclesiastics, and which, therefore, may technically be called spiritual, that ought not to be treated as the exercise of an undue influence in a political election. The major excommunication, as it was sometimes put in force in old days, undoubtedly amounted to Boycotting of a most formidable kind, not only in spiritual concerns, but in civil and social life; and the attempt to enforce or even the threatening of the major excommunication for any political act, if it were within the limits of practical possibility in modern times, which it hardly is, might have a most formidable tendency to cause not only spiritual, but physical loss and injury to an honest and independent voter. Still, this is just one of those exceptional cases in which spiritual intimidation entails all the consequences of physical intimidation, and is, therefore, though it would be wielded by ecclesiastics if it were wielded at all, within the meaning of the Corrupt Practices Bill without any express inclusion of spiritual intimidation amongst the unlawful agencies to be prohibited and punished. We go, therefore, entirely with Mr. Arthur Arnold and those who hold with him that spiritual intimidation alone,—spiritual intimidation not involving physical injury and loss,—ought not to have been made penal in the Corrupt Practices Bill at all. The net result of the long argument in the House of Commons was admitted to be this,—that no spiritual teacher is worth his salt who does not, on sufficient occasion, denounce sins which affect political life, just as much as sins affecting the moral and social life; and that no spiritual teacher who really believes that the consequence of sin is suffering, either in this world or in the next or in both, can properly abstain from pointing out this consequence to his congregation, and from pointing it out in any kind of language which is best fitted to bring it home to their hearts. Well, if that is admitted, it seems to us as clear as daylight that the only difference between undue influence and due influence, is the difference between a conscientious exercise of this influence by spiritual persons, and an unconscientious exercise of it? Is that a matter on which a Judge,—perhaps of another faith and almost certainly of another phase of culture and political belief,—sitting in judgment at the trial of an election petition, can properly pronounce with any sort of authority? Let us suppose that Mr. Healy, brought up as he has been in the heart of Catholic Ireland, and in habits of almost invincible ignorance as to English modes of thought on many subjects, were suddenly seated on the English Bench, and sent to try an election petition in any English borough in which it appeared that every Minister of the Baptists, of the Methodists, and of the Independents in the place had been preaching vehemently during the whole election that Ireland was the one fatally diseased spot in the United Kingdom, that the only remedy for its disease would be to isolate it completely from the rest of the Empire and to govern it by a wise despotism, and that no man was a good citizen, or could expect to find salvation in the next life, who did not vote for a serious effort to rule Ireland for ten years by something like despotic government, in the hope of redeeming her from her present moral degradation. We are putting an impossible case, we admit, but we are putting it advisedly, because we believe that Mr. Healy suddenly called upon to try an election petition in such circumstances as these, would not be at all less capable of treating these spiritual denunciations as conscientious, than many of our Irish Judges at present are of treating the spiritual denunciations of the priests in Ireland as conscientious. And yet, how would England like a judgment such as Mr. Healy would pass on the corrupt character of such an election? If it comes to this,—as we think it does,—that the only difference between undue and due spiritual influence is the unconscientiousness or conscientiousness of that influence, we can hardly insist too much on the extraordinary difficulty in which many of the Irish Judges are placed, in attempting to estimate the political conduct of the Irish priests. As we have already intimated, many of these Judges are of a different faith; all of them have lived in a totally different plane of culture from the priests whose political interferences they are called upon to judge; and what is most important of all, almost all of them have throughout their lives been in the habit of thinking that what the priests desire for Ireland is mischievous, and what they dread is desirable. Is it possible for a Judge in that position to form an estimate worth having on the conscientiousness or unconscientiousness of an Irish priest's action? Mr. Healy, in the case we have supposed, could not be more violently prejudiced than Mr. Justice Lawson was in the trial of that election petition for Galway in which Mr. O'Donnell was unseated by a decision characterised by even Mr. C. Lewis, the Protestant and Conservative Member for the City of Londonderry, as unfair. The simple truth is that it is childish to pretend that Judges of one political creed, religious faith, and social caste, can judge with any approach to fairness the conscientiousness or unconscientiousness of the use made of their spiritual influence by priests of a violently opposed political creed, religious faith, and social caste; and yet, so far as we can see, the sole distinction between the use of due and undue spiritual influence in political elections is the difference between a conscientious and an unconscientious use of it. If a priest honestly and sincerely believes that a particular political act is a sin which God will punish,—just, for instance, as many a Protestant Dissenting minister would seriously have believed that the attempt to prop up the Slave power in the Southern States of America was a sin which God would punish,—he is bound to state that belief, whether in the pulpit or on the platform. And if he states it, then, as Mr. Gladstone frankly admitted, he cannot but state the consequence which he sincerely expects to attach to the commission of that sin. It is of the very essence of spiritual influence that it enters necessarily into all the duties of life, the political duties amongst the rest, and that the use of it must appear “undue” to those who think that it is used for mischievous ends. Suppose that a proposal had been made to endow the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland,—a proposal like that of the Maynooth Grant on a larger scale,—and that half the Dissenting ministers in England did their best to paint in the most graphic manner the sins of which the Catholic Church had been guilty,—the sanction given, as Lord Acton believes, by Pius V. to the assassination of Queen Elizabeth, the horrible dishonesty of Roman casuistry, and the rest,—how is it possible that these representations,—many of them, no doubt, inaccurate and misleading,—should not be regarded as “undue influence” by the Roman Catholics of the United Kingdom? And supposing there were a Roman Catholic Judge on the Bench who had to try an election petition, how could he well refrain from declaring that “undue spiritual influence” had been used in the very effort to induce simple people to believe, on the faith of their pastor, a number of doubtful, misleading, false, or even thoroughly calumnious statements? Yet is it seriously to be asserted that Judges ought to go into the character of statements of this kind, with a view to deciding whether the spiritual influence used has been due or undue?
